She moves steadily upon her objects with an ambition that knows no bounds. And wherever she has had a conflict of interest she has rarely yielded to any power.

At this moment she presents to the civilized world the spectacle of the greatest military and commercial power in combination ever known.

From her vast possessions in every quarter of the globe, and her peculiar commercial system, she has been made the reservoir of the wealth of nations.

Her internal resources, skill, labor, and machinery, with her capital, are beyond calculation. Her natural position, being about midway the coast of Europe, gives her great control over the outlets and currents of commerce.

Her military occupation of Gibraltar, Malta, the Ionian islands, and recently of St. Jean d'Acre, give her ascendancy on the Mediterranean and the Levant, while St. Helena and the Cape of Good Hope give her possession over the currents of trade along those extensive coasts. Then Bombay, Calcutta, and her immense possessions in the East Indies, together with her recent movements in the China seas and islands, enable her to extend her power over those vast regions that have slumbered for ages in solitary and enervated magnificence. She possesses Falkland island but to control the commerce that passes around Cape Horn—while Trinidad gives her all she desires in the Caribbean sea. Halifax at one point, and Bermuda at another, stand out in great force over our own coast from one extremity to the other.

Her positions all over the world are at this moment, in a military point of view, equal to a million of men under arms. Her continual conflicts in the mighty regions of the East, only enable her officers to become skilful and to improve in the art of war, while her great armies and extensive fleets draw their support from the immense countries seized and occupied. In the present juncture of affairs, no statesman can overlook these things. Steam power has recently brought us so near together, that in the event of any future conflict, war with its effects will be precipitated upon with much more rapidly than formerly.

Avarice and ambition are the ruling passions of modern times, and it is vain to shut our eyes to the state of things around us. It remains to be seen what effect steam power is to have upon changing and modifying the whole art of defence and war. It may be a great engine for again levelling mankind, and reducing every thing to a contest of mere physical force. In that event it might be difficult to conjecture what system of national defence will stand the test of time and experience.

We have a deep stake in peace, and fondly hope the repose of the world will not be disturbed. We have certainly not the least desire for any rupture. Firmness, and a wise preparation, will long preserve us from such a catastrophe. But while no temptation should ever prompt us to do injustice on the one hand, so no consideration, on the other hand, should ever induce us to submit to permanent wrong from any power on earth, no matter what the consequences may be.

Your committee would conclude by expressing a firm belief that all our points of difficulty may be honorably and amicably adjusted, and that harmony may long be preserved by both Governments pursuing a liberal and generous policy, congenial to the interests and feelings of both people, and compatible with the spirit and genius of an enlightened age.

Mr. PICKENS moved that the report be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. EVERETT suggested the propriety of collecting and printing together, in one pamphlet, all the documents upon the subject.

Mr. HAWES objected to the reception of the report, unless it was in order to make it.

The SPEAKER said the report could not be received unless by consent of all parties.

Mr. HAWES then objected.

Several members suggested that it was now too late to make the objection, as the report was actually before the House, and motions had been made and entertained respecting it.

The SPEAKER here decided that the objection should have been made when Mr. PICKENS proposed to submit the report; that, not hearing any objection, he had received the report, and propositions were entertained respecting it; and that it was now too late to raise the objection.

The reading of the report was called for, and it was read accordingly.

Mr. EVERETT renewed his proposition to include in the printing all the documents upon the subject, a list of which he furnished.

Mr. GRANGER rose and moved a division of the question—first, on the motion to lay on the table; and then, on the motion to print.

And the motion to print being debatable—

Mr. GRANGER said that he considered this report, if acted upon and adopted by the House, as approaching very nearly, in its consequences, to a declaration of war, if the British Government should desire so to consider it. He would take occasion to say, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that the report did not receive his assent. And he felt constrained to detain the House for a few moments whilst he assigned, very briefly, his reasons for this conclusion.

What (continued Mr. G.) was the position of the Committee on Foreign Affairs when they entered upon the consideration of this question? My colleague [Mr. FILLMORE] had called upon the State Department for the correspondence which had taken place in relation to the demand for the liberation of McLeod. That matter, and that alone, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It is not my purpose to censure the conduct of this Administration; for, so far as my judgment can now determine, I approve fully the course they have taken. That opinion may, upon further reflection, be changed; but, as at present advised, I consider the course of Mr. Forsyth to have been such as was due to his high official station and due to the character and dignity of this nation. But, so considering, and representing a section of country deeply interested in this question, and as ready to meet its consequences as the people of any other section of this Union, I still dissent from the report.

What does it embrace? A report upon matters referred to the Committee of Foreign Affairs? No; nothing, as I have stated, was referred to that committee but the correspondence in relation to the demand for the liberation of McLeod. Does that committee act upon a call of the Executive of this nation, made upon this House, to place before the country and the world the condition of things between the United States and Great Britain? No. The Executive, mindful, as we are bound to believe, of the honor of the country, as well as of the character of his own administration, has not thought proper to call upon either House of Congress for advice in regard to our relations with Great Britain. What, then, is the position of that committee? Travelling beyond the record, they come forward and present (by the votes of a bare majority, I will say, if in order) a report which, to say the least of it, is not pacific in its character, and which is based upon complaints against the British Government, not one of which has been referred to that committee. When, or by whom, have the Committee on Foreign Affairs been called on to consider seizures upon the high seas, or this alleged right of search? which, I agree with the committee, is one which this nation is not likely to tolerate in the manner in which it is now exercised. When, or by whom, were the other matters of controversy which that report embraces referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that they might make report upon them? And, if so, what have they reported? Have they sent here a document setting forth the alleged grievances of this country, complaining of injustice done on the part of Great Britain, and calling for the action of this House upon those matters? Has the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means come forward to say that he is prepared to recommend appropriations to put the country in a proper state of defence to meet the emergency which such a report as this may create? Is your Committee on Military Affairs ready to recommend the defences which should be provided if such a report is to go forth to the world, under the sanction of this House? Has your Committee on Naval Affairs sent in requisitions to put your ships in commission, that you may be prepared to meet on the high seas the power you have before met and crippled? No. There has been no such recommendation. And the Committee on Foreign Affairs, without recommending any action, without even coming to any conclusion, as it seems to me, except that Great Britain is the greatest power on earth, and we the humblest, bring here a report calculated to inflame the whole nation; and to let it go forth to the world that we are making an issue with Great Britain, which we voluntarily tender to her, and which, in my opinion, she has a right to take up on the instant.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are considerations connected with the honor and dignity of the State of New York, and with the administration of justice within her borders, that demand our attention. On a former occasion I stated on this floor that the person whose life was in jeopardy would receive at the hands of a jury of New York the same fair and impartial trial which would be secured to any citizen of that State who might be arraigned for a violation of its laws; but I mourn now to say that, from present indications, there is an excitement on the western border of New York, growing out of the arrest of this man, and of his liberation for the moment, which is already sufficiently great to make those who regard the lives and the liberties of the people of this country pause before they act. By this time, I suppose, the grand jury of Niagara county has closed its investigation. The current rumor through the newspapers of the day is, that McLeod has been indicted. The people of that section have been greatly incensed by recent transactions there. Send forth this paper to the world, recommending nothing, and being nothing but a detailed account of grievances against the British Government, with a few hits at what may be presumed to be the arrogance of her course; and no man can answer for the consequences upon the life of this man. I felt it to be my duty to endeavor to postpone this question until the trial should have passed. I believed that the power of this country could never be exercised with a higher glory to itself, than when showing to the world that whilst it took the position which its honor demanded, still that the humblest individual of this or any other country, whose foot was upon our soil, should be shielded by the mild, the just, and the impartial operation of its laws. I do not think that, without any call from the Executive, without anything having been laid before the Committee on Foreign Affairs but the papers relating to the liberation of this man—I say I do not think that the honor or dignity of this nation required that we should send forth a declaration, not only of the prowess of Great Britain and of our humility, but of our readiness to meet her at any moment, when no necessity existed for such a threat; and when the voice of this House, speaking potentially to the nation, might be considered as a watchword by which every man on the Northern frontier was to guide himself in hurrying on to execution this suspected foreigner. If he should be tried and found guilty, let the penalty of the law be exacted; and let the people on the frontier of New York, and the people throughout the widest extremities of this land, be prepared to meet the consequences. When those consequences shall present themselves, not only will the State of New York be ready to meet them, but I feel sure that a patriotic feeling, which supercedes all local questions and merges all political differences, will rally this whole nation to the rescue. It will then be time enough to act; but, in the name of justice, let us not anticipate that event by inflaming the public mind, and adding to the horrors of war the consciousness that we have interfered with the impartial operation of our laws or trifled with their supremacy.

Some conversation took place between Messrs. ADAMS, PICKENS, and GRINNELL, which resulted in a motion by Mr. GRINNELL to amend the motion of Mr. PICKENS, (which was, that the report be laid on the table and printed, as above stated,) so as to lay on the table the whole subject; that was to say, the report and the motion to print the report, &c. and on that motion Mr. G. asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. PICKENS inquired of the SPEAKER whether that motion closed the debate?

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Some conversation ensued between various members, but a division of the question was called for.

Mr. BRIGGS suggested to Mr. GRINNELL that as he (Mr. B.) supposed no one wanted the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the report on the table, it would save time to withdraw the call for them, so far as that part of the motion was affected.

Mr. GRINNELL having assented,

The question was taken, and the motion to lay the report on the table prevailed without a division. So the report was laid on the table.

The question then recurred, and was taken, on the second part of the motion of Mr. GRINNELL—to lay the motion to print the report on the table—and it was decided in the negative—Yeas 77, nays 110.

So the motion to print the report, &c. was not laid on the table.

And the question recurring on the amendment of Mr. EVERETT—

Mr. PICKENS said he had a few remarks to make in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER.]

That gentleman (continued Mr. P.) has delivered a regular set speech, prepared for the occasion, with tones as regular as if they had issued from a bagpipe. He was the very last gentleman here, judging from the sentiments he expressed a few weeks ago, who, I should have supposed, would have found his patriotism and his valor oozing out so soon from the palms of his hands. His speech, in my opinion, is worthy of attention. His speaks as one clothed with authority, and I regret very much the course he has thought proper to pursue.

Mr. Speaker, I will declare to you and to this House that, so far from this report being the war report, as the gentleman from New York has characterized it, it is essentially the reverse. To speak our sentiments plainly and fearlessly before the world—to declare that we know our rights and dare maintain them—must, in my judgment, have a tendency directly the reverse of that which the gentleman seems to anticipate.

He has spoken of this report in two points of view. In the first place he asserts that the Committee on Foreign Affairs have travelled out of the record. The subject-matter in relation to the "Caroline" and to the demand for the liberation of McLeod, I consider as having been actually and in fact referred to that committee. They could not separate the two cases so as to present them in an intelligible point of view to the country. And does he say that that part of the report is beyond the record? Other matters have been mentioned as merely as incidental, by way of illustrating the interest thrown around this question, and with no intention to arouse any hostile feeling in this or any other country. I deny the imputation, thrown out by the gentleman from New York, that the report has arrayed the strength of Great Britain and proclaimed our own weakness, or, as he terms it, our own humility before the world. It does no such thing. I challenge the gentleman to lay his finger, if he can, upon a single sentence which, even by inference, proclaims our weakness or imbecility. I thought it was proper to present, the precise condition of things to the country; and I will here take occasion to say that the report was written by myself, without consultation with any human being, save the committee to whom it was presented. In drawing it up, I looked over the whole subject matter; I looked at the great interests involved; I looked at the position in which you, Mr. Speaker, and this House, had placed the Committee on Foreign Affairs before the nation and the world, and I felt it to be a duty which I owed to this House and to my country to utter freely and without reserve the sentiments we entertained.

The gentleman tells us that the Executive has called for no action; that it is due to the Executive branch of the Government that this House should wait until it hears from that quarter. Sir, I take the reverse of that position; I say that we were constituted, under the Federal Constitution, as a co-ordinate and independent branch of this Government; that this House is, in the contemplation of that Constitution, the peculiar guardian of the interests and the rights of this Confederacy; and that when any subject-matter is legitimately brought before it, it is not only our right, but it is our duty to the Constitution and to the country to proclaim our sentiments upon it. I repel the idea that we are to look to the Executive branch of this Government for dictation or counsel upon any question that may be supposed to involve the interests and the liberties of the people.

But, Mr. Speaker, my principal object in replying to the remarks of the gentleman from New York is to declare, as I have already done, that this, so far from being a war report, is of a precisely contrary character. I had hoped that the vote might have been taken silently; that the report might have been laid on the table and printed; that there should have been no panic; that no discussion should have sprung up; that no excitement calculated to arouse the people of this country by false appeals to their patriotism and their honor, should have been manifested here. But the Committee on Foreign Affairs have thought that it was proper to present to the people the exact questions at issue between us and a great and powerful nation. We thought—or, at all events, so far as I am concerned, I thought, that the people in every part of the United States, and of every party, had, for the last two years, been too much absorbed in the political conflicts of the day. I thought it was right that the country should understand, in an authentic form, the points at issue between us and Great Britain, and, under these circumstances, I presented this report, acting, as I do on all other occasions, under a conscientious sense of my duty. Yes—I was resolved to do my duty, leaving the consequences to God. These are the principles upon which I have been taught to act. And when I hear from certain quarters appeals to the honor, the patriotism, and the valor of the people of this land—when I hear indirect annunciations made that the accredited heads of this Government have heretofore neglected their duty and slept on the rights of the country—I have a right to expect that those gentlemen who make such appeals and such annunciations will themselves come forward on occasions of importance, and vindicate the sentiments which they have previously uttered.

As to the allegation that this report will have the effect of exciting the people on the border, I say I should rather think its tendency would be the reverse. The people there have been greatly excited; meetings of an angry, unnecessary, and an uncalled for character have taken place, and recommendations were made, I will say, of unjustifiable meetings in this very case in relation to McLeod. These things have been done, and why? Because the people have felt themselves wounded—they have been led to believe that this Government was neglecting their interests. They are under the belief, whether right or wrong, that we have too long trifled and dalled with their rights and feelings; and if we prove to them that this is not true—that this Government is disposed to attend to their interests—to avenge their wrongs, and, if necessary, to vindicate their rights, they will once more look here for that protection which the Constitution has pledged to them. Such a course will produce quiet, will allay excitement, and will produce repose and contentment on that extensive frontier; for it will satisfy the people that their rights will not suffer in the hands of those who hold the reins of Government here. I will not go into any of those delicate matters referred to in the report with a view to excite any feeling; but I here declare that its sole object was to call public attention to those questions—to prepare the people for the issues which might ultimately present themselves; to hold up to them the necessity of going into an enlightened system of national defence suited to the exigencies of the times—suited to the improvements of the age, not only with reference to Great Britain particularly, but with reference to our rights and position as a free and independent people among the family of nations. I think that these things have been too long neglected, and it was with a view to call attention to them and to the great questions in which the people of this Confederacy are so deeply interested that this report was made. It was with no view to the excitement of a war feeling. Far be it from me. The section of the country from which I come is directly interested in the preservation of peace, and we should be the last people to be urged into an unnecessary or an unjustifiable war. I do not believe there is any danger of war, if we do our duty here, as the guardians of the public honor and the public liberty—if we show to the world we are prepared to assert our rights. But, rely upon it, if you take the advice which indirectly has been given by the gentleman from New York—if you proclaim semi-officially from your seats here that these matters are not to be presented in their true light to the People, then there will be danger of a conflict: for it is not in the nature of man—it is not in the nature of a nation like this, when it sees a rival power contending for the ascendancy of the world, to speak language of submission or the language of avoidance, to say the least of it. A great people like this cannot, under such circumstances, forbear; and they would be pressed upon every point, until at last an appeal to arms and to the God of battles became inevitable.

It is to avoid these consequences—it is for the purpose of letting the people know the true condition of things and the real state of the issue—that this report has been presented. I ask no action upon it; I desire to say nothing that can be construed into an intimation or threat that war is to follow. I believe the contrary; and conscientiously viewing the matter in all its bearings, I presented this report upon my sole and entire responsibility, except, as I have said, so far as I had the aid and consultation of a majority of the Committee of Foreign Affairs; yes, a bare majority, as the gentleman from New York has told. And it is with regret and pain that I contemplate the fact that it is only a majority report. I had hoped that upon the question of our foreign relations there were no parties in this country, and that we should have met the issue, whatever it may be, as a united and free people ought to meet it.

Mr. ADAMS obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. GRANGER, who said: If the House will listen to my bag-pipe a few moments longer, I shall feel exceedingly obliged; and if its music is not so loud as that of my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS] it is only because I cannot fill my bags with as much wind as he can blow into his. Sir, I speak by no authority other than that of a Representative of the people of the State of New York. My own course would have been to suffer this report to pass by in silence, leaving to the honorable gentleman from South Carolina all the honor of its authorship; for I have no doubt, and never have had a doubt from the moment when he first read it, that every sentence, every word in it was his own. I have, down to this time, supposed that it was as much my right on this floor, and the right of any other member, to speak my own opinions without fear of dictation, as it was the right of the gentleman from South Carolina to utter his. I only declare that the opinions I have expressed are solely and exclusively my own, without consultation with any one. I should not have called for the reading of the report. I had supposed, until the gentleman from South Carolina taught me better, that the Executive Departments of this nation conducted the negotiations upon all delicate matters between us and foreign Governments. I had supposed that at any rate for the last twelve years the Executive of the United States had claimed some little authority in all matters connected with our foreign relations; and I should have supposed that a party which had permitted our army to fall into disgrace—which had suffered our navy to run down to a state of even acknowledged dilapidation—and which had permitted the whole border-country to be left defenceless, would be the last upon earth to present such a document as this. I trust that the Administration which is about to come into power, though it may not manifest quite so hot a courage as breathes through this report, will show upon the high seas, upon the border, and, if need be, in the tented field, more power to resist the aggressions of a foreign foe than the gentleman and his friends have exhibited. If it does not, it will disappoint the hopes of the people of this country, and I, for one, want none of it. Let preparation be made. Let the unfortunate man now in confinement be tried according to the laws of the State of New York, unbiassed by the action of this House, and let the nation calmly await the issue.

The gentleman says that my courage has suddenly "oozed out from the palms of my hands." I acknowledge that life has for me many charms: probably no man clings to it with greater tenacity than I do, or is more closely bound by all the enjoyments of the present life and responsibilities of the future. I never speak of my courage, nor profess to have been "born insensible to fear." All I have to say is, that when the laws of my own State and of the nation shall have been executed, and consequences are to be met, all differences of opinion between the gentleman from South Carolina and myself upon this and all other questions will be buried in our love of country, and we will be found, shoulder to shoulder, battling in the common cause.

Mr. ADAMS addressed the House at considerable length. He expressed himself desirous, for the sake of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] who had declared himself to be the sole author of this report, that the gentleman should have an opportunity of examining it coolly and impartially, with reference to the opinions not of one party alone, but of both parties.

Mr. PICKENS was here understood to disavow all party considerations in the matter.

Mr. ADAMS disclaimed any intention to cast censure on the gentleman. All he wished was, that the report might be recommitted, in order that the gentlemen might see whether both parties in the Committee of Foreign Affairs could not come here with a report receiving their unanimous sanction, or, at all events, with a report not sanctioned by a close party vote, as this had been. If this was not done, it would, in the eye of the country, of the world, and of posterity, appear to be the policy of a defeated enemy in war abandoning a tenement and setting fire to it upon their retreat.

After alluding to the criticisms of Mr. PICKENS on the party views here in reference to the controversy with Great Britain, and to the general unanimity of opinion which he (Mr. A.) contended had prevailed here on that subject, (with one or two exceptions, which he enumerated,) Mr. A. alluded to the ground taken that this was a conciliatory report. The people, Mr. A. thought, would form a very different estimate of it. What was the dissertation on the ambition and the grasping spirit of Great Britain? Were such charges generally received by nations as being of a friendly character? Suppose the charges to be true, was it conciliatory or courteous to array them here? It was something of the courtesy and conciliation which Captain Fluellen (in one of the plays of the great dramatist) showed to Ancient Pistol, when he said to him, "Got pless you, Ancient Pistol, you scurvy, lousy knave, Got pless you." He wished, therefore, that the report should be recommitted, and that all those parts which related to the general policy of Great Britain, and to her ambitious character and power, might be left out. And, as to the question of right or wrong, which, after all, was to be the basis of our controversy with Great Britain, if we were to press it to a war, he wished a report on the subject itself, based on the correspondence here, that we might see whether, under the laws of nations, we could maintain the position we had assumed in regard to the Caroline. And this point Mr. A. argued with much force, urging upon the House not to put itself in the wrong by any undue act of its own. If we were to go to war with Great Britain, it should be as a united people. He believed that a war would be one of the greatest misfortunes that could befall the country; and he confessed that it was with no small degree of anxiety that he entertained fears that it would come to that inevitable result. He looked to it with apprehension and pain, but not without confidence that, if we went into a war, we should come out with glory and honor, as we had already come out of two wars.

Mr. EVERETT followed at great length, and the general points of his argument were as follows:

He felt an embarrassment, he said, in speaking on this subject, owing to the fact that it was being debated with open doors; and he had said many things in committee which he could not say here, but which he would say if the doors were closed. What was the position of the House? One Administration was about to go out of power, and another to come in—and the one going out (in 20 days) was taking measures to compromise the one coming in—and to prescribe the course it should follow, or at least to embarrass it. If he knew himself, he had never viewed this as a party question: it was one which involved all parties. His own opinion was, that no action on the part of this House was necessary, this correspondence having been communicated in answer to a call made by one of its members. It was the peculiar duty of the Executive to conduct these matters, and it was not for this House to interfere unless there was some remissness on the part of the Executive.

He was desirous that the report should be recommitted, and that the committee should make a specific report on the subject matter which had been referred to it.

Mr. E. then asked what was the state of the question as it now stood, and what were the grounds taken by the British Government, &c. and proceeded to read the following statement of facts as gathered from the official documents:

The facts material to the subject submitted to the committee are, that, on the night of the 29th December, 1837, a detachment of the British forces stationed at Chippewa, in the Province of Upper Canada, crossed the Niagara to Schlosser, in the State of New York, and there made a hostile attack on the steamboat Caroline, the property of an American citizen, killed and wounded a number of American citizens, captured the boat, towed her in to the current, set her on fire, and sent her in flames over the falls.

On the 5th January, 1838, the Secretary of State communicated to Mr. Fox, the British Minister, a copy of the evidence furnished to the Department of this "extraordinary outrage, committed from her Britannic Majesty's Province of Upper Canada on the persons and property of citizens of the United States, within the jurisdiction of the State of New York;" and stating that "it would necessarily form the subject of a demand for redress upon her Majesty's Government."

On the 6th February, Mr. Fox communicated to the Secretary of State a despatch from Sir Francis Head, Lieutenant Governor of Upper Canada, containing the distinct avowals, that the Caroline was destroyed by order of Colonel McNabb, commanding the militia in her Majesty's service, and that he (Sir Francis) approved the act.

On the 22d May Mr. Stephenson presented the subject to the consideration of her Majesty's Government. After referring to those avowals, he said that, "under such circumstances, it was not to have been expected that the whole proceeding could be regarded by the Government of the United States in any other light than as a manifest act of hostile and daring aggression upon its rights and sovereignty, utterly inconsistent with all the principles of national law, and wholly irreconcilable with the wholly and peaceful relations of the two countries;" that "The case, then, is one of open, undisguised, and unwarlike hostility." He concludes by expressing the confident expectation of the President of the United States that the whole proceeding will not only be disavowed and disapproved, but that such redress as the nature of the case obviously requires will be promptly made." To this our Government waits the final answer of the British Government.

On the 13th November last, Alexander McLeod a British subject, was arrested and imprisoned by the authorities of the State of New York, on a charge of arson and murder, as having been engaged in the capture and destruction of the Caroline.

On the 12th December, the British Minister made a demand on the President for the release of McLeod, on the ground that the destruction of the Caroline was a public act of persons in her Majesty's service, obeying the orders of their superior authorities, and that the act, according to the usages of nations, can only be the subject of discussion between the two national Governments.

To this demand the Secretary of State has replied that the President has no power under the Constitution and laws of the Union to interpose between McLeod and the constituted authorities of the State of New York—and that the President is not aware of any principle of international law, or indeed of reason or justice, which entitles such offenders to impunity before the legal tribunals, when coming voluntarily within their independent and undoubted jurisdiction, because they acted in obedience to their superior authorities, or because their acts have become the subject of diplomatic discussion between the two Governments." And that, "if the destruction of the Caroline was a public act of persons in her Majesty's service, obeying the orders of their superior authorities, this fact has not been before communicated to the Government of the United States by a person authorized to make the admission; and it will be for the court which has cognizance of the offence with which Mr. McLeod is charged, to decide on its validity when legally established before it."

The British Minister, expressing his regret at the decision, has referred the subject to his Government.

From these premises, Mr. E. after expressly disclaiming any intention to say who was right or who was wrong, and arguing as to what might be the course of the British Government, drew the conclusion that the diplomatic discussion on the subject was not closed, inasmuch as Mr. Fox had referred himself to his Government for instructions; that as yet, therefore, no definite issue had been made up, and that it would be time enough to act when the British Minister had received the reply of his Government.

Mr. E. deprecated the excitement which had been manifested on the border, declaring that it ought to receive no countenance from any one. He regarded any action on the part of this House as improper, so long as negotiations were pending; and hoped that the report would be recommitted to the committee with instructions to report something of the following character:

"It appearing that the reciprocal complaints referred to in the correspondence submitted on the subjects of diplomatic discussion between the Governments of the two countries, the committee having entire confidence that the rights and honor of the United States will be sustained by the Executive, and entertaining the hope that the controversy will be brought to a satisfactory termination, are of the opinion that no action of this House is, at this time, necessary. They, therefore, ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject."

Mr. FILLMORE rose and said, that, in the course of the debate, he had been anticipated by other gentlemen in much that he intended to say.

The question was of as much, if not more, importance to his section of country than to any other; and he desired to express his opinions in relation to the vote he had just given in favor of the motion to lay on the table, coupled with a motion to print.

I may (continued Mr. F.) have mistaken the purport of this report; I have only heard it read once at the Clerk's table, and I have had no opportunity to examine its contents. The gentleman from South Carolina says it is conciliatory; that it will add nothing to the exasperated feeling already existing on the frontier. I believe that he thinks his report will have that effect; but I much fear, from what other gentlemen of the committee say, that he is mistaken. I voted in favor of laying the motion to print on the table because I thought the effect would not be such as the gentleman anticipated, and I wanted the report laid on the table that I might have time to look into it, and see if my original impressions should be confirmed. If, upon examination, I had found that it was not calculated to produce the results I apprehended, no man would vote for its printing more freely than I would. The House, however, has refused to lay the motion to print on the table, and has thought proper to decide that the report shall be published.

Having, as I have stated, only heard the report once read, and judging from what others say of it, I concur in the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] that the subject should be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I had hoped from the committee a calm, deliberate, and dignified report in the case of the burning of the "Caroline" and the arrest of McLeod; that it would have been limited to that matter alone, (instead of embracing, as it apparently does, all our subjects of controversy with Great Britain,) and that it would have set the country right with reference to the facts in that case. I may be mistaken as regards some of those facts; and upon a careful examination of the testimony, subsequent to the time when I last submitted a few remarks on this case, I observe I was mistaken in some of the facts connected with that transaction. As I was not present on the occasion, all the knowledge I have I derive from the newspapers and from public documents, as others may, and probably do. But upon this question, which, as I have said, is one of vital importance to that part of the country where I reside, we must recollect, in the first place, that there is a judicial question depending. And I was in hopes that in this report, exciting and inflammatory in its character as I now think it is, nothing would have been said, and that so far as this House was concerned, nothing would have been done, calculated to increase the excitement which already exists. I confess I have heard with regret and shame the reports from that part of the country in regard to the treatment of this individual, who is so soon to be put upon his trial for murder. I cannot for any consideration countenance for a moment the idea that the laws of this country are to be basely trampled on by any authority whatsoever. I cannot countenance the idea that the judiciary of the country shall for a moment be overawed, directed, or controlled, by any other authority than that of the laws themselves. And, whilst I say this, I am also unwilling to countenance any thing there, or to do any thing here, which may tend to such results. I hope that we may have been misinformed as to the nature of the proceedings there; I am unwilling to believe that, in a community of citizens such as that, and with many of whom I am well acquainted, and who are highly respectable and intelligent, such things have occurred. I say, I hope we have been misinformed; I trust we have. I have seen different statements of those transactions, and some of them have been of an exculpatory character. But one thing, at all events, should be borne in mind by all whose duty requires them to act on this subject here. There is a great state of excitement on that frontier, which might by possibility lead to an outbreak. My objection to the printing of the report was, that it was calculated to inflame the public mind; and I was governed in that vote by three reasons. In the first place, I did not wish that any thing should be done here which might have a tendency to do injustice to the individual who is soon to be tried by the laws of the State of New York. I desire that the law should have its free action; that no excitement should be raised against McLeod which might prevent a fair and impartial trial. In the second place, I do not desire that any action on the part of this House should compromise or control the Executive of this nation in the negotiations now pending between the Government of the United States and the Government of Great Britain. I have all confidence in the incoming Administration. If this controversy can be amicably and honorably settled between the two Governments, I desire that it should. But there is a third and very strong reason in my mind against any thing being done to exasperate the public mind on the subject of war with Great Britain. It is this: for three or four years I have used all the exertions in my power to induce this Administration, which is responsible to the country, to provide some means of defence on our Northern frontier. But all my efforts were in vain. And yet the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] now tells us that the course to be pursued to avoid a war with Great Britain is, to stand up to her—to threaten her—to take a high stand; and that, he says, will avert a war. I may have been mistaken in the meaning. I know that those were not his words. But I would submit to him that the best way to avoid a war with Great Britain, is to show that we are prepared to meet her, if there is to be war; because reasonable preparations for defence are better than gasconading.

Mr. FILLMORE then alluded to the defenceless condition of the Northern frontier. He desired, and believed the whole country desired, that we should yield nothing to the demands of Great Britain, to which she was not fairly entitled. But, at the same time, he regarded it as rather the act of a madman to precipitate the country into war before he was prepared for it, than the act of a statesman. In his section of country, the people would yield nothing to Great Britain, to which she was not justly entitled; or they would yield it only with the last drop of their blood. But he did not wish prematurely to be drawn into war; he did not wish to invite Great Britain to invade our defenceless coast. The true plan was to prepare for war if we had yet to come to it, but to do nothing in the way of bragging. If it did come, gentlemen would not find his (Mr. F.'s) people shrinking from their just share of responsibility. All they had—their property, their lives, every thing—they were willing to devote, if need be, to the service and honor of their country. But, was it not the part of wisdom and prudence, before we made a declaration of war, to prepare for it? This was all he desired; and if this report was calculated to stir up a war feeling, without corresponding preparation being made to meet the consequences, he, for one, was opposed to it. He did not wish the country to be disgraced by defeat. When she must go to war, he desired to see her prepared for it; he desired to see her placed in a situation which would enable her to bid defiance to the power of any Government on earth.

Mr. F. then alluded to the fortification bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means the other day by its chairman, [Mr. JONES.] That bill contained appropriations to the amount of nearly half a million of dollars, (though that, he believed, was only about half of the amount usually appropriated for such purpose;) and yet there was not a solitary fortification on the Northern frontier to which any part of that money was to be applied. Was this the way in which we should prepare for war? Did the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS] who presented the report, desire to declare war against England before the new Administration came into power? If so, he (Mr. F.) would oppose it. He was for war, if necessary, but not before we were prepared for it. He wished, therefore, that the gentleman from South Carolina would permit the report to be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that that committee might be instructed to confine themselves to the subject originally referred to them, and to that alone. For his own part, he trusted and he believed that the right of this matter was with the American people; and it ought at all hazards to be maintained. But he was unwilling at the close of a session, and when the present Administration had but something like two weeks to remain in power, to precipitate the nation into war without any preparation on our part to meet it. And it was for this reason mainly that he objected to the report. But, as he said before, he might be mistaken in its contents. He hoped he was; for he was at all times prepared to go with him who went furthest in maintaining the honor of the nation and punishing insult or aggression.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved the previous question; it was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The main question was, first, on Mr. EVERETT'S proposition to add to the printing of the report all the documents heretofore presented to Congress on the subject. This question was decided by yeas and nays, and passed in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Boardman, Briggs, Calhoun, John Campbell, Casey, Crabb, Curtis, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Deberry, Dennis, Dickerson, Deller, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Gates, Granger, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, Hawes, Henry, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, King, Lane, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, Monroe, Morgan, Morrow, Naylor, Osborne, Palen, Parmenter, Peck, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Edward Rogers, Russell, Simonton, Truman Smith, Stanley, Stuart, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, John B. Thompson, Tillinghast, Tolland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Winthrop—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sam'l H. Butler, Carr, Carroll, Chapman, Chittenden, Clifford, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Thomas, Turney, Vanderpoel, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, C. H. Williams, and Worthington—100.

And so the House refused to print the papers relating to the subject.

The question then recurred on printing the report of the committee.

Mr. TILLINGHAST said at this stage he would make a motion that had precedence of the previous question. He moved to lay the motion to print on the table. He did so that there might be an opportunity, before the report was ordered to be printed, to alter some particular expressions and one or two statements, which, with deference to the gentleman from South Carolina, he would, if his motion prevailed, point out for his consideration. If the alterations were made, he should have no objection to the printing.

The SPEAKER said the previous question had been ordered on the whole, and it was too late, after one part of the question had been taken, to move to lay on the table.

Mr. TILLINGHAST said he differed from the Chair, as this was not a divided question, but a separate question on each motion. However, he would not trouble the House with an appeal.

The question was then put by yeas and nays, and carried—yeas 103, nays 63, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Anderson, Ather-ton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. So the report was ordered to be printed, and then on motion

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, February 15, 1811.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, he had received a memorial from Parkesburg, in the State of Pennsylvania, which he would now take leave to present. It was signed by a number of respectable citizens of Pennsylvania, and stated, in strong terms, the defenceless condition of our maritime cities on the seaboard, and the impending danger of a foreign war; and urged Congress to make appropriations for the armament of our fortifications, the building of floating batteries for the defence of our harbors, and the construction of twenty of the first class of steam frigates; and as many more smaller steam vessels.

The memorial was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. B. also presented a memorial of a number of captains, pilots, and engineers, of the city of Pittsburg, remonstrating against the passage of any law by Congress, compelling the use of Raub's safety valves; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial of citizens of Oneida county, remonstrating against the passage of any bankrupt law retroactive in its provisions; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. also presented the memorial of James A. Macdonald, praying for an increase of pension; and, also, a memorial of a large number of citizens of the county of Saratoga, uniting in the prayer of the petitioner; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LINN said at the last and present sessions of Congress, memorials had been presented from persons who termed themselves Mormons or Latter Day Saints, complaining of the State of Missouri, and extracts from these memorials had been published and widely circulated, which were calculated to injure the character of the State which he had the honor in part to represent, in the minds of those who were not acquainted with the facts. He held in his hand a transcript of all the legal proceedings which had been had in this case, and in order that the Senate and the country might be acquainted with the facts, he would present them to the Senate, and move for their printing. The document was accordingly ordered to be printed.

Mr. PORTER presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of Michigan respecting the boundary line between that State and the Territory of Wisconsin; which were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. P. also presented the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Wisconsin, praying that the right of pre-emption may be extended to settlers on the lands reserved for the Rock river and Milwaukee canals; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. P. also presented a memorial of the same body, asking authority to dispose of the sixteenth sections, for the purpose of creating a school fund; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. P. also presented the memorial of the same body, praying that the right of pre-emption may be extended to settlers on the mineral lands; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUNTINGTON presented the memorial of the Presbytery of Buffalo, praying that the treaty with the Seneca Indians may not be carried into effect; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. STURGEON presented two memorials, signed by eight or nine hundred citizens of Philadelphia, praying an appropriation for the erection of a new custom house in Philadelphia; which, as the subject had been reported upon, were laid upon the table.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of Eleazer McCoy; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. L. also presented a memorial of several hundred citizens of St. Louis, praying a repeal of the naturalization laws; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. L. also presented the petition of Welcome A. Robbins and Thaddeus Robbins; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Louisiana, in favor of placing buoys at the several passes of the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. N. also presented the memorial of the Mexican Gulf Railway Company, praying the right of way through the public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PIERCE presented the memorial of Jeremiah Bartlett; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KING, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Catharine E. Clitherall; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, the papers in the case of Ezekiel Jones were permitted to be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

On motion by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the papers in the case of Abel Pennington were permitted to be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

The bill from the House to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same," passed the 18th day of April, 1806, was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill from the House to continue in force the act for the payment of horses and other property lost in the military service of the United States, was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to whom the subject had been referred, reported a bill to confirm to that State the lands selected by her, in lieu of the lands covered by reservation in the treaties of 1837 and 1839 with the Miami Indians. The bill was ordered to a second reading; and the report and accompanying documents, on his motion, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill for the incorporation of the Washington City Benevolent Society, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which a memorial on the subject was referred, reported a bill for the relief of General Isaac Wellborn, of Alabama; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MERRICK presented a memorial from the corporate authorities of the city of Baltimore, praying an appropriation for the erection of a fortress on Soliers' Point Flats; to which Mr. M. called the particular attention of the Committee on Military Affairs, to which he moved its reference.

Mr. LINN said nearly every harbor in the country was in a similar position with that of Baltimore; and he thought it would be better to amend the motion of the Senator from Maryland, by referring, in connection with his memorial, the whole subject of our fortifications and defences to the Committee on Military Affairs. Not only our seaboard, but our whole Western frontier, and whole line of lakes, were completely defenceless. We have been for days and weeks discussing the propriety of giving away five millions of our revenue, when fifty millions could be profitably, and he would say economically, spent on our navy and fortifications.

After some remarks from Mr. MERRICK, Mr. FREYSON said that an early period they would have to address themselves to a full consideration of the entire subject of our national defences, and to incur some expense thereon; and they would have to come to the subject with more liberality than they had hitherto done. The whole system of naval warfare, and of coast defence, must undergo a radical revolution, the details of which would afford matter for serious consideration. It was matter of notoriety, that gigantic strides had been taken by England and the European powers in progressive improvements, both of the land and naval mode of warfare. Steam vessels had been increased, steam batteries had been introduced, and the science of throwing shells horizontally had been brought to great perfection, and therefore it became necessary that Congress should direct its attention to the subject that pace might be kept with foreign powers. In consequence of the advance made by the French and Russian Governments, British officers and British statesmen were engaged in newspaper and pamphlet discussions on this important subject, and propositions had already been made to the British Government to effect a profound change in the English system; and as in England great results were expected to be produced, it was the duty of statesmen here to mark those results, and to profit by them. He suggested the appointment of a special committee to take charge of the matter, for it was with him a question to what existing committee it could with propriety be referred, or to what department it belonged. The system to which resort must be had would be an entire new one, including both naval and military operations, but belonging exclusively to neither of those departments; and therefore, he should prefer the appointment of a new committee, charged with the special duty of investigating and reporting on this weighty matter, as well as on the general condition of the old system.

After some other observations, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill making appropriations for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensioners, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W. said as prompt action on the bill was of much importance, he would ask the consent of the Senate to take it up and dispose of it at the present time; which being agreed to, the bill was considered as in committee of the whole.

This bill was debated at some length by Messrs. SEVIER, LINN, PRESTON, PIERCE, BENTON, BUCHANAN, FULTON, CALHOUN, ANDERSON, and others, principally on a motion by Mr. SEVIER to strike out an appropriation of $100,000 for the settlement and transportation of the Seminoles, and thereby to effect a termination of the Florida war. Mr. SEVIER condemned this mode of purchasing peace with a handful of savages as impolitic, and as a temptation offered to the other Indian tribes to engage in a murderous and harassing war, for the purpose of procuring largesses from the Government. Ultimately, the ayes and noes were taken on the question of striking out; and they resulted as follows: ayes 6, noes 36.

Besides the cash appropriation of $5,000 each to two chiefs, and $30 to each warrior, to be paid out of the above mentioned sum of $100,000, on their surrendering for transportation, they were likewise to be furnished with a blanket and a gun on their arrival west of the Mississippi.

Mr. SEVIER suggested an amendment, so as to secure their transportation west of the State of Arkansas before they were furnished with fire arms; but ultimately it was so amended, in accordance with the spirit and intention of the entire proceeding, as to limit the delivery to the Indians of these articles on their arrival at their new home.

The amendments of the committee were concurred in by the Senate; and,

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, February 15, 1841.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the bill reported from the Committee on the Public Lands on the 6th of January, to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands with the same, passed the 18th day of April, 1806.'

The motion of Mr. TURNEY was pending to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking the question on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and noes were then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 94, noes 34.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. JAMESON moved the previous question; which was seconded.

And on the question, "Shall the main question be now put?" it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 113, noes 51.

The question now being on the main question,

Mr. L. WILLIAMS thereupon called for the yeas and noes; which were ordered, and were—yeas 136, noes 45, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William B. Campbell, Carr, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Cranston, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Cushing, John Davis, John W. Davis, Garrett Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Everett, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gentry, Gerry, Giddings, Green, Hall, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Henry, Hillen, Hubbard, Hunt, Jackson, James, Jameson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Kemble, Kille, Lane, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lincoln, Lowell, Lucas, McCarty, McClellan, McCulloch, Meredith Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Medill, Miller, Monroe, Montanya, Moore, Calvary Morris, Morrow, Naylor, Newhard, Nisbet, Osborne, Parrish, Farmer, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Pope, Prentiss, Proffit, Rariden, Reynolds, Rhet, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Simonon, Slade, Albert Smith, John Smith, Truman Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Philip F. Thomas, John B. Thompson, Toland, Triplett, Turney, Vanderpoel, Vroom, Warren, Watterson, Weller, Edward D. White, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Winthrop, and Wise—136.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Baker, Boardman, Briggs, Brockway, Bynum, Chittenden, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Edward Davies, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Doe, Edwards, Gates, Goggin, Graham, Griffin, Habersham, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Charles Johnston, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Kempshall, King, McClure, McKay, Montgomery, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Palen, Reed, Shepard, Stanly, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Underwood, Lewis Williams, and Worthington—45.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and take up the CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

On the question being taken to suspend the rules for that purpose, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 140, noes 33.

So the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BELL in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1841.

Mr. EVANS offered the following amendment, to come in after the 15th line:

"And the accounting officers are directed, in the settlement of the accounts of the contingent expenses of the Senate and House of Representatives, to credit the payment made in pursuance of the resolutions of the Senate of the 18th July, 1840, and the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st July, 1840."

Which amendment (after some conversation) was agreed to.

Mr. TILLINGHAST offered the following amendment:

"And nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize or sanction any contract for stationery or other articles for the use of the next Congress by any officer of the present Congress, to an amount exceeding, in the whole, $2,000."

After a few remarks from Messrs. TILLINGHAST and LINCOLN, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANDREWS moved to strike out the following:

"For salary of the Secretary to sign patents for public lands, per act of March second, eighteen hundred and thirty three, fifteen hundred dollars."

Mr. JONES of Virginia hoped the gentleman would not persist in his motion. It would be recollected that the very large number of patents, generally from seventy to eighty thousand a year, rendered it absolutely necessary that the duty should be preferred by a Secretary. Every gentleman must know that the time of the President was occupied so much in more important business, that it would be impossible for him to attend to this laborious duty.

Mr. LINCOLN asked leave to call the attention of the committee to a few important facts. Mr. L. then proceeded to state that the law relating to the issuing of land patents had not been complied with; and that there had not been, since 1836, a patent issued which was valid. The law required that the name of the President of the United States should be affixed to each patent, but the Secretary, instead of writing the name of the President, as his attorney, had, contrary to law, signed his own name. He, Mr. L. admitted that the duty was now too laborious for the President to attend personally, and would oppose the motion to strike out. But it was the intention of the law that the Secretary should do what an attorney did, viz: not sign his own name, but the name of the principal under whom, and for whom, he was acting.

Mr. L. also adverted to a similar non-compliance with the statute by the Commissioner of the Land Office, so that he was fully convinced that not one of the patents granted for the last four years would stand the test of judicial scrutiny. In consideration of these facts, he gave notice that at the first opportunity he would introduce a bill for giving legal sanction to these patents.

Mr. L. then alluded to a controversy now pending between the Commissioner and Recorder of the General Land Office. He did not know that those gentlemen, although so close together, were on speaking terms, from the lengthy correspondence which had taken place between them, and which had been presented to the Committee on Public Lands. He (Mr. L.) was sure that if the time consumed in this correspondence between persons in the same building, had been devoted to the patents, there would not have been at this time so many thousands in an unprepared state.

Mr. JONES of Virginia, in reply to a question by Mr. ANDREWS, called that gentleman's attention to the fact that this office had been provided for by an act subsequent to that of 1833, namely, by an act passed in July, 1836.

Mr. ANDREWS then moved that the phraseology of the item be changed, so as to give the correct date of the act; which amendment was agreed to.

And the question recurring on the motion to strike out—

The amendment was discussed by Messrs. ANDREWS, ADAMS, JONES of Virginia, LINCOLN, A. SMITH, CRARY, and MASON of Ohio. After which,

Mr. ANDREWS, to save the time which, he said, he foresaw would be consumed if the debate went on, withdrew the amendment.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved to amend the item "for compensation to the clerks in the office of the Fifth Auditor, $2,800," by reducing the amount to $8,800.

A very long debate followed in which Messrs. VANDERPOEL, MORGAN, GRAVES, JONES of Va. EVANS, A. SMITH, MONROE, UNDERWOOD, WISE, PETRIKIN, TILLINGHAST, L. WILLIAMS, STANLY, PROFFIT, W. THOMPSON, HUBBARD, and DAVIS of Kentucky, participated.

BY BLAIR & RIVES.

—WEEKLY—

PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

Mr. VANDERPOEL withdrew the amendment.

Mr. STANLY moved to strike out the item "for compensation to the Solicitor of the Treasury, three thousand five hundred dollars."

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved to strike a thousand dollars from the appropriation for clerks in the office of the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury, and as a reason for it stated that he had, that morning, been informed that there was a vacancy in one of the clerkships of the office of the Fifth Auditor, (Mr. Pleasanton;) that the proposed appropriation, which he wanted to reduce, covered the salary of this clerk, ($1,000;) that he understood Mr. Pleasanton declined to fill up the vacancy till after the fourth of March. Now, he, Mr. V. thought if he could dispense with the services of this clerk during the session of Congress, when the business of all the Departments was more pressing, he could get along without such clerk after the fourth of March. For that reason, he moved to strike out $1,000 from the proposed appropriation.

Here Messrs. STANLY, GRAVES, PROFFIT, and others severally attacked Mr. VANDERPOEL for so suddenly becoming a reformer.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said, when he made his proposition to reduce the appropriation for the Fifth Auditor of $1,000, he surely did not intend to disturb the equanimity of the gentleman on the other side, nor did he intend, thereby, to assume the character of reformer-master-general. He had never been ambitious to secure the honors of that office. It seemed that gentlemen doubted his (Mr. V.) right to propose any reform or reduction in any quarter; that they ran away with the idea, that the glory of this great and patriotic work belonged exclusively to themselves. Sir, (said Mr. V.) we mean to try the sincerity of your preachings and professions for the last two years. "Harrison and reform" were the watchwords with which you entered upon and carried through the great contest which has just terminated, and now we mean to try whether you are willing to practise according to your promise and professions. The speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT] was pretty strong evidence how the bulk of the dominant party intended to go upon propositions to reduce salaries, and enormous incomes from certain offices. He had already, in advance, applied the sponge of ridicule to a proposition in the bill, to reduce, to a fixed amount, the emoluments of district attorneys, marshals, and clerks of courts. Gentlemen, said Mr. V. this will not do. You must not refuse to do good, because the proposition originates on our side of the House. You say, "wait till General Harrison gets into power, and then we will accomplish these works of reform." No. We will not rely upon your promises. You will then have more magnificent objects to accomplish. Your attentions will then be engrossed with the making a huge National Bank, with the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, with the repeal of the Sub-treasury law, and the modification, if not the increase of the tariff. We are afraid that these little matters of "reduction" will then be beneath your notice. The immense incomes of some of your collectors, postmasters, district attorneys and marshals, which, before the late election, had so long disturbed your slumbers, will not then, we fear, receive from you even a passing notice. You tell us that our patriotism comes too late; that we ought to have made these movements when we had the power. To this, we answer, that it is never too late to do good. Besides, we have no reason to suppose, when we recollect how loud and deep have been your curses against our alleged "spoils" system, that the reductions we propose will not operate chiefly upon our own friends, the present incumbents of the offices. You have preached too constantly, and too emphatically, from this text, to justify on our part the apprehension that "turn out" is low to be the order of the day.

We say now is the time, the accepted time, for doing the good work. We are convened here, during a sort of interregnum, when one Administration is about going out, and another is about to come in, just before the gain of the victors is consummated by actual possession, and now is the time for doing good. You shall not escape responsibility by urging the plea that it will be time enough to begin the work of reform, after you shall have actually entered upon the possession of your new estate. We mean to hold you to the maxim that the present time is always the best time for doing good.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] had referred to the course he (Mr. V.) had taken last year, upon the proposition made by that gentleman to strike out the appropriation of an outfit for Mr. Throop, as Charge to Naples. He had opposed the motion of that gentleman, and he gloried in it. If Mr. Throop, as naval officer at New York, had neglected his duty—if that neglect had been established by an investigation wholly ex parte as to him, it was no good reason, to his mind, for withholding the compensation belonging to him in another office, to which he had been constitutionally appointed. If he had violated his duty as naval officer, (which he was by no means prepared to admit,) take the course prescribed by the Constitution—impeach him; but, in the name of justice and the Constitution, do not attempt to exercise your impeaching power in this oppressive and unconstitutional manner.

After some brief remarks from Messrs. A. SMITH, UNDERWOOD, HUBBARD, and others, Mr. VANDERPOEL, at the suggestion of his friends, withdrew the amendment.

Mr. STANLY moved to strike out the item "for compensation to the Solicitor of the Treasury, $3,500," and made some remarks thereon, the purport of which will be ascertained by the replies of Messrs. VANDERPOEL and WELLER.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that he had not now for the first time on this floor been charged with having been a Federalist. Though that note had so often been struck by others, who had honored him with their notice, he had never before deigned to make any reply to it, because of a lesson he had been taught when very young—never to speak of himself when he could possibly avoid doing so. His own course in early life had so little connection with our deliberations here, that he surely could not, gratuitously, allude to it, without incurring the imputation of egotism; but the charge of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] must plead his apology for now breaking the silence in regard to himself which he generally preferred maintaining. If (said Mr. V.) the friends and family of the member who now addresses you were, originally, tainted with the sin of Federalism, and if his own young mind had in his early youth received the impress of those principles; if he had afterwards, with more matured judgment, come to the conclusion, that the principles of Federalism were opposed to the best interests of the people, had repudiated his first notions, and labored for fourteen long years (double the period that the Patriarch labored for his wife) in the good old cause of Democracy, he was willing, if Democracy were the test of political orthodoxy, to compete for the honor of the true faith, with a gentleman who persisted and persisted in his Federalism against the lights and the evidences that had now become so palpable and accumulated.

He, Mr. V. if ever obnoxious to the charge of Federalism (which he much doubted) was surely not an "old Federalist." He never attained his majority till some time after a memorable event in the political history of the State to which he belonged. He alluded to the address of forty arrogant leaders of the Federal party, sometimes distinguished as forty "high minded gentlemen; at other times more familiarly, if not appropriately designated as the "forty thieves," a address by which they proclaimed the dissolution of the Federal party, and it was in order here to remark, that all the survivors of these "high minded" gentlemen, with, as he believed, but a single exception, had returned to their first love and were most ardent and genuine British Bank Whigs of 1840. The first vote he ever gave was for Mr. Clinton for Governor; and if that constituted him a Federalist, then were some of the most prominent actors in the ranks of the New York Democracy Federalists. He would go further, and say that if, from the days of his minority, uniform opposition to a high protective tariff—to a National Bank—to a latitudinarian construction of the Constitution—constituted the antipodes of Federalism then had he never been a Federalist, but had always been a Democrat.

[Mr. STANLY remarked, he did not reproach Mr. V. for having been a Federalist, but had complimented him with showing some good traits in consequence of it.]

Mr. V. said, that the gentleman from North Carolina had also stated, that he, Mr. V. had in a speech made some days ago on the Treasury Note bill, complimented, in high terms, the speech of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] on the same subject, and had rather insinuated, that he had thus spoken in praise of the gentleman's speech, for the purpose of catching him.

Mr. STANLY explained, and said that he had insinuated nothing of the kind; that it was not his practice to "insinuate," but always to state very plainly what he meant.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he it so: then he would in anticipation repel the inference, that in the praise he had expressed of that gentleman's speech, he was or could have been actuated by the hope of "catching" him. He was not aware that he had indulged in any thing like fulsome panegyric in regard to that gentleman's speech. He had said, and would here repeat, that those portions of his speech which related to the subjects of distribution, tariff, and the proposition to impose immediate duties on silk and wines, were unanswerable, and yet unanswered; that they were distinguished by great power and ability, and that his argument against distribution was more urgent and complete, than was that of a eminent Senator at the other end of the Capitol [Mr. CALHOUN,] distinguished as he was for close logic and power of condensation. Now this was what he thought of that gentleman's speech, and he had not expressed his sense of it on a former occasion with the vain hope of "catching" him. He knew his subject too well to have been capable of indulging any such idle hope. Could he ever have entertained it, he would first have suffered no little embarrassment in his own mind as to the most eligible means to attain his object—whether the cat-o-nine-tails, or more emollient means would be most available. A moment's reflection—the mere recollection of that gentleman's high spirit, would teach him that the first of the above alternative would be worse than useless. Here, then, would have been a puzzler at the outset. But, suppose this preliminary difficulty to have been overcome; the next question he would have mooted in his mind would have been, whether, after getting him, we had any guarantee that we could keep him, or that he would prove to be worth any thing to us whether it might not turn out that we had caught a Tartar.

Mr. V. said, that he and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] entered Congress together in December, 1833, and from that day had watched, with no little interest, his brilliant and erratic career. You and I, Mr. Chairman [Mr. BELL,] well recollect the maiden effort of that gentleman on this floor, upon the great question of the removal of the public deposits. You and I sat together during that protracted session, and cador requires me to say that, with my knowledge of your great ability, I thought you a little too taciturn for the times. I say, sir, that we heard this first and most extraordinary and characteristic effort of the distinguished gentleman from Virginia. He and I, sir, were both young men, and were for weeks competitors for the floor. He at length succeeded in getting it. The fact that he was elected a Jackson man, and was a young man of genius and great promise, had preceded his advent here. I had learned too, that he had manifested some little rebellious symptoms, and therefore waited for his speech with an anxiety commingled with somewhat of fear. He delivered it, sir; and such a speech!! There was never anything like it "in the heavens above, or in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth." It was truly sui generis. At its close, it would have been very difficult to state an account of profit and loss to either party. Both were well belabored; one received a box aside the ear, while the other was saluted with a kick or a thump in the body. He had, then, known the gentleman from Virginia too long and too well to be weak enough ever to attempt to "catch" him, at least without first well deliberating as to the best means to be employed, and the value of the end to be attained.

After Mr. V. had concluded his remarks, he said he owed an explanation to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY.] It had been whispered that he had alluded to that gentleman as seeking office. Mr. V. said he had no right to say; he had never heard from any quarter, that that gentleman was seeking office. When he spoke about office seekers, he had merely drawn a fancy sketch, and did not, at the time, think it would give umbrage. He had no evidence, direct or hearsay, that that gentleman wanted or sought office—much less the office of Solicitor of the Treasury.

After some remarks from Messrs. MORGAN, WISE, and others,

Mr. WELLER said he had not risen to participate in the irrelevant debate now going on, but simply to say a word in relation to a remark made by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY.] He said he regretted very much that that gentleman had seen proper to assail a public officer, and denounce him as an "incompetent wretch," when he admitted that he had no personal acquaintance with him, and his only fault seemed to be that he had franked speeches or documents into North Carolina. Mr. W. said he was personally acquainted with the Solicitor of the Treasury, (Mr. Burchard) and knew him to be as high minded and honorable a man as any member on this floor.

Mr. STANLY said, having no acquaintance with the Solicitor, he made the remark in general terms, and did not assail him personally.

Mr. WELLER continued. The gentleman from North Carolina had spoken of the conduct of the Solicitor, and said he hoped such "incompetent wretches" would not be retained in office by the next Administration. If the remark was not applied personally to the Solicitor, then, sir, (said Mr. W.) I confess I do not understand the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. STANLY replied that he said the Solicitor had franked speeches of incompetent wretches into North Carolina. This, said he, was my expression.

Mr. WELLER resumed. He had perhaps misunderstood the gentleman. If (said Mr. W.) we have to appoint a committee to investigate the subject of franking, no doubt it would be found that many honorable gentlemen on this floor had used the franking privilege to a much greater extent than this officer. He said he had no doubt many abuses of this privilege had been committed by gentlemen on this floor, who were at the time receiving eight dollars per day from the public Treasury. I do not (said Mr. W.) complain of gentlemen for franking speeches, &c. to their constituents; for I have, said he, exercised the right freely myself, and shall continue to do it as long as I have a seat here; but, sir, the law confers on the Solicitor the same privilege, and he has a right to frank what documents he pleases, either into the gentleman's State or any where else.

The Whig Executive Committee, composed of members of Congress, remained here during the whole of last summer, and franked speeches and circulars and addresses all over the country. The State, said Mr. W. which I have the honor in part to represent, was literally shingled over with them. If the documents sent by the Solicitor, about which the gentleman from North Carolina complains, were of a lower character than those sent out by the Executive Committee, then, said Mr. W. they must have been dirty stuff indeed. But, said Mr. W. if the gentleman from North Carolina can show that this officer has neglected the duties enjoined upon him by law, then, sir, I would be the last man on this floor to defend him. If, however, said he, he has at all times discharged his official duties faithfully, then, sir, if he has seen proper, in his leisure hours, to frank a few documents, gentlemen have no right to complain—surely they will not claim the right to dictate the manner in which he shall spend his leisure time, or the sort of documents he shall send out, when he sees proper to exercise the franking privilege which the law confers on him.

Mr. W. said he had simply risen to remove the impression which the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina were calculated to make on those who were unacquainted with Mr. Burchard. He (Mr. W.) knew that man well; and a more efficient public officer could not be found, nor a more honorable and upright man. Thus much (said Mr. W.) I have felt it necessary to say, in justice to an officer who comes from my own State, and whose character at home is above suspicion in every respect.

Mr. WISE, after some preliminary remarks, observed that if deviating a little from both parties, and acting on an independent ground, was "erratic," that in the language of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] he was "erratic."

Mr. W. went on to say that he feared a great many of the Whig party who had hitherto been crying against the "spoils" system with so much earnestness, were now going for the "spoils" themselves. But he took this opportunity to give them notice, that if such should prove the case, he would lash them as he had done others. He stood now as he had always stood. He stood precisely the same as he did before the election, and at the election. He was a Whig then, and a Whig now, and he would take the occasion to say that neither sugar nor salt could catch him in acting contrary to his conscience.

After some further remarks, Mr. W. went on to say that it was time for the Whig party to go back to the good old principles, and to take a fresh start; but whenever they stepped aside, either to the right or to the left, they might be assured that they would find him "erratic."

All who know him, knew that it was not for men, but principles for which he went. He hoped that General Harrison when in power, would act for himself, and not suffer himself to be led into measures, for the benefit of sections only; but that he would be a second Washington, and act for the whole country.

Mr. W. after some observations on the tyranny of party drill, said he would give notice that if they (his Whig friends) attempted to bring down upon him the tyranny of party, he would resist it, as he had before resisted it in the time of Jackson. And on the other hand, continued he, so long as I hold a seat on this floor, I give notice that if they offer me a "principality" even, they cannot catch me. So long as I am a member of Congress, they will not appoint me to office. I ask for nothing, and I will take nothing. Further, whether in Congress or out of Congress, I will not beg for office; nor will I ask my friends to beg for me. I am free, and will continue to be free. I am now where I have always stood, and where I shall continue to stand. I tell you I can go with neither party contrary to the dictates of my conscience. I will be free as air; free as the eagle, soaring above the trammels of party; and like the eagle I will look down upon you independent and alone.

Mr. W. proceeded to say that he would not, in the political wars of the country, be drilled in the political camp as they were in the military camp.

He wished here to say, also, that all the castigations of a Whig Editor at Richmond would not drive him into drill.

If, continued Mr. W. I fight, I shall fight after the fashion of the old fellow at Yorktown, who, with a long, old fashioned fowling piece, a cow's horn full of powder, and a broad brimmed hat, kept loading and firing, bringing down at every discharge one of the enemy, and being under neither drill sergeant nor captain.

Seeing the bravery of the old fellow, one would step up to him and accost him:

"I say my friend, what company do you belong to?"

"Be quiet, you bother me; don't you see I am busy?"

Presently another would address the old fellow with—

"Hallow, there, to what regiment do you belong?"

"Don't bother me; I belong to no company, nor regiment neither; I am fighting against the British, and on my own hook."

Mr. W. then proceeded to explain that he was precisely in the same position with the old man at Yorktown, viz: fighting in the political battle, on his own hook. He neither belonged to any of their little companies, or to the regular army. But still he was ready to fight the enemy and to do battle with the red coats, like the old man at Yorktown, with an honest heart and without bouny. If, however, gentlemen would join his "erratic" army, he then would become a regular. Did gentlemen understand him now? He begged to assure them he was still a Whig, and would fight against the British, taking as good aim as any of them.

Mr. JENIFER here took the floor and expressed his intention to reply.

Mr. ANDREWS rose to a point of order. He hoped the CHAIR would not suffer the debate to take any longer such a course.

The CHAIR said, the whole debate had been "erratic," but as the gentleman from Virginia had risen to make a personal explanation, he conceived the usual courtesy observed on such occasions, warranted the CHAIR in permitting it thus far.

Mr. JENIFER then proceeded, but spoke in so low a tone that he could not be heard but at intervals. He was understood to allude to the recent course of Mr. WISE and his colleague [Mr. MALLORY.] He also made some observations in relation of certain gentlemen taking the "back track."

Mr. WISE said, as the gentleman from Maryland appeared to be the drill sergeant of the party, he would ask him if he had found out the opinions of all his Whig friends on the floor. Would the gentleman be kind enough to tell him whether he had ascertained the opinions of any of his Whig friends, except his (Mr. W's) and the gentleman from the Norfolk district [Mr. MALLORY?]

Mr. JENIFER said he possessed no more information as to the opinions of his Whig friends than the gentleman himself.

Mr. ANDREWS called both the gentlemen from Maryland and Virginia to order, on the ground of irrelevancy.

Mr. GRAVES hoped that the debate would proceed, until the position of Mr. WISE should be fully understood.

The CHAIR hoped the good sense of the gentlemen would enable them to see that the debate had assumed an improper latitude.

After some discussion of a conversational character on the point order,

Mr. JENIFER, on leave, resumed his remarks. He proceeded to say that the commanding attitude that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] held through the country, rendered it highly important that his true position should be known. The gentleman, in his recent three days' speech, notwithstanding the doctrines advanced, had still avowed that he was a Whig. But he, Mr. J. would tell the gentleman that when an individual avowed certain doctrines, it was not for that individual to say whether he was a Whig or not. It was for the country to determine, after the avowal of those doctrines, what he was.

After some further remarks, Mr. J. in reply to a question from Mr. WISE, said, I ask the gentleman to lay his finger up in any one portion of his three days' speech, which was not satisfactory to the Administration party now in power.

Mr. WISE replied that when the speech should have been printed, he would then show many points where no Loco Foco would agree with him.

Mr. JENIFER understood the gentleman to have said that he had pleased some of both parties. Now he desired to know how the gentleman did stand, or whether he was in a state of betweenness.

Mr. WISE said he did not stand in a state of betweenness; he was a Whig. But he did not choose to be driven out of the ranks by gentlemen who assumed to speak for the coming Administration, before they knew what the measures of that Administration would be. Perhaps, when the measures of that Administration should be made known, he would have as much power to unchurch certain gentlemen, as they supposed themselves to possess.

Mr. W. then proceeded to denounce the idea of having so many "little Harrisons" in the House, dictating and speaking for the coming Administration, when it could not be known what the measures of that Administration would be. He (Mr. W.) had been dragged into this discussion by the remarks on his course by the Whig papers on one hand, and the Loco Foco papers on the other. He wished merely to assert that the friends of General Harrison were not all of one mind as to the measures proper to be pursued; and this being the case, he denounced the idea of any one section setting themselves up as the party. Mr. W. concluded by again asking Mr. JENIFER if he had sounded all his Whig friends.

Mr. JENIFER said he did not speak for either General Harrison, or any body besides himself, on that floor. Mr. J. then proceeded to notice the following remark of Mr. WISE, viz: "that if any man attempted to bring down the tyranny of party on him, he should be lashed, etc." Now he, Mr. J. desired to know if the gentleman meant to say that any party drill had been attempted to be exercised against him here. If so, let him point it out.

Mr. WISE, (across) I point it out now; I refer to you.

Mr. JENIFER said the gentleman in the course of his remarks, had intimated that he was resolved to fight on his own hook. But he would remind him, that people were sometimes hung on their own hook. Mr. J. then went on to argue that the course taken by Mr. WISE was calculated to bring distrust upon the coming Administration.

After some explanation from Mr. WISE, in which he disclaimed any design to bring distrust upon the coming Administration, or that he had made any charge against it,

Mr. JENIFER said he was happy to hear that the gentleman disavowed charging any thing against the coming Administration. But at the same time, he would ask that gentleman whether it would not be more manly to make direct charges than to pursue the course he had? Mr. J. was understood further to say, that if the gentleman did not distrust the coming Administration, why was all this cry about the danger of a high protective tariff? When the gentleman spoke about the "spoils," the "lash," etc. what did he mean, if he did not distrust the Administration? Why this denunciation, if there was no objection? When the gentleman said he could not support the coming Administration unless it should agree with his views, did he go beyond any other Whig? The gentleman had thought proper to make a speech in advance, to show the ruinous effects of an extra session, and the danger of adopting measures when the Representatives came fresh from the people, under the influence of triumphant feelings. He, Mr. J. considered that it was safer to legislate when the Representatives came fresh from the people.

Mr. WISE here rose to explain.

Mr. ANDREWS called him to order. In his opinion, the debate ought not to be suffered to proceed any further.

Several members called Mr. ANDREWS to order, on the ground that he had called Mr. WISE to order before that gentleman had said any thing.

Mr. WISE said he had risen to make a sweeping declaration, viz: that the gentleman from Maryland had not stated correctly a single position he (Mr. W.) had taken the other day.

Mr. ANDREWS. There! he has said something now, and I call him to order on the ground of irrelevancy.

After some conversation on the point of order,

Mr. WISE, on leave, proceeded, and denied that he had ever said he anticipated all would be wrong in the coming Administration, as charged by the gentleman from Maryland. He said no such thing. On the contrary, he believed that all would be right.

After some further remarks, Mr. W. said, he did say, however, that some gentlemen were trying to swerve the Administration from its course, and he meant the gentleman from Maryland as one of them, for, continued Mr. W. every mite goes to make a man's.

Mr. W. went on to say, that as he had found gentlemen actively engaged in manufacturing public opinion in advance, as the sentiments of the Whig party, he thought it high time that he should speak, lest his silence might be construed into acquiescence. And when certain sentiments were held forth, in relation to the tariff, the distribution system, &c. he had taken the liberty of saying that, as one of the Whig party, they were not his sentiments.

After some further observations as to his views on the tariff question, Mr. W. expressed his repugnance to any set of Whigs undertaking to manufacture public opinion, before the new Administration came into power.

But said, Mr. W. the gentleman from Maryland has said that it would be a little more manly for me to come out, etc. Now, all I have to say is, that the gentleman is about thirty years older than I am, yet he cannot teach me manliness. Mr. W. said if the gentleman would lop off a little of his Federalism, he would go with him as far as he could, but in the first place it would be necessary to see how far they could go, as he expected to go with the gentleman in a variety of matters.

Mr. W. then stated that he was in favor of economy and retrenchment in the expenses of Government; against appropriations for internal improvements, etc.

Mr. JENIFER was understood to say that he differed.

After some further explanation between the gentlemen as to their views,

Mr. WISE said, but the gentleman contends that because I do not go for a distribution and a tariff, that I am no Whig.

Mr. JENIFER. I said no such thing. I said — (the remainder of the sentence was not heard.)

Mr. WISE. Well, that is precisely the same thing. It amounts to this, that unless I vote for a tariff on luxuries, I am no Whig. But my constituents will see my politics on that subject when my speech is printed. Mr. W. went on to say that if other gentlemen had not defined their position, and spoke for the coming Administration, he would not have said a word. He wished merely to have it understood, that the friends of the coming Administration differed in their views on certain matters. But for doing this, said Mr. W. the gentleman from Maryland has taken me in hand, with my colleague from the Norfolk district. There are some whose intellects are so dull that they cannot understand; while there are others who will not understand. But my friend from Maryland is, I know, an intelligent gentleman, and I cannot suppose that he is one of those who are not willing to understand. I hope I am not in the way of my friend from Maryland, and that it is his wish to put me out of the way. I hope it is neither the object of that gentleman, nor others, to put me out of the way.

Now, said Mr. W. in order that my friend from Maryland may understand me fully, I will tell him that I do not intend to stand in his way; and if he wishes to go to Europe to attend to the tobacco interest, I assure that I do not want to go. If any of my Whig friends supposes that I am in his or their way, they may dispel their fears, for I assure them I shall be in the way of none of them.

Mr. W. then proceeded to say, that neither he nor his constituents should ever be brought under the drill of party. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] had, in the course of his speech, thought proper to be very witty, and to say, that "it sometimes happened that gentlemen who fought on their own hook, were hung on their own hook." Now, he, Mr. W. would say, in reply, that some gentlemen were never hung at all.

The gentleman from Maryland has also said that he speaks for nobody but himself. He said, however, almost in the same breath, that if I took the ground I did against a protective tariff, etc. I differed from all the Whig party, with the exception of the gentleman from the Norfolk District. Now, here he has undertaken to speak for all the Whigs but two and a half; for my colleague from the Norfolk District counts one, and I and my friend from Maryland compose the remaining one and a half.

But, continued Mr. W. I tell the gentleman from Maryland that on the question of the distribution and the tariff, he has found more than two and a half. Where is the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. ARFORD?] Did he not give his views the other day in sufficiently plain terms for the gentleman? Now, although my friend from Maryland took me to task on the score of "manliness," I take it for granted that he will admit the gentleman from Georgia to be a whole man.

But, said Mr. W. the gentleman from Maryland has asked me where is the tyranny of party? Why, there it is, (pointing to Mr. JENIFER) there is the drill sergeant himself. He took me into his hands, and one of my best friends from Kentucky [Mr. GRAVES] undertook to help.

Mr. GRAVES explained.

Mr. WISE went on to say that he would make gentlemen understand him before he had done. He had said that he would not be brought under party drill, and whenever it should be attempted, he would resist it. It had now been attempted, and he now resisted it. The party drill had already commenced, but he would not submit to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Tennessee made some observations in relation to imputations on the Whig party.

Mr. WISE said he had made no imputations on the Whig party. He would further say, that he acknowledged no gentleman there as the Whig party.

After some further discussion of a conversational character.

Mr. WISE went on to say that he did not acknowledge the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] as the Whig party. And (said Mr. W.) I tell the gentleman from Maryland that if his tyranny is all I have to resist, I can soon overcome it.

Mr. W. proceeded to say that none other of his Whig friends had attempted to subject him to party drill, but that the Whig papers had attempted it.

But, said Mr. W. even if it were my design to separate from the party, it would be a question with me whether honesty lies on the side of those in power, or on the side of those out of power. But I wish it to be understood at home and elsewhere, that I spurn the attempt to unchurch me, whether insidiously or openly, directly or indirectly. If any one is to hold the sword over my head, the General himself shall do it, but no drill sergeant shall.

Mr. JENIFER was understood to ask if there was any thing personal intended by the above remarks.

Mr. WISE disclaimed any personal allusion in applying the term "drill sergeant," but, said he, I will tell the gentleman from Maryland, that if he attempts to whip me into the ranks, he will find me as difficult to drive as the Irishman's pig. The gentleman will no doubt remember the story.

An Irishman was attempting to drive an obstinate pig.

"Arrah and Pat," said a friend, "where is it that yourself is a going?"

"Hush, honey, my dear," said the driver, "it's to Cork I am going, sure; but for the blood o'ye spake soft, or the pig will hear!"

After an application of the above to his political course, and the absurdity of any attempt to drive him, Mr. W. said his position was based on high principles, and not men; and on those principles he was ready to stand or fall.

Mr. WISE addressed the committee at great length in regard to his position; after which,

Mr. STANLY withdrew the motion to strike out.

Mr. JENIFER renewed it; and proceeded to reply to the remarks of Mr. WISE; and had spoken for a few minutes,

When Mr. ANDREWS insisted on the point of order, that the whole debate, being irrelevant, was out of order.

And the CHAIR decided it to be so.

Mr. GRAVES hoped the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] would be allowed to go on, until the House thoroughly understood the position of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.]

After some conversation, Mr. WELLER moved that the gentleman from Maryland have leave to proceed.

Mr. ANDREWS asked for tellers, that it might be seen who were in favor of going on with the business of the country, and who in favor of continuing this irrelevant and useless debate.

But the call for tellers was not seconded.

And the question being taken, leave to proceed was granted without a division.

Mr. JENIFER then proceeded, yielding the floor to occasional explanations from Mr. WISE. Mr. JENIFER having closed—

Mr. WISE took the floor, and, leave having been given to him to proceed, replied to Mr. JENIFER. Mr. WISE having concluded—

Mr. GRAVES next addressed the committee, and was followed by Mr. POPE and Mr. ANDREWS, until half past six o'clock, when the committee rose.

And then, at the instance of Mr. LINCOLN,

The SPEAKER laid before the House the report from the Secretary of the Secretary of the form in which patents for the public lands have been executed. The report was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, to the end that the committee may inquire into the legality of the patents heretofore issued, and, if they are found defective, to report a bill to legalize them.

And then the House adjourned.

While the House was in Committee of the Whole, the bill making appropriations for the payment of pensions during the year 1841, and providing for the expense of removing such Seminole Indians as may be disposed to emigrate to the West, was received from the Senate with an immaterial amendment, which the House immediately considered and agreed to.

And so the bill has passed both Houses of Congress.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, February 16, 1841.

Mr. CUTHBERT appeared and took his seat in the Senate this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted a report from the Secretary of War in reply to a resolution of the Senate of the 17th December last, respecting the sale of machinery engaged in the construction of roads and harbors; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT also presented several memorials from citizens of Florida, remonstrating against the cession of any portion of that Territory to the Seminoles; which were severally referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. FULTON presented the petition of citizens of Arkansas, praying the establishment of a post route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. TAPPAN presented a memorial of David Robb; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the House to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same;" reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. W. said as the bill was nearly the same as that passed at previous sessions—the only difference being that it was less favorable to the State of Tennessee than the former bill—he hoped the Senate would now order it to a third reading.

Mr. GRAHAM wished to look into the bill before its passage, and hoped it would be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama suggested that it might be ordered to a third reading to-day, and as the question on its passage would not come up until to-morrow, the Senator in the meanwhile could examine the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM said, he was informed by a friend near him, [Mr. HUNTINGTON,] that the bill could not then be amended; and he would therefore prefer that its further consideration should be postponed until to-morrow; which was accordingly ordered.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the memorial of William G. Cheever, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, reported a bill giving authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle the accounts between the United States and David Gelston, formerly collector of the port of New York; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. H. also from the committee, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Caroline E. Clitherall, widow of Dr. George C. Clitherall, late a surgeon on the army of the Revolution, reported the same, without amendment.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Daniel Platt, deceased; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill making appropriations to complete certain military roads leading to the frontier posts bordering on Texas and the Indian Territory, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Esther Johnson, widow of Col. Jonas Johnson of North Carolina, deceased; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the map of the country west of the Mississippi, made under the direction of the War Department by J. N. Nicollet, esq. and the report in reference to the same, be printed for the use of Congress, under the direction of the chief of the Corps of Topographical Engineers, and that two hundred copies thereof be delivered to the War Department, and to the bureau of Topographical Engineers, for distribution, and three hundred additional copies for the use of the Senate.

Mr. WALKER said the report of Mr. Nicollet and accompanying map of the region of the Upper Mississippi, prepared under the direction of Congress, and the supervision of the Department of War, would be found among the most accurate, scientific, interesting, and instructive, ever made in this country. It commences at the city of St. Louis, as its southeastern point of departure, and terminates at our northern boundary, east of the Rocky Mountains, extending from the 39th to the 49th parallel of north latitude, and from 90 to 100 of longitude west of Greenwich. Stretching from near Lake Superior on the east to the great western bend of the Missouri river on the west, and embracing the entire basin of the Upper Mississippi, it included a region more extensive than several of the largest States of the Union. It was a region most salubrious, and unsurpassed in beauty and fertility. In mineral wealth, it was unequalled in the world, and was interspersed with timber and prairie lands, and many hundred lakes, both fresh and salt, that might well challenge a comparison with those of any other country. This survey embraces 245 geographical positions, deduced from more than ten thousand astronomical observations. An enlarged system of barometrical observations had been carried on for several years, in which Mr. Nicollet had been aided by many scientific gentleman; and by these means, the topographical features of the whole region, and its absolute elevation above the sea, will be represented with the greatest accuracy. The report will represent the geology and botany of this vast region, its vegetable and mineral resources. The report and map will be highly honorable to their unassuming but able and scientific author—to the country by whom he has been employed, and to the Secretary of War, who, with so much zeal and energy, has pressed forward this important work. The rivers Mississippi and Missouri, for several thousand miles, are surveyed and delineated with the greatest accuracy—with all their physical features and incidents—their banks, their hills and valleys, their channels, shoals, and sand bars, with the velocity of current and depth of water. To the emigrant, the farmer, the merchant and navigator—to the topographer and geographer—the botanist, the mineralogist and geologist—to the scholar and statesman, and to the whole country, this was a work of the highest importance. To the American patriot also, whose love of the Union embraced his whole country and all its parts, this report and survey would afford abundant materials for delightful contemplation and animated hopes, in marking the onward progress of this great nation. He would here, in this hitherto almost unexplored region of the West, behold a country larger than any empire in Europe, save one, where, in a very few years, there will be three new States, among the largest and most fertile in the Union—Wisconsin, Iowa, and another embracing the beautiful Fountain lake near our northern boundary, delineated on this map, where the great Mississippi commences its southern course to the Gulf. As a mere money question, the publication of this map and report would be most important in aid of the final settlement of the great subject of selling our mineral lands, heretofore referred by the Senate to the Committee on Public Lands, and would, he hoped, be decided upon at the next session. Unless important improvements in mining and smelting were introduced, and the utmost facilities afforded in the acquisition of these lands, there was some reason to fear that lead, when the tariff reached its minimum in 1842, could not be brought from the West to the East in successful competition with foreign lead; a result, that by due attention to mining and smelting, and utmost facilities in obtaining these lands, might be prevented, and thus these three great States, that must soon emerge from territorial pupillage, might have no inducement presented to support the high tariff policy. In this point of view, the question became one of the highest importance to the South, as well as the North; and Mr. W. hoped there would, therefore, be no objection from any quarter to printing this map and report.

Mr. BENTON, in a few remarks, concurred in the views of Mr. WALKER as to the great value of the work, and the propriety of its publication.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of confirming William Triplett of Missouri in his claim to a tract of land.

Mr. HUBBARD submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Senate will, on Thursday next, at one o'clock, proceed to the election of a public Printer for the Senate, for the Twenty-seventh Congress.

Mr. NORVELL submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the forty-seventh rule be so far suspended as that ladies introduced by Senators, may, for the residue of the present session, be admitted to the privileged seats within the Senate.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, the joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to make contracts and advances for American water-rotted hemp for a limited time, was taken up, considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill granting a pension to Pamela Allen, widow of the late Samuel Allen, a soldier of the Revolution; and

The bill to authorize the payment of equitable commissions to the agents or attorneys of persons in whose favor awards have been made under four several treaties between the United States and certain foreign powers; which awards have been retained in the Treasury in payment of debts due the United States; were severally considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

BANKRUPT LAW.

The bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy was taken up—the question being on Mr. HUBBARD's motion to amend by including incorporated companies within its provisions.

Mr. TAPPAN, Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. LINN, and Mr. CALHOUN, severally addressed the Senate on the amendment; and,

On motion by Mr. BENTON,
The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, February 16, 1841.

Mr. FILLMORE asked the unanimous consent of the House to enable him to submit a resolution requiring the Committee on Military Affairs to report a bill making appropriations for the defence of the NORTHEASTERN FRONTIER.

Objection being made,

Mr. FILLMORE moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. CARR moved a call of the House.

Mr. W. THOMPSON said he could save the time of the House, by stating that this matter was now before the Military Committee, and that, in a day or two, they would present a general system of defence. He did not believe the business would be at all expedited by the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken on a call of the House, and resulted—ayes 36, noes 54: no quorum voting.

The question was about being again taken, when Mr. MORGAN called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 62, nays 70.

So the House refused a call of the House.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. FILLMORE to suspend the rules, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Baker, Barnard, Beatty, Bell, Boardman, Boyd, Briggs, Brockway, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, Bynum, Calhoun, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chittenden, Clifford, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Cranston, Crary, Cross, Edward Davies, John Davis, John W. Thomas, Tillinghast, Toland, David D. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, Weller, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Sherrod Williams, and Worthington—127.

NAYS—Messrs. Banks, Beirne, Blackwell, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, John Campbell, Chapman, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Dennis, Dromgoole, Earl, Graham, Griffin, Hawkins, Hullen, Hopkins, Hubbard, Lewis, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Montgomery, Petrikin, Pickens, Rhett, Samuels, Thomas Smith, Sumter, Waddy

Thompson, Turney, Underwood, and Joseph L. Williams—34.

So the rules were suspended.

The question was then taken on the reception of the resolution, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 79, noes 58.

And on the question, Shall the main question be now put?

Mr. DROMGOOLE called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia moved to lay the resolution on the table; but

Mr. FILLMORE having modified his resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill making the necessary appropriations for fortifications, naval armaments, and other necessary preparations to place the country in a proper state of defence,

Mr. COOPER of Georgia withdrew his motion.

The main question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution was adopted.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resume the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER said that a special order (the steamboat bills) had been assigned for this day.

Mr. JONES moved to postpone the special order until Monday next; and,

On the question being taken, it passed in the affirmative.

So the special order was postponed until Monday next.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BELL in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1841.

The question was taken on the motion, made by Mr. JENIFER on yesterday, to strike out the item "for compensation to the Solicitor of the Treasury, three thousand dollars," and decided in the negative.

After the adoption of some incidental amendments,

Mr. LEONARD moved to strike out three in line 334, and insert two, and in line 327 strike out eight hundred and seven, and insert three hundred and sixty.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. McCARTY moved further to amend the same section, by inserting in line 336, after the word repairs, thirty thousand, (to be appropriated for the repair of the Potomac Bridge, that being the amount estimated to be necessary for the engineer,) so as to read,

"For compensation to two assistants to the Commissioner, as superintendent of the Potomac bridge, at one dollar and fifty cents per day, including oil for lamps, fuel, and repairs, thirty-one thousand, three hundred and sixty dollars."

After some remarks by Messrs. McCARTY, REED, BARNARD, W. C. JOHNSON, MONROE, and GRAHAM,

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment—ayes 65, noes 40—no quorum.

The question was again taken, but still no quorum voting.

On motion of Mr. L. WILLIAMS, the committee rose and reported that fact to the House. But

It having been ascertained by the SPEAKER that a quorum was now present,

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole; and

The question was then taken on agreeing to the amendment, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. BARNARD moved to amend the amendment, as follows:

"That so much of this sum as shall be applied for repairs, shall be under the direction of the Secretary of War."

Which amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLOYD moved that the entire clause, as amended, be stricken out; but the motion did not prevail.

Mr. GREEN moved to strike out the following item:

"For compensation to the officers and clerk of the Branch Mint at Charlotte, six thousand dollars."

After some remarks by Messrs. GREEN, MASON, GRAHAM, HUBBARD, CONNOR, and GRAVES, and before the question was taken,

The committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again; and then,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, February 17, 1841.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the credentials of the Hon. GEORGE EVANS, elected by the Legislature of Maine a Senator of that State in the Senate of the United States for six years from the 4th of March next; which were read, and ordered to be placed on file.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a report of a board of officers directed to make experiments with Colt's repeating fire arms.

Mr. WALL moved that it be laid upon the table and printed; which was amended upon motion by Mr. WILLIAMS to include a report made at a former session on the repeating fire arms of M'ghill Nuttig; and the motion as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented a report and joint resolutions of the Legislature of his State relative to the continuance of the Cumberland road; which, after some remarks from Mr. S. were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which a memorial on the subject had been referred, reported a bill authorizing a settlement of the accounts of Silas Drane; which was read, and ordered to a second reading, and the report and documents ordered to be printed.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Samuel R. Slaymaker, reported the same without amendment.

On motion by Mr. BUCHANAN, the bill was then taken up and considered as in committee of the whole; and, after being explained by Mr. B. was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which a memorial on the subject had been referred, reported a bill granting the Mexican Gulf Railway Company the right of way through the public lands; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. ALLEN presented a memorial remonstrating against the repeal of the Independent Treasury law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. A. also presented the memorial of 107 citizens of Perry county, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the petition of Sarah Van Duzer; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SEVIER presented a memorial, which he said was the first of the kind from his State, of 20 citizens of Chicot county, Arkansas, in favor of the passage of a bankrupt law; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KING presented the petition of the President and Directors of the Mobile and New Orleans Railroad Company, praying that the duty on certain railroad iron may not be collected until there is an opportunity of laying it on the road; which, as a bill had been reported on the subject, he would ask might be laid on the table.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to declare the rights of the children of the citizens of the United States born abroad; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. PRESTON, from the Joint Committee on the Library, to which the bill to appoint trustees for the investment of the Smithsonian fund had been referred, reported a bill to incorporate the National Institution for the Promotion of Science in the District of Columbia; and

A bill to invest the proceeds of the Smithsonian fund, and to establish the Smithsonian Institution; which, after some remarks from Mr. P. were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of the widow of Lieutenant Colonel Alexander R. Thompson, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. N. from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of sundry mechanics engaged in the construction of the United States Arsenal at Fayetteville, North Carolina; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. NICHOLAS submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be directed to inquire into the expediency of causing such a survey, exploration, report and map of the Southwestern section of the United States, West of the Mississippi, as has recently been made under the direction of the War Department and Mr. Nicollet in the Northwest.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition from citizens of Rome, Oneida county, New York, praying that the Congress of the United States would, by a resolution of that body, declare it to be the opinion of this people that the British Government, by reducing our citizens, whom they captured in arms during the late revolutionary movements of the Canadas, to the condition of common felons, have departed from that humane course towards prisoners which they have professed to be in accordance with their principles, and have violated the best policy of civilized nations; and that it is regarded as a severely not necessary to the case, and the exercise of a cruelty uncalled for; which was read.

Mr. NORVELL said that it struck him, on hearing the memorial read, that the proper disposition of it would be to transmit it to the President of the United States. Whatever indiscretions might have attended the participation of a portion of our fellow-citizens on the Northern frontier in the movements in Canada for the assertion of her liberty and independence, he had no doubt that they had been governed by the purest of motives—by a holy sympathy with the oppressed, and a sincere devotion to the cause of freedom, such as universally pervaded this nation. It was certain that the persons who had, under the operation of the British law, and the decrees of the British tribunals, been sentenced to banishment, and to hard labor in chains, in Van Dieman's Land, were suffering extreme hardship and severe punishment. The object of the memorial was to procure an alleviation of their condition. But he felt strong apprehensions, that the concluding prayer of that memorial, asking Congress to express, by resolution, certain abstract opinions in reference to the punishment and discipline to which those persons had been and were still subjected, might operate to their serious disadvantage. It might produce additional irritation on the part of the British Government, and tend to rivet the chains which had already been fastened upon the unfortunate individuals in whose behalf the memorialists had made their present application. Unless, therefore, we were prepared to engage in a war with Great Britain on this subject, which he, for one, did not deprecate, it would be the best course which could be adopted on this occasion, to send the memorial to the President, in order that he might adopt such measures as, in his judgment, would, by negotiation, tend the most effectually to attain the object which the memorialists had in view. He moved the reference of the paper to the President.

Mr. PRESTON deprecated any interference with the internal political affairs of a foreign Government; and he regretted the manifestations of the last year or two past in some parts of this country, which it seemed to him had a tendency to endanger the existing relations of this nation with the power to which he alluded, and to transfer the legitimate exercise of the constitutional right of this Government to the hands of an unauthorized and irresponsible combination. With regard to the dispute on our Northeastern boundary, there had been danger of our being dragged into a dangerous collision with the British power, and much difficulty had been experienced by the action of a State Legislature; and he ventured to say that no one who had a due consideration for the interests and the relations in which we stood to that Government, would be disposed in this case to interfere and endanger the repose of this country. The relations of this country on her frontier, were becoming more and more exciting; exasperation and temper were got up, which exposed us to dangerous peril; and he, for one, deprecated any interposition that might lead to an interruption of the relations between this country and Great Britain. No one could be more deeply impressed with the evils of such a calamity than he was—evils to ourselves, evils, calamitous evils, to our country, and also to civil liberty. It should be the duty of this Government to restrain all interference with the affairs of that Government; and especially to restrain, cautiously and religiously, all interference with the internal political relations of that Government. The men to whose cases the memorial referred, were charged with political crimes, and they were not without precedent for the exercise of a humane interference between nations in cases of crime; but this was not such a case. And besides, there were circumstances of recent occurrence that rendered it necessary for us to take a wise and cautious course. Only a few days since he was informed an interference had taken place on the part of Great Britain, in the form of a remonstrance, on a subject which was calculated to produce great excitement; and he trusted that no department of our Government would do any thing that was likely to justify such an interference. If this Government interfered on the ground of humanity, in the case of the Canadians, might not the British Government interfere, on the same ground with this Government in the case of those (the Amistad negroes) recently thrown on our shores? The unauthorized collection of people on our Northern frontier, and the resolutions which they had passed, had already, to some extent, exposed us to censure, but he trusted the Senate in its action would manifest a temper and a wisdom becoming its character and its position, and he would move that, without printing, the memorial, be laid on the table.

Mr. NORVELL asked the Senator from South Carolina to withdraw his motion to lay the memorial on the table for one moment. He had already expressed his fears that a compliance with the prayer of the memorialists, in the manner suggested by them, might aggravate, instead of alleviate, the condition of the persons whose unhappy fate had called forth their application. But he would remind the Senator from South Carolina, that those unfortunate individuals were American citizens. Their case bore no resemblance to the case of the Amistad negroes. In reference to these, he considered the interference of the British Government to be wholly unjustifiable. That was an interference which every American should condemn. He had read the correspondence of the British Minister with the Secretary of State with the same feelings which it had produced in the Senator from South Carolina. But if the President, by an informal representation, such as had heretofore been made to the authorities at Toronto, could mitigate the situation of our own fellow-citizens in Van Dieman's Land, he thought that such a representation ought to be made. It was not at all incompatible with the principle of non-interference on the part of one nation with the domestic affairs of another, to which he most cordially subscribed; but, on the contrary, it was a proceeding which was demanded by all the considerations of humanity that could appeal with just effect to the better feelings of our nature.

The memorial was then laid on the table.

The special order (the bankrupt bill) was then called for, but Mr. CLAY of Alabama hoped the Senate would devote a few minutes to the consideration of a bill which had been postponed yesterday at the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. GRAHAM.] He alluded to the bill from the House to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same."

The bill was accordingly taken up, and Mr. GRAHAM proposed to amend it by increasing the minimum price from 12½ cents to $1.25 per acre, and extending the time to three years, the propriety of which he enforced at some length.

Mr. ANDERSON said that he would reply very briefly to what had been said by the Senator from North Carolina, because he was unwilling to consume, unnecessarily, the precious time of the Senate, and only desired to state the facts in this case, believing that they were unanswerable in support of this bill. The Senator had moved two amendments: the one was to extend the time for the final location of the out-standing warrants for three years instead of one, and the other was to fix the price of the lands at one dollar and twenty-five cents, instead of twelve and a half cents. To both these amendments he objected; because, in the first place, they were not demanded by the circumstances of the case; and, secondly, because, if they should be adopted, the whole bill would be defeated. He said that after fifteen years of difficult struggling in the House of Representatives, justice and sound policy had finally prevailed, and now, for the first time, a bill for the ultimate disposition of these lands, upon proper principles, had passed that body. Sir, said he, if we amend this bill, we put an end to the measure for this session. It cannot now again re-pass in the other end of this Capitol; and no man can tell how long it may be, before we shall be so near, as we now are, to a successful and equitable adjustment of this protracted question. The Senator from North Carolina seemed to apprehend that some injustice might be done to the Revolutionary claimants of that State. But, sir, said he, the facts will satisfy every impartial man, that in the disposition of these lands the State of North Carolina has no more interest than any other one of the States of this Union. The Revolutionary claims of North Carolina were to be provided for, according to the terms of her cession, and the act of compromise of eighteen hundred and six, by the United States. Sir, they were provided for, and North Carolina declared herself, by a formal act, to have the right of presuming upon a default of heirs, and of claimants, and finished at one broad sweep her Revolutionary demands upon Tennessee. They were conceded, and she received that rich legacy for her University, which completed the amount of more than four millions three hundred thousand acres of land she had received, in conformity with the cession and compromise acts. As far as she is concerned, sir, there cannot be the slightest shadow of objection to the passage of this bill. She has had all she ever asked—and I speak not in the spirit of unkindness to our ancient mother, when I say she has had all she had a right to demand—and, so far from thinking of a limitation of seven years against her, as suggested by her honorable Senator, she has had more than forty years within which to prepare and mature her claims; and now, when she has no more left, is it reasonable to ask us to wait, because it is possible there may be one or two behind? But we say, upon the best kind of evidence, her own act appropriating the last remains of the Revolutionary claims to her own use, that no more exist. If there are, she has done an act of injustice to her own citizens, and it is neither fit nor proper that she should now interfere between us and ours. For I learn, sir, that there are but a few thousand acres of warrants issued upon certificates of interference, which remain unsatisfied, and these are exclusively owned by citizens of Tennessee. If there be a citizen of North Carolina holding any such claim, it is not known. Those warrants are now being satisfied. The claimants, I am informed, are daily locating them in the district. Besides all this, those claimants are within the limits mostly of that section; and it is unreasonable to suppose that their Representatives would be willing to do an act of injustice to any of their immediate constituents, or that they are any less disposed to consult their interests than we are.

In addition to all this, we have the testimony of the whole Tennessee delegation, in 1832, that the expenses of survey of these lands would not be reimbursed by their sale. Among that delegation is to be found the name of my respected predecessor, who had much knowledge of this subject, as one of the early settlers of Tennessee. In connection with this testimony, may be found, appended to the report of the committee of the House of Representatives, in that year, who examined fully the whole subject, the statements of the principal surveyors, who were intimately acquainted with the lands, and who agreed precisely with the views there presented. They fix the highest average price at twelve and a half cents.

Sir, said he, it is not my purpose to protract this discussion, and I therefore content myself with recapitulating the facts, which must, I think, impress the Senate with the policy of passing this bill. It appears by the legislative action of North Carolina, and other equally high evidence, that all her claims, and the claims of her citizens have been satisfied by the selection of upwards of four millions, three hundred thousand acres of land of the best quality in the State, and that all outstanding warrants, which are alone predicated upon certificates of interference, now amounting to only a few thousand acres, are also being daily satisfied, at the will of the holders, and will be allowed a further extension of twelve months by this bill within which to be located, from the date of the action of the Legislature of Tennessee. To these facts you have the patient submission of Tennessee for more than forty years, and surely, surely it will be admitted she ought now to be released from a longer postponement. We know, also, if one single amendment shall prevail, that it puts an end for this session to this bill—that it never can travel through the delays and heavy forms of the House of Representatives. We know, too, that it is substantially the same bill which had repeatedly passed this body, and now, for the first time after fifteen years, has passed the other House. In regard to the proposition to change the price from twelve and a half cents to one dollar and twenty-five cents, we have a mass of testimony that it would be utterly unjust, and would place the lands at a higher standard than they are intrinsically worth, after having undergone the selections of more than four millions of acres, by men who were the most capable and skilful judges of soil.

With these brief remarks in answer to the honorable Senator from North Carolina, he would cheerfully submit the case to the decision of the Senate, perfectly confident that they would release the State of Tennessee from the burden under which she had long labored.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said, as anxious as he was to save the time of the Senate, he must add one or two remarks to those made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. ANDERSON] in reply to the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. GRAHAM.] The first remark he had to make was, that he thought the question ought to be considered settled by the former action of this body. He said bills had been passed by the Senate at three several sessions of Congress—one of them since the commencement of the present session—which were decidedly more favorable to the interests of Tennessee than the one sent us by the House, and now under consideration. Those bills had passed, too, with unusual unanimity, but for want of time, or not having been reached on the calendar of the House, they had failed. He thought, under such circumstances, there ought to be no hesitation in the immediate passage of this bill.

He remarked that the amendments which were proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, if desirable at all, were not of sufficient importance to authorize us to jeopard the bill, by sending it back to the House. We all know (said Mr. C.) how difficult it is to get a measure through that branch of Congress, at almost any time—but, more especially, at this late period of the session. If it should be sent back, which would be the necessary consequence of any amendment, however slight, it would, in all probability, be referred to a committee; and, when reported back, it would, very likely, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House. If it took this course it was very improbable, that it would be taken up, or acted on at all, during the session. It was time, he thought, that this question about the remnants of the public lands in Tennessee was settled. The Legislature and the people of that State had been appealing to Congress on the subject for a long time, to his personal knowledge, for the last twelve years; and we are as well prepared to act definitively now, as we shall be at any future time.

The first of the amendments proposed by the Senator from North Carolina was to extend the time from one to three years, for claimants under the State of North Carolina to present their claims. He begged to remind the Senate that, as the bill now stood, those claimants were allowed one year for that purpose—not from the passage of this act, but from the passage of a law by the Legislature of Tennessee, accepting the terms proposed in the bill. Hence, claimants would have, in all probability, eighteen months' indulgence, or more—if the Legislature should not meet till the ordinary time. But, if it only allowed twelve months from the passage of this act, what more could be required on any principle of justice or fairness? It would be recollected, that it was now more than half a century (fifty-one years) since the territory, now constituting the State of Tennessee, was ceded to the United States by North Carolina. During all this time, those claimants had the opportunity of presenting their evidences of title, and obtaining their rights. Although offices for entry had not been open the whole of that period continuously, they had been opened from time to time—indulgence has been liberally granted—and claimants have had abundant opportunity to secure their rights by the exercise of the most ordinary diligence. There certainly could be no well founded complaint, then, that the further time allowed by the present bill was too short.

As regarded the other amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina—to allow such claimants as did not avail themselves of the privilege of locating their claims within the time allowed, one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, instead of the 12½ cents fixed by the bill—he thought it as inexpedient as the former. The land remaining subject to entry was, on all hands, agreed to be of very little value—very little of it worth as much as 12½ cents per acre. If claimants had postponed their applications, or neglected to establish their claims, until those more vigilant and attentive to their interests had taken up, and preoccupied all the valuable land, it was their own fault—they had no right to complain. If they were now to locate, or enter this inferior refuse land, they could not sell it for more than an average of 12½ cents per acre—consequently it would be unjust to pay them $1 25, as proposed. The provision of the bill was just and liberal, as it stood, when it gave them till twelve months after the passage of the act by Tennessee to make their entries and locations; and if they even failed to do that, it still gave them its estimated value in money. He thought this ought, in all conscience, to be satisfactory; and he earnestly hoped the Senate would not agree to either of the amendments proposed, nor jeopard this bill, so important to Tennessee, by sending it back to the House.

Mr. NICHOLSON said he desired to make a single remark upon the amendments, in reply to the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. GRAHAM.] After this measure, in substantially the same shape, had received the sanction of the Senate on three different occasions, and each time by decided majorities, he would not undertake to discuss its merits. The motion of his friend from North Carolina [Mr. GRAHAM] in reference to striking out twelve and a half cents and inserting $1 25 as the compensation to holders of land warrants, presented a question in which Tennessee had no more interest than any other State. The bill fixes the price of the land at twelve and a half cents, and provides that if the holders of warrants shall decline for a year to take lands, they shall receive a compensation in money of twelve and a half cents per acre.

This compensation must be paid out of the Federal Treasury, and now it is proposed that after the lands have only brought into the Treasury twelve and a half cents per acre, the holders of warrants shall receive out of it $1 25 per acre. He said it was for the Senators from all the States to determine whether they could sanction such a provision. It was clear, continued Mr. N. that if the lands are only worth 12½ cents an acre, as is abundantly shown by the evidence, then the warrant holders will not go forward to take the lands, if you provide that in lieu of the lands they may claim a compensation of $1 25 per acre. As to the value of the lands, Mr. N. said he held in his hand the evidence on which the Senate had so often fixed the price at 12½ cents. He would not read it to the Senate, but would merely remark that it was full and conclusive.

Mr. N. said he apprehended that the Senator from North Carolina was laboring under a mistake as to the character of the outstanding claims provided for in the bill. He seemed to suppose that there were Revolutionary soldiers who still held warrants that were not satisfied. In this he thought the Senator was mistaken. His information was, that the State of North Carolina, under a law of the State already referred to in the debate, had taken the lists of soldiers entitled to lands, and had issued warrants for all, whether living or dead, whose names were upon the lists, and whose claims did not appear to have been previously satisfied. Those warrants were issued in the name of her university, and every one of them had been satisfied. So that, in fact, he did not believe that there was a soldier or the descendant of a soldier whose claim for lands had not been satisfied. The class of cases which remained unsatisfied were certificates of interference, and possibly certificates issued before the year 1800, to persons who paid specified amounts into the treasury of North Carolina, and received certificates to be paid in Western lands. This bill gives to these claimants one year, in addition to the forty they have now had, to have their claims satisfied out of the lands.

As to the merits of the bill, Mr. N. said he would not trouble the Senate, after they had so repeatedly determined in its favor. It was a measure in which the State of Tennessee was greatly interested, which she had urged upon Congress year after year for more than fourteen years, and he hoped that its final passage would not now be endangered by any amendment which would make it necessary to send it back to the other House.

The question was then taken on the amendments, and they were disagreed to.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading.

Mr. ANDERSON moved that it have its third reading now; which being acceded to, the bill was read a third time, and passed—ayes 29, noes 3, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Nicholson, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Graham, Mangum, and Southard—3.

BILLS PASSED.

The joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to make contracts and advances for American water-rotted hemp for a limited time;

The bill granting a pension to Pamela Allen, widow of the late Samuel Allen, a soldier of the Revolution; and

The bill to authorize the payment of equitable commissions to the agents or attorneys of persons in whose favor awards have been made under four several treaties between the United States and certain foreign powers, which awards have been retained in the Treasury in payment of debts due the United States, were severally read a third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. TAPPAN, the Senate went into Executive session, and then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.
WEDNESDAY, February 17, 1841.

Mr. LANE moved that the House take up the bill to confirm to the State of Indiana the land selected for that portion of the Wabash and Erie Canal, which lies between the mouth of the Tippecanoe river and Terre Haute, and for other purposes.

Objection being made,
Mr. LANE moved a suspension of the rules; which was seconded.

And on the question being taken, there appeared—ayes 90, noes 54—not two thirds.

So the rules were not suspended.

DEFECTIVE LAND PATENTS.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on Public Lands, asked leave to introduce the following bill, viz:

A BILL to confirm land patents.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all patents for public lands, which have been issued from the General Land Office since the passing of the act, entitled "An act for the establishment of a General Land Office in the department of the Treasury," passed on the 25th day of April, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, in the name of the President of the United States, instead of being "in the name of the United States," as prescribed in the eighth section of said act; and all patents for public lands, which have been issued from the said General Land Office since the passing of the act entitled "An act to reorganize the General Land Office," passed the fourth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, and which have been countersigned by the Recorder of the General Land Office, or other person acting in his stead, instead of being countersigned by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as prescribed in the act of the twenty-fifth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and twelve; and all patents which have been issued from said General Land Office since the passing of the act entitled "An act prescribing the mode by which patents for public lands shall be signed and executed," passed the second day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, and which have been subscribed by a secretary duly appointed, pursuant to the provisions of said act, with the printed or written name of the President prefixed to the personal signature of such secretary, in the execution of such patents, notwithstanding the name of the President may not have been written personally by the secretary, shall be deemed, taken, and held, good and valid patents in law, and shall have all the force and effect to pass from the United States to the patentee or patentees named in such patents, respectively, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, the lands described therein, as though, in each and all the respects before enumerated, the patents, in their form and manner of execution, had conformed to the requirements of law.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passing of this act, it shall be the duty of the Recorder of the General Land Office, in addition to the duties now required of him by law, to countersign all patents issued from said office, instead of the same being countersigned by the Commissioner, as required by the eighth section of the act entitled "An act for the establishment of a General Land Office in the Department of the Treasury," passed the twenty-fifth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and twelve.

Objection being made,

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, the rules were suspended.

The bill was then read a first and second time, And, after some remarks by Messrs. LINCOLN, PETRIKIN, CRARY, CRABB and GRAVES,

The question was then stated, Shall the bill be read a third time? when

Mr. CRABB moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; but at the request of

Mr. CASEY withdrew his motion; and, by general consent,

The further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow, and it was ordered to be printed.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BELL in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1841. The question pending was the motion of Mr. GREEN to strike out all the items of appropriation having reference to the Branch Mints of North Carolina, Georgia and New Orleans, and the expenditures connected therewith.

Mr. BYNUM, being entitled to the floor, commenced his remarks by saying that he had determined to remain a silent spectator in the House for at least one session. His peculiar situation, and the recent development of events, had induced him to adhere to that resolution. But since he had attended to the debates in the House, such had been the extraordinary, unprovoked, unjust course pursued by certain gentlemen, that, to remain longer silent, when he had an opportunity of speaking, would, in his opinion, be a dereliction of duty—an act of treachery, if not treason, to the portion of country of which he was the representative on the floor of Congress.

Mr. B. said the immediate proposition before the House was to strike out a small appropriation for the continuation of the mints south of the Potomac. It was not the amount of money that added consequence to the motion—that was insignificant within itself. Had that been the case, he would have been the last man in the House to open his mouth; but he thought he perceived in this motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GREEN,] (although Mr. B. did not know it was even Mr. G's intention,) an insidious design, an insidious attempt, to strike down the only prospects which the country had for a permanent, constitutional, and stable currency for the people of the country.

Particularly and emphatically (said Mr. B.) did this proposition affect, most sensibly and deeply, the portion of the people of the country whose representative he was. He alluded to the great growing, agricultural, planting, and producing interests, which, if he had not mistaken the signs of the times, were now prostrated at the feet of the non-productive, non-laboring, non-agricultural portion of the country.

Mr. B. after some remarks in regard to the design of the framers of the Constitution, said there was a certain fowl, which, when chased from the fields, set up the cry of "caw! caw!" with as much meaning and regularity as the notes of Opposition gentlemen in their cry of profligacy! corruption! extravagance! as applied to the present Administration.

Mr. B. then demonstrated the means which were at the disposition of those who complained so much of the extravagance of the Administration to correct the abuse, and referred to the political complexion of several standing committees of the House. Upon the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of State, there were three Whigs and two Democrats. On the Committee on the Expenditures in the Department of the Treasury, three Whigs and two Democrats. On the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of War, three Whigs and two Democrats. On the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of the Navy, three Whigs and two Democrats. On the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of the Post Office, three Whigs and two Democrats. On the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings, three Whigs and two Democrats. The chairman of each of the committees was a Whig; and Mr. B. contended that if all the charges of profligacy and corruption had been true, there was every opportunity for those who made them to call the committees together, and make investigation, and establish their position.

Mr. B. illustrated the dangerous tendency of a Bank of the United States, and showed wherein the operations of banking institutions generally acted upon the productive interests of the country, depressing labor and supporting the non-producers at the expense of the laboring portion of the country.

Mr. B. in the course of his remarks, incidentally alluded to several other subjects, and proved conclusively, from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, that the people had paid a tax to the banks, since the organization of the Government, sufficient to carry on its operations, viz.

Losses by bank failures	- $108,885,721
Losses by suspensions of specie payments by banks, and consequent depreciation of their notes	- 95,000,000
Loss by destruction of bank notes, by accidents	- 7,121,332
Losses by counterfeit bank notes, beyond losses by coin	- 4,444,444
Losses by fluctuations in bank currency affecting prices, extravagance in living, sacrifices of property, and by only a part of the other incidents to the banking system, not computed above, at least	150,000,000

Making, in all - $365,451,497

Mr. B. replied to the remarks of several gentlemen who had preceded him; and concluded by expressing the opinion, that should the Independent Treasury law be repealed, (which he would consider tantamount to a repeal of the Constitution,) a National Bank would be erected upon its ruins, and wield its sceptre over the country, and make its power perpetual.

[The remarks of Mr. B. are in a course of preparation, and will be given hereafter.]

Mr. TILLINGHAST advocated the amendment. He considered the Mint at Philadelphia sufficient for all practical purposes, and that these branch mints, at such distant portions of the Republic, were a useless expense.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina opposed the amendment. He was in favor of giving the branch mints a fair trial, before abolishing them.

Mr. HABERSHAM also opposed the amendment, and replied with much force to the objections raised by Mr. TILLINGHAST.

Mr. EVERETT objected to the proposition to strike out, for so long as the law authorizing these mints existed, the House was bound to make the appropriation. If gentlemen objected to them, the proper course was to repeal the law.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia said that he would add a few remarks to those made by his colleague from Habersham county.

I find, Mr. Chairman, (said Mr. C.) the establishment of these branch mints to have been a part of your policy for several years. The motion to strike out involves a change. To justify this change, it should be shown or admitted by the friends of the policy, that the reasons for creating them were unfounded, or that those reasons have failed to operate. What were those reasons? The gentleman from Vermont has intimated to you, as he did last session, that one reason was to protect the laboring classes in the gold region. This I do not agree to; for, with equal propriety, the same might be assigned as a reason for establishing the principal Mint at Philadelphia, which was established before the discovery of gold in North Carolina and Georgia.

Again: foreign gold is not taxed by this law to enhance the value of our gold, but competes fairly at the Mint with the domestic. Therefore, the idea of protection is misapplied here. The presumption is that the objects of the law were to diffuse a metallic currency amongst the mass of the people, and to give to those States which produced the gold the full benefits of that product, free of the taxation incident to an exportation to a foreign market. This, sir, is carrying out the principle of free trade on terms of equality.

But establish your Mint exclusively at Philadelphia, and what is the effect? The entire product of gold in Georgia, North Carolina, Alabama, and Tennessee, will be shipped to Philadelphia, just as cotton, rice, or tobacco is to New York or Europe.

before it will become available as money. This involves the cost of discounts, commissions, insurance, and freight; so that a man in Georgia, after possessing himself of the specific metal, will not be permitted to count it out as money, until he shall submit to all these items of cost. This, too, will be by the operation of your laws. And to what end? Why, sir, that your Government agents at Philadelphia may have the benefit of the deposits and coinage of his money—a benefit which heretofore has been worth to your bank agencies hundreds of thousands.

The cost of a branch mint, therefore, of $6,000 a year, is a tax for protection, (you say,) though the man who buys pays no more for the coin; and yet the tax which would be paid by the producer of the gold, for the benefit of your Philadelphia agencies, by which he receives less, is no protection to your great city and its United States Bank. This, sir, is a fair specimen of Bank logic, and is based on the universal assumption that whatever is given, or loaned, or paid to the Bank, is rightfully bestowed.

You will perceive, therefore, that the reference of this motion to a United States Bank policy, by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM,] is exceedingly appropriate. All the active operations of that institution were, and will be, on Government funds and private deposits. The former are of specie, (Georgia and North Carolina gold, for instance,) or bank notes commanding specie. The amount involved in the operations of the branch mints is worth contending for, being from half to a million of dollars annually in United States gold, besides foreign coin. This will form an important item in the specie exhibit of your Bank.

Another basis of the active operations of such a Bank has been, and will be, cotton, rice, and tobacco. By these it has controlled, and will control, the foreign exchanges. By the gold products and other deposits of your Government, it will control your domestic exchanges, and realize thereon what profits it may deem prudent.

So far, then, as profits are to be derived from the natural products, whether of cotton, rice, tobacco or gold, as a medium of exchanges, foreign or domestic, it is, by the policy of this law, held to be just and fair that those profits should fall into the hands of the laborers, merchants, or monied institutions of that people whose soil and climate, work and labor, care and diligence, produce those commodities. This is the principle of the existing law, and yet gentlemen say this is protection. Yes, sir, it is protection—protection to free trade and equal rights; that is all; and for that only your Government must be freed.

Another item of expense, sir, I would here mention, by no means the least, which would be visited on those hardy yeomanry who dig gold, if you disperse with your branch mints. It is the exchange of pure gold for bank bills which wear out, or burn up, or prove worthless by bank suspensions or bank breakages. A great safeguard and facility to the inhabitants where gold is produced, arising from its coinage in their vicinity, is an easy, cheap, and certain and safe currency for domestic use.

And now, as the location of your coinage brings advantages and facilities to those amongst whom it takes place, in realising it in money free of cost, in the facilities of currency, &c. it becomes a question not of protection but of alternative right and choice, in whose favor you will decide—the people who dig the gold, or the bankers, brokers, and merchants of Philadelphia. By establishing your branch mints, you have determined, according to equity and justice, to distribute a portion of these benefits to the gold diggers; and now the proposition is to reassume the little you have yielded, and that before you have fairly tested your policy of giving up. And why? It is answered: 1st. For economy. 2d. For reform in Executive patronage, to diminish the chances of corruption. I, sir, am for reform, whenever it can be effected. But what will be the nature of the reform in this case? As I have shown, it will be from bad to worse, both in principle and in practice. In principle, because it will require the producer of gold, at the price of taxation, to convert it into paper money, which will be less sound and safe because of this very act of taking his gold to deposit in a bank in Philadelphia, instead of permitting it to circulate in his own neighborhood.

Experience proves this, sir; for, prior to establishing your branch mints, the people in that part of my State were confined to paper currency almost entirely; and, notwithstanding they daily handled the precious metals, they were compelled to give it for paper, as if paper was really the thing of value.

Since the operation of the mint, the gold is used as coin, being convertible without cost. And even last summer, in the midst of suspension, that part of Georgia was supplied with specie change.

But this reform will be from bad to worse in practice, too—since, to rid yourself of these branch mints and their officers, all of whom you have presumed would be corrupted, you will throw your funds on deposit in some vast reservoir—a bank vault, for instance, (I believe the mover of this is for repealing the Sub-Treasury, for creating a United States Bank, and for restoring the deposits,) where, by the facility of expansions, one million may become three, for the benefit of your great city and its favorite bank—which, with its officers and dependants, you never suspect of corruption.

This, sir, will be the practical reformation. I would have Georgians and Georgia Representatives to look to it. This product of Georgia will be one item in the basis of issue, and the cotton, rice, and tobacco, another. In deficiency of these, the State stocks will be invoked to aid them.

If, sir, this argument of "economy" is to prevail, let it be examined, and it proves too much or too little. It proves too much, because you can coin all your gold and silver cheaper far at Charlotte and Dahlonega, or either, than at Philadelphia. Therefore, the principal Mint should be abolished. Sell your property at Philadelphia, give us the use of the proceeds, and we will do all your coinage free of expense.

Again: Coinage is a dead expense any way you may manage, and does not pay for itself. By the same argument, you would coin nowhere; since, on a score of dollars and cents, you would find it cheaper to let other nations or individuals coin.

Again: If you abolish these offices because they are an expense, what will become of the thousand and one offices, judicial, civil, financial, and military, which bring you in no money annually?

Sir, this argument will not do. I now proceed to show that, so far as the policy you set out with is just and true, instead of being disappointed, you may expect all your reasonable hopes to be realized.

First, then, my colleague who sits on my right [Mr. HOLT] now suggests to me that, by intelligence received last night, it appears "that by very recent discoveries there are developments making in the gold region of Georgia never before anticipated." This, in part, I witnessed last summer. And here I read from the document of the House, giving a report of the operations of the mint, to show this committee what it seems unapprized of, to wit: For the three years during which the branch mints have been operating, the two at Dahlonega and Charlotte have coined nearly two-thirds of all the United States gold coined in the Union during that time—the entire amount of American gold coined being from $420,000 to $450,000, of which those two branches have coined about $230,000. And of the $170,000 American gold coined at Philadelphia last year, ninety odd thousand was the product of Georgia.

Now, sir, but for the high exchanges produced by bank suspensions, and the operation of an order at the Mint forbidding less sums than $100 to be coined at the branches, $80,000 of that $90,000 would have been coined at Dahlonega. Add this to what it did coin, say $126,000, and you would have had over $200,000 coined at that branch.

As to the product of gold and its prospects. In 1837, the year before these branches were in operation, the total of United States gold was $282,000. Since that time the annual average has been near half a million. And at Dahlonega in particular, it is decidedly increasing.

Now, sir, I beg to estimate an increase for the next year, founded on the presumption that the banks will not again suspend, for if they do, bullion will be shipped as exchanges rise, instead of being coined at home. Here is the estimate: $125,000 present product. This will be increased 25 per cent by increase of labor, new developments, and increased facilities. In round sum, $31,000. One half of what went to Philadelphia to be coined will be coined at home, say $45,000, making the total coinage at Dahlonega $201,000 in the year next ensuing.

This is liable to be diminished by the general order from the principal Mint, and the limitation of the current deposit at Dahlonega to be used to forward the operations there.

Now, sir, in the failure of any of reasons of your policy, or with no disappointed hopes, it remains to see who will abrogate the measure. The party which adopted it cannot; and those who have declined to support it heretofore, I presume, will not now do it.

If it should be done, I for one will look after the gold produced in Georgia, till it finds its stopping place in the vaults of a United States Bank; and I will then reckon up the cost of putting and keeping it there, and call on some one to tell me who pays the cost and who divides the profits.

About the same time too, if in life, I will watch the course our cotton will take, and inquire into the results which thereby will fall on the planters as well as the reasons that will have governed its course in trade.

After some explanations from Mr. TILLINGHAST,

Mr. STANLY made some brief remarks, and concluded by sending an amendment to the desk, which amendment the CHAIR decided was not in order.

Mr. GRAVES followed, and also made some brief remarks.

Mr. DAWSON, after some observations in relation to the wide latitude the debate had taken, opposed the proposition to strike out the appropriation for branch mints, and exposed the fallacy of the arguments urged in favor of it. It had been said that these branch mints did not pay their expenses; but would gentlemen of the North say that their numerous custom houses and ports of entry paid their expenses? No, they could not. But the custom houses, like the branch mints, were erected for the convenience of the country, and not solely in consideration of dollars and cents. Mr. D. went on to show that the same argument would apply to post offices and other institutions, established, not for profit, but for the convenience of the people. In conclusion he submitted to his friends all round whether they thought steam enough had not been let off, and whether they had not better take the question at once.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON made an explanation as to the vote he should give. He considered that Congress ought not to scatter the institutions for coining money all over the Union, merely because it had the power to do it. He was in favor of having but one mint for coining the gold of the country, unless that gold should be found in greater quantity.

After some remarks from Mr. GRAHAM, the question on striking out the clause in question was taken by tellers, and decided in the negative—Ayes 53, noes 73.

So the amendment was rejected.

On motion of Mr. ANDREWS, the committee then rose and reported progress.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, February 18, 1841.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the following resolutions, passed by the Legislature of the State of Maine; which were read:

RESOLVES IN RELATION TO THE CURRENCY.

1. Resolved, That the policy of this country, in public and private financial matters, has always been to maintain a mixed money of paper and metals, the latter forming the basis of the former; that bank paper, convertible into specie at the pleasure of the holder, is a safe and convenient currency; and any change of policy tending to substitute an entire metallic currency, would be injurious in its effects, and impracticable in its execution.

2. Resolved, That for the interest of the whole community, as well as for the purposes of the Treasury, it is essential that the nation should possess a currency of uniform value, credit and use, wherever it may circulate; that the Constitution has entrusted Congress exclusively with the power of creating and regulating a currency of this description; and that measures should be taken by Congress in execution of this power, to relieve the country from the evils and embarrassments of the present deranged condition of the currency, by establishing one equally useful to the people and to the Government, and of uniform value and credit in every State in the Union.

3. Resolved, That the act of Congress in relation to the collection, keeping, and disbursement of the public money, approved on the fourth day of July last, commonly denominated the Independent or Sub-Treasury act, was uncalled for by the people, and is against the genius of our free institutions, tending to substitute a metallic for our present mixed currency, and ought forthwith to be repealed.

4. Resolved, That if the alternative is necessarily presented of a National Bank, with all the restrictions that a people jealous of their liberties would require in such an institution, and the existing Sub-Treasury system, we are in favor of the former, and opposed to the latter.

5. Resolved, That we deprecate a national debt, and direct taxation in time of peace, to provide means to defray the ordinary expenditures of the General Government; that there should be a revision and adjustment of the tariff, so as at once to furnish a revenue equal to the necessary expenditures, and to encourage and protect American industry.

6. Resolved, That a bill providing for a just and equal distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the several States, commends itself to our consideration as an act of justice due alike to all, and ought to pass into a law.

7. Resolved, That the Hon. REUF. WILLIAMS, previous to his election to the Senate of the United States, having declared and published that it is the duty of the elected to carry into effect the will of his constituents, if he is instructed what that will is, or resign his trust, we, therefore, hereby instruct him that the foregoing resolutions express the will of his constituents.

8. Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to vote for any bill or proposition now before Congress calculated to carry into effect the principles contained in the foregoing resolutions, and to introduce and support such measures as shall accomplish the same object, if not now before Congress.

9. Resolved, That the Governor be requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

The resolutions were then, on motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MOUTON presented a memorial of Kohn, Daron and Company, praying that the duty on certain silks may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BENTON presented, at the request of the Delegate from Iowa, a preamble and resolutions unanimously adopted by citizens of the county of Dubuque, claiming a right of pre-emption denied them by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. B. also presented a memorial from Gen. T. S. Jesup, stating that, by an error in the printing of a certain document, much injury had been done him, and praying such redress as Congress, in its wisdom, may think proper to accord; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the memorial of E. Gonon, submitted a report accompanied by a bill to authorize the Secretary of War to cause experiments to be made in a system of telegraphs; which was read and ordered to a second reading, and the report ordered to be printed.

The resolution submitted on Tuesday by Mr. NORVELL to admit ladies to the privileged seats on the floor of the Senate, was laid on the table—Ayes 21, noes 20.

The resolution submitted on Tuesday by Mr. HUBBARD, relative to the election of Printer, was taken up, and Mr. HUBBARD briefly gave the reasons for its adoption.

Mr. HUNTINGTON thought the Congress to come into existence after the 4th of March next, would be as competent to elect a printer for itself as the present body was to elect a printer for it. But as the ostensible object was to carry out what was supposed to be a compulsory and obligatory act of Congress, he thought it became necessary to consider what that act was, and the practice of this and the other branch of Congress under it. The act was in the form of a joint resolution of the two Houses, which, sanctioned by the President, had the force of law. He then quoted the original resolution of 1819, and traced the action of Congress under it to the present time, and showed that in the Senate, in every instance, the printer had been elected at the close of the preceding session; and in the House the same course had been followed until 1833, when a motion was made in the House of Representatives to lay it on the table, and next to postpone it; and subsequently it was treated as a dead letter, by the House, for it refused to be governed by it. And now there were three things that were worthy of consideration: First, was the resolution compulsory? If that question were answered in the negative, the next question was, was it necessary now to appoint a printer; and if not, was it expedient to do so? The resolution was originally intended to have the force of law, and it was intended with this object, that when Congress got together it should have the means of causing its work to be done, and that the printer should have authority for doing it. The law then was intended to be obligatory; but one branch of Congress had violated it, and now they were not bound to act under it; in his judgment there was nothing compulsory in that law as it stood, with the practice of the House of Representatives under it. And if not compulsory, was there any necessity to act under it? There was no necessity, for they had a printer appointed for the period intervening between this day and the 4th of March; and it was known that the Senate would meet on that day, when such provision could be made as the Senate might deem requisite. Was it then expedient? On the 4th of March the political complexion of that body would be changed, and if the Senate, in a fortnight from this date, should reverse the act of the present Senate, if this resolution should be acted upon, by the exercise of its constitutional right in the appointment of a printer for itself, there would be raised a cry of proscription, and a demand would be made for compensation for the loss of the appointment. Now, he, for one, and he spoke only for one, should not, at any future period, consider this election (if an election should take place,) as interfering with the appointment of one by the next Senate, and he hoped one of the first acts of that body would be to reinstate itself in its constitutional rights, and appoint a printer for itself. He should, therefore, move that the consideration of this resolution be postponed until the 4th of March next.

Mr. HUBBARD desired to answer the objections of the Senator from Connecticut, who had occupied the principal part of the morning hour in making his objections known, but, in justice to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] who intended to address the Senate on the Bankrupt bill, he could not now have the opportunity to do so. It was, however, his intention to take an early opportunity to answer the honorable Senator fully, and, therefore, he should now ask the Senate to strike out the word "Thursday," the day on which he had proposed that the election should take place, leaving the blank to be filled up hereafter, for he apprehended they were to have a long debate upon the resolution, and next to lay the resolution on the table, which he promised he would call upon again to-morrow.

The Senate concurred, and then proceeded with the debate on

THE BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. BENTON being intitled to the floor, adressed the Senate for two hours in favor of the proposition to include banking institutions within the operation of a bankrupt law.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama next rose, and said he proposed to make a few remarks, but, at the request of Mr. MANGUM, gave way to a proposition for an adjournment.

And the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, February 18, 1841.

On motion of Mr. DAVIES, of Pennsylvania, it was ordered that henceforth the House will take a daily recess from half-past two to four o'clock, p. m.

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved to suspend the rules, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a view to proceed with the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1841.

Mr. STANLY requested Mr. JONES to give way, to enable him to offer the following amendment, moved by him on yesterday:

"And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to institute an inquiry into the operations of the branch mints at Charlotte, Dahlonega, and New Orleans, and to inform the House of Representatives, early in the month of December next, whether these mints have answered the purpose of their creation; what amount of gold and silver has been coined at each of these branches. And the said Secretary is further directed to inform this House whether the Mint at Philadelphia is not competent to do all the coinage necessary for the purposes of the country; and whether future operations at the branch mints may not be dispensed with, without injury to the public service. And also, whether it be not practicable to dispose of the present costly buildings and machinery, without any considerable loss to the Government. And it shall also be the duty of the Secretary to communicate such other and further information in relation to the branch mints as may, in his opinion, tend to enlighten Congress in deciding the question of their continuance or discontinuance."

Mr. JONES said the proposition of the honorable member had been decided by the Chair to be out of order, when offered by him as an amendment to the bill, and that it must have been obvious at the time, that in addition to the fact that it was out of order, gentlemen were preparing to debate it; and that at this late period of the session, with most of the appropriation bills to act on, he could not consent that any business should take precedence of those bills.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of Union, (Mr. BELL in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GREEN, after some remarks, moved to strike out the following item:

"For compensation to the officers and clerk of the branch mint at Dahlonega, Georgia, six thousand dollars."

Mr. ALFORD opposed the motion. It seemed to him suicidal. He hoped gentlemen would not urge their persecuting measures; for, if the mint should be continued, in place of British gold, we should have American gold. The internal resources of Georgia had begun to be developed by the operation of the Government; and he hoped they would not be nipped in the bud. He therefore trusted that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREEN] would withdraw his motion.

After some explanations by Messrs. NESBIT, ALFORD, and COOPER,

Mr. BLACK having been detained from his seat by indisposition at the time Mr. NESBIT said his speech, asked leave now to propound a question to his honorable colleague. Has he said, (marked Mr. B.) directly or indirectly, that I have misrepresented him in fact or in substance, in my printed speech, published in the Globe in reply to the speech he had delivered on the Treasury note bill?

Mr. NESBIT replied, that if his colleague had been in his seat, where he ought to have been, he would have heard what he did say. He had said that the gentleman's speech was calculated to mislead public opinion as to what he (Mr. N.) had said, and as to his position on the tariff question.

Mr. BLACK denied that he had done his colleague any injustice. He had inserted in his speech a written explanation handed him by that gentleman as to his course, and then had shown that, in his opinion, the measures advocated by his colleague did not comport with his professions. Besides, Mr. NESBIT's speech is not printed as it was delivered. He had omitted to print many material things that he uttered on the floor, and one of the most material of them was, that there was a change of opinion in the State of Georgia relative to the tariff, which he attributed to "the events of the last summer." I assert that he did utter these identical words; and I now ask him, distinctly, whether he does or does not deny that he used these words?

Mr. NESBIT said, he would not submit to any farther catechism.

Mr. BLACK. So far from misrepresenting him, I have truly stated him in all essential particulars; and no man can say that the printed speech, bad as it is, is the speech which was delivered here. To the spoken speech I replied, and I deny that I have done him any injustice.

Mr. STEENROD then addressed the committee. He alluded to the fairness and liberality of the Chair in conducting the debate; and also to the party excitement which existed during the late Presidential canvass. He had hoped, now that the election was over, and the excitement had subsided, that certain gentlemen would have come to Congress to carry out the principles of economy and reform to which they had professed such ardent attachment before the people; but he doubted whether these professions of economy and reform corresponded with the principles which the same gentleman here sustained.

Mr. S. then adverted to the several propositions, 1. For an extra session of Congress; 2. The distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States; and 3. An increase of the expenditures for the public service; and said he deemed these propositions as questionable economy.

Mr. S. then stated the policy of the Government to be a reduced revenue and a limited expenditure, and demonstrated that this was the policy established under the preceding and present Administrations, and referred to the compromise act of 1833, and the distribution act of 1836, as establishing this policy. He also referred to the high consideration given to those acts by the country, as well as by the representatives of the people. Although gentlemen had avowed their disposition to adhere to this policy, (said Mr. S.) still the principles they contend for are calculated to undermine it.

Mr. S. then adverted to the oft repeated charges against the past and present Administrations, of neglecting the public service—the army, the navy, fortifications, &c.—and showed, by a reference to documents, that a liberal policy had been pursued towards those interests; that the vessels of the navy and the naval force had been nearly doubled, the naval stores increased, the apprentice system adopted in the navy, and the navy yards considerably improved. Under the acts of 1832, 1836, and 1838, large appropriations had been made for fortifications, and for erecting new forts and repairing old ones.

Mr. S. then replied to the remarks of Mr. GRAVES in relation to the increase of the number of officers of the Government, and animadverted in detail upon the subject, showing that such measure had been rendered necessary by the growing necessities of our extended country.

Mr. S. feared, from what he had recently witnessed in the House, that the past policy was to be abandoned, and that the powers of the Government were to be increased beyond what was warranted by the Constitution; and, in connection with this subject, referred to the disposition here manifested to seize on the money power, the taxing power, and the appointing power of the Executive, to increase the strength of the Government beyond what was warranted by the Constitution.

Mr. S. concluded his remarks by referring to his past opposition to the incoming President, and his reasons for it; and expressed the fervent hope that General Harrison would administer the Government in accordance with its past policy.

After some further remarks by Messrs. GRAVES, WARREN, and COOPER of Georgia,

And it now being half past two o'clock,

The House, in pursuance of the order of to-day, took a recess until four o'clock.

[EVENING SESSION.]

After the recess,

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON being entitled to the floor, but declining to speak,

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. GREEN to strike out the appropriation for the branch mint in Georgia, and it was decided in the negative.

On motion of Mr. W. C. JOHNSON, the bill was amended, by the insertion of an item appropriating $3,000 for carrying into effect the act passed on the 8th instant, making temporary provisions for lunatics in the District of Columbia. Mr. J. explained that the above amendment was necessary, owing to the bill in question being so vaguely worded, that it could not be carried into effect.

Mr. HUNT moved to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, however, That the district attorneys of the United States, in and for the several districts, the clerks and marshals respectively of the same, shall render an account quarter yearly, each and every year hereafter, to the Secretary of the Treasury, of all fees, emoluments, and receipts, of every name and nature whatever by them respectively received, by virtue of their said offices; which account shall be rendered upon oath or affirmation, and shall be in such form, and supported by such proofs as the Secretary of the Treasury, in his judgment, may prescribe for the purpose of enforcing the provisions hereinafter named, that is to say: If it shall appear that the salaries, fees, emoluments, receipts, and earnings, of any of the said attorneys, shall exceed the sum of ——— dollars, then such attorneys shall pay such excess into the Treasury of the United States for general purposes of the Government; and if the salaries, fees, emoluments, or earnings, of any of said clerks, shall exceed ——— dollars, then the excess shall, in like manner, be paid into the Treasury for the purposes aforesaid; and if the salaries, earnings, fees, and emoluments, of any of the said marshals, shall exceed the sum of ——— dollars, then such excess shall also be paid into the Treasury for purposes aforesaid.

Mr. HUNT said he intended in good faith, to carry out a system of retrenchment and reform, but it would be a system to benefit the people and lighten their burdens. This proviso proposed no such relief, but to leave the fees as high and onerous as ever, taking to the Government the larger portion of them to replenish its bankrupt and exhausted Treasury. It proposed taxing the poor and unfortunate, those least able to bear burdens for its own support. The true remedy was a fee bill properly framed, and if no one else would bring forward such a bill, he would himself move in the subject at the earliest opportunity which promised any action.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said, he had no desire to resort to any measure by which the officers of Government should not receive a full equivalent for services performed. But he was not aware, until an advanced period of the last session, that the emoluments of these officers were a tenth part of what they really were. It was not the intention of the committee to interfere with the regular salaries awarded to these officers by law, but merely to limit the amount received in the shape of perquisites.

Mr. J. proceeded to say that, from a statement of facts presented in relation to the fees of those officers, it would appear that the amount received by them for personal services, was enormous. What would the gentleman think of a single clerk, in the Southern District of New York, receiving fees, in the course of one year, to the amount of above nineteen thousand dollars? What would he think of a District Attorney, in the State of New York, receiving above twenty-eight thousand dollars per annum in the shape of fees? Also, of a certain marshal of a District in Mississippi, receiving eighty-seven thousand dollars per annum and upwards?

Shall I be told by the gentlemen from New York, said Mr. J. that he is anxious for retrenchment and reform, and yet be told that this system does not require the pruning knife?

Mr. BROWN of Mississippi objected to his constituents being relieved from the extortionate fees of the marshal in any such way as that proposed in the bill. For instead of relieving the unfortunate debtors, it would be merely placing the fees in the public Treasury, instead of leaving them in the hands of the marshal. He wished the fees reduced so that the poor debtors, and not the Government, should have the benefit of the reduction.

Mr. EVANS contended that the proviso could not be properly admitted into the bill before the committee, and when a proposition should be made for filling up the blanks, he would make that as a point of order. He then endeavored to show that the fees did not amount to so much as was supposed, there being many deductions, &c.

After some remarks from Mr. BRIGGS, in which he urged the impropriety of attempting to act on so intricate a subject at this late period of the session,

Mr. STANLY took the floor, and moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill; which motion took precedence of the motion previously pending.

Mr. S. after advocating at some length the necessity for a National Bank, a duty on wines and silks, distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, &c. spoke in relation to the fourth instalment, and said that it ought to be paid to the States, for they were undoubtedly entitled to it.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON considered himself under no obligation to vote to pay the fourth instalment. He had voted for the law alluded to, as a deposit act only.

Mr. PICKENS said it was a deposit act on its face.

Mr. STANLY replied that it was a distribution bill, notwithstanding it was entitled "An act to regulate the public deposits;" and it was so called to avoid Old Hickory's veto upon it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that, according to his recollection—for he was in Congress when the act was passed—it was modified expressly to meet the views of General Jackson. Its character was a distribution bill, but the bill underwent a modification so as to avoid the President's veto. Mr. U. remarked that he had voted for it as a distribution bill.

Mr. PICKENS said the gentleman was mistaken. The bill was on its face modified as to give the Secretary of the Treasury the power to recall from the States such reasonable proportions of the deposits as might be required by the necessities of the Treasury.

Mr. W. THOMPSON then alluded to the origin of the bill; and said that it was discussed in the press to which he at that time belonged, and every member of it was of the opinion that it was, bona fide, a deposit bill. Such was the intention of the author of the measure; and Mr. T. could not have voted for it under any other circumstances.

Mr. STANLY having concluded his remarks, The committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Mr. EASTMAN then moved that the House again resolve itself into a committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the "bill to extend for five years the act, approved July 7, 1838, granting half pay and pensions to widows."

And pending the motion,

On motion of Mr. L. WILLIAMS, at 9 o'clock, P. M.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, February 19, 1841.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted to the Senate a letter from the honorable John Tyler, Vice President of the United States elect, notifying his receipt, by special messenger, of the official notification of his election; which was read.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented two memorials of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying the imposition of a duty on foreign silks; which were laid on the table.

Mr. CLAYTON presented resolutions of the Legislature of Delaware in favor of an alteration of the Constitution, so as to make the President ineligible for a second term; which were read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the House bill making further appropriation for the payment of horses lost in the military service of the United States, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. STURGEON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of James McCrory; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The bill for the relief Samuel R. Slaymaker was read a third time and passed.

ELECTION OF PRINTER.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the resolution to elect a Public Printer for the 27th Congress, the motion pending being that made by Mr. HUNTINGTON to postpone its further consideration until the 4th of March next; when

Mr. HUBBARD, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: When I presented the resolution, (now before the Senate,) merely designating the time for proceeding to the election of a Public Printer, little indeed did I suppose that it would meet with any opposition. I knew well the existing statutory provision upon the subject. I knew well what had been the uniform, the invariable, practice of this body with reference to this matter. I knew well the history connected with the introduction and the passage of the resolution of March 1819; and, with a knowledge of these facts, I could not have anticipated the slightest objection to the adoption of the resolution now before us: but so it is. The Senator from Connecticut, at this late day, interposes his objections to the Senate proceeding to the election. He denies that the joint resolutions of 1819 and of 1829 were obligatory in their character, or were in accordance with the provision of the Constitution which secures to this and to the other House the right to choose their own officers. He denies that there is any necessity, or that there would be any expediency, in proceeding to the election at this time. I purpose to notice these objections. The Senator, in the course of his remarks, observed that the Senate which would assemble here on the fourth of March would be competent to elect their own printer. And has that fact any thing to do with the question? Have I denied the competency or the ability of that Senate? Have I uttered one word in disparagement of that body? No, sir. And why the Senator has alluded to that matter I am unable to comprehend. If the obligation rests upon this Senate, under the resolutions of 1819 and 1829, to elect a Printer to execute the public printing for the next Congress, we should not hesitate to meet and to perform the obligation—if no such obligation is imposed upon us, the next Senate will have to perform that duty. The Senator remarked that the mover (alluding to myself) of the resolution would not be a member of the next Senate, and that he could have no particular interest in the question: whether an election of Printer were to take place now or then must be matter of no moment to him. Sir, it is true that I shall not be a member of the next Senate; and why the Senator from Connecticut has taken occasion to allude to the fact, I cannot well understand. What earthly connection has it with the question pending before the Senate? If the Senator supposes that I have brought forward this resolution for the purpose of enabling me to gratify any feeling of resentment, he is utterly mistaken. He is little acquainted with me if he thinks thus. I could not be controlled by any considerations of that sort. No, sir. I have brought forward the resolution because I regarded it as the imperative duty of the Senate under the laws of Congress now to act upon the subject—to elect a Printer before the close of the session to execute the public printing for the next Congress.

This, and this alone, has induced me to offer the resolution before us. Those charged with the execution of the public printing at this time and their predecessors have alike, since I have been in Congress, treated me with civility. I bear towards none of them any ill will whatever. The Senator has alluded to the present state of popular sentiment, and said that it would be an outrage upon that feeling to have a Printer for the Senate whose political principles were not in accordance with those of the majority of the body. And hence he infers that no election should be made until the organization of the new Senate. My answer to this is, that we are bound to execute the law, and that neither the Senator nor myself have at any time witnessed such an indication of popular sentiment as would go to nullify the provisions of existing statutes. True, the political character of this body will in a short time be changed, and those now in the minority will become the majority of the body. True it is that the recent election of the country has put out this, and will put in another Administration. But does it follow necessarily that hereafter the law is to be abrogated? Is that to be the policy of the coming-in Administration? Are the clear and positive enactments of Congress to be put at defiance? Is there hereafter to be a practical disregard of the injunctions of statutory law? The Senator is doing great injustice to the virtue and intelligence of the country to infer from the result of recent elections that any such feeling or sentiment has been made manifest. Far otherwise the people know the acts and enactments of their public servants. They know their tenor, their force. They acknowledge their obligation, and submit to their direction. They would not, if they could, make the slightest movement to set at naught the authority of Congress. No, sir, there has been no such indication of public sentiment; so far from it, the predominant feeling running through this country is respect for, and submission to, public law and to public authority. The Senator has said that he did not regard the resolutions of 1819 and of 1829 as obligatory upon him; and he gave notice that he would himself, should the Senate now proceed to an election of printer under those resolutions, on the organization of the new Senate, move to proceed to an election in total disregard of the present proceedings. Sir, let it be done; and if done it will be done upon the responsibility of the Senator and his friends. Let it be done, and let the country know why and wherefore it was done. And, sir, I greatly misjudge if the Senator would not find an indication of popular feeling, as the effect of such a proceeding, entirely different from what he anticipates. No, sir, the Senator will not aid in that act, which, if done, cannot fail to call down upon its authors popular indignation. I think the Senator will take no part in any such proceeding.

Mr. President: It may be well for us to look into the history of the legislation of Congress in relation to this matter. We cannot fail to receive much valuable information from such a retrospect. Anterior to 1819 there was no Public Printer elected by the two Houses of Congress. The printing was done by contracts, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Senate and of the Clerk of the House. These contracts were almost universally, from the commencement of the Government to 1819, executed by persons who were the lowest bidders for the work. The persons employed were the mere agents of the Houses to execute the printing for Congress in accordance with their bids, and under the supervision of known officers of Congress. It may be said, with truth, that anterior to 1819, the public printing was all matter of contract. There were, then, for the first thirty years of our existence under our Constitution, no such officers known to the Government as Public Printers. During that time the Senate had its Secretary, its Sergeant-at-Arms, its Doorkeeper; and the House had its Speaker, its Sergeant-at-Arms, and its Doorkeeper—officers known and acknowledged; but the idea of a Printer to execute the printing of Congress being an officer of Congress, was never entertained by any one previous to 1819, nor subsequent to that period until 1833 or 1835, as far as I have been able to ascertain from our legislative history. No, sir—before 1819 they were, and subsequent to 1819 they should be, regarded only as the agents of Congress, to execute, agreeably to the provisions of existing law, the public printing. It may be just as well said, that the printer employed to do the work for any branch of the Executive Department of our Government is thereby attached to and made an officer of that branch, as to say that the person employed to execute the printing of the legislative branch of the Government is an officer of that branch.

But, sir, what was the necessity for the joint resolution of 1819—and whence did it originate? On the fourth of December, 1818, Mr. Wilson, then a member of the Senate from the State of New Jersey, introduced into the Senate the following resolution:

Resolved, That a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress be appointed to consider and report whether any, and if any, what further provisions by law are necessary to insure despatch, accuracy, and neatness in the printing done by order of the two Houses respectively; and they have leave to report by bill."

This resolution passed the Senate, and was, on the 8th of the same month, agreed to on the part of the House with an amendment. Previously Congress had experienced much embarrassment in procuring the printing to be executed. It was neither done with despatch, with neatness, nor with accuracy; and the history of the times shows that there was great complaint; and the action of the two Houses in 1819, upon the resolution, shows that they considered it necessary and proper to make a change in the mode then in existence for procuring the public printing to be done. There was then no doubt expressed as to the power of Congress to regulate this whole matter. There was then no intimation that, by the adoption of some general regulation touching this subject, Congress would be encroaching upon the rights of others. There was then no opinion avowed that one Congress could not prescribe the mode and manner of executing the public printing, which might be required by future Congresses; that one Congress could not designate and appoint a printer to execute the public printing, agreeably to the provisions of existing law, for the next succeeding Congress. These mighty discoveries have been made recently, in more modern days. The committee on the part of the Senate to consider the resolution above referred to, consisted of the mover, Mr. Wilson of New Jersey, Mr. Lacock of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Burrill of Rhode Island; and on the part of the House, by Mr. Pitkin of Connecticut, Mr. Rogers of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Little of Maryland.

The character of that joint committee is a sufficient guarantee that they would not presume to report upon a subject which was not clearly within their jurisdiction. The distinguished character of the chairman on the part of the House must be known to the Senator from Connecticut. And I would sooner distrust my own judgment, than for a moment to believe that such men as Pitkin and Burrill would recommend the adoption of a measure unwarranted by the Constitution. Sir, such an idea would have, at that time, been treated with ridicule. It would have been regarded as preposterous, that Congress could not, by law, prescribe the mode of executing the public printing to be done thereafter, and the prices to be paid therefor, and that they could not have appointed an agent to execute that work for the ensuing Congress. It does not seem, even at this day, to be questioned but that the Congress of 1819 had the power to prescribe the mode and manner for executing all the public printing, and for fixing the rate of compensation; for it is now said that, although all this was rightfully done, yet it was not in the power of that Congress to appoint an agent—a printer for executing the printing for the then next Congress; that the exercise of such a power was unauthorized by the Constitution, and in violation of the rights of the subsequent Congress.

Let us look into this question, and see whether this be a fair and legitimate view of the subject. The joint committee of Congress, herein before named, submitted the following report:

"That regarding the subject committed to them as connected with the convenience of the members, the information of the community, the economy of time and money, and the character of the country, they have given it all the consideration which their other engagements permitted.

"Under all circumstances, the committee have deemed it their duty to recommend that a tariff of prices for every kind of printing required to be done for Congress, be fixed by a joint resolution of the two Houses, to continue in force for two years; and that before the close of the present session, each House make choice by ballot of a printer, to execute its own work during the next Congress. The prices should be adequate to the employment of sufficient capital and workmen to perform the work expeditiously, and to ensure such care and attention as shall give it such a degree of accuracy and elegance as shall not dishonor the literature and typography of the country. With former contracts before us, and with the professional knowledge which may be called in aid, no difficulty would occur in forming the tariff alluded to on principles at once liberal to the printer and advantageous to Congress; and in the selection of its printer, each House would doubtless take especial care to choose a man of capacity, probity, and responsibility. In addition to the bond and security to be required of them for the faithful performance of their obligations, a provision might be added, that in case of any unreasonable delay, another person might be employed to do the work at such a price as the Secretary or the Clerk might be able to get it done for, and that the Public Printer should, respectively, be responsible for any difference between the sum allowed them, and that which it might be necessary to give him."

Here, then, we have the report of this committee; and there is no escape from it—there is no chance for cavil or for misrepresentation. They distinctly recommend in their report that each House, before the close of the present session, (1819,) make choice by ballot of a Printer to execute its own work during the next Congress.

They regard, in their report, most clearly, as they well might, the Public Printer as the mere mechanical instrument to execute the public printing for Congress agreeably to the mode which should be directed by law. In perfect accordance with the spirit and letter of the report, the joint resolution of March, 1819, was introduced, and, after debate, adopted—a resolution not merely of the Senate, but a resolution which was passed with all the forms and sanctions of law. It passed the Senate, it passed the House, and was approved by the President; and unless it was in violation of the Constitution, it was as binding, as obligatory upon subsequent Congresses as any act upon the statute book. So long as it existed as the law of the land, so long was it to be respected and observed. And what was this resolution, which is now discovered to have been passed in disregard of the Constitution, and in violation of the rights of the succeeding Congress? As I have before said, the resolution which was adopted March 3, 1819, contained provisions directing the mode and manner of executing the public printing, and fixed the compensation to be paid therefor, and that part of the joint resolution is now considered as obligatory. I have omitted to extract all that part of the resolution, and have only subjoined what I regard as material to the question before the Senate. It declares:

"That as soon as this resolution shall have been approved by the President of the United States, each House shall proceed to ballot for a Printer to execute its work during the next Congress; and the person having the greatest number of votes shall be considered duly elected, and shall give bond, with sureties, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, respectively, for the prompt, accurate, and neat execution of the work."

Nothing could be more distinctly stated—nothing could more clearly define the duty of a Congress about to terminate. It imposed upon it the obligation to elect by ballot a Printer to execute printing for the next Congress.

It has been questioned whether this resolution required that the Congress about to terminate should elect a Printer for the next Congress; but is there any room for a doubt? As soon "as the resolution shall have been approved by the President of the United States, each House shall proceed to ballot for a Printer for the next Congress."

What resolution was to be approved? Clearly, the resolution which the Congress then in session was competent to pass. That Congress was about to terminate. It had passed a resolution, with all the forms and sanctions of law, directing the mode and manner for executing the public printing, and for fixing the rate of compensation; and it required that as soon as the resolution shall be approved, each House shall proceed to the election of Printer to execute the public printing. It is idle to suppose that the then President of the United States could then approve of any resolution except it were passed by that Congress. The resolution was passed by both Houses of Congress, and was approved by the President on the third of March, 1819, and in the evening of that same day the two Houses proceeded to the election of a Printer to execute the printing for the next Congress, according to the existing provisions of law.

The report of the joint committee, and the joint resolution of Congress, alike express that the purpose was to correct an existing evil in the mode of executing the public printing; and if there could possibly be any room for doubt as to the terms of the joint resolution itself, would it not be fair and even conclusive to refer to the action of Congress upon the adoption of that resolution? Many of those who were the active members of Congress in 1819, at the time of the adoption of the joint resolution, were also members of the subsequent Congress, and must have perfectly well understood the whole object and character of the resolution; and if there could have been any conceivable objection in a constitutional point of view, it would have been then urged. But so far from it, history gives evidence that from that time to the present there has not been the slightest departure from the letter of the joint resolution. It appears that on the 31 of March, 1819, both Houses of Congress, in pursuance of the joint resolution of the same date, proceeded to the election of Public Printer to execute the public printing agreeably to the provisions of the said joint resolution. Gales and Seaton were elected; and on the third of March, 1821, in exact conformity to the joint resolution, each House proceeded to elect a Public Printer for the next Congress. Again Gales and Seaton were elected; and on February 7, 1823, in obedience to the joint resolution of 1819, each House again elected a Public Printer for the next Congress. Gales and Seaton were elected; and in 1825, each House, in obedience to the joint resolution of 1819, elected Gales and Seaton Public Printers for the succeeding Congress. From 1819 to the close of the 18th Congress (in 1825) there was not the least diversity of opinion as to the obligatory character of the joint resolution of 1819. Certain the fact is, that both Houses of Congress, up to that time, faithfully carried out, as far as they could, that resolution; and during the whole of that period, from 1819 to 1825, I have not been able to find the expression of an opinion against the constitutional power of Congress to pass the joint resolution of 1819. But this is not all. From that period to this there has not been any departure in practice from the resolution of 1819. In 1827 the Senate elected Duff Green the Public Printer for the next Congress. And it so turns out, upon examination, that in no instance since the adoption of the joint resolution of 1819, has the Senate of the United States doubted its obligatory character—in no instance have they disregarded its provisions; and shall it now be said that this resolution is not obligatory? Shall it now be said that the Senate may or may not observe the directions of that resolution, according to its own will and pleasure? Has it not received a construction, by the invariable use of the Senate, which we are not at liberty to disregard? Is it not our bounden duty to go back to the period of its adoption, and trace the action of the Senate from that time to the present, and judge whether, in its origin, as well as in its execution, any question has been raised as to its binding and obligatory force?

In 1829, Congress, by the same forms and sanctions of law, passed a resolution amendatory of the resolution of 1819. But it should be borne in mind that it does not repeal any of the provisions of that resolution, save those which are inconsistent with the resolution of 1829; and what are they? Merely changing the result of the election from a plurality to a majority of votes; and also providing that the election should be held within thirty days previous to the termination of every Congress. The mode and the manner of executing the public printing, and the prices paid therefor, are not at all affected by the amendatory resolution of 1829. They remain unchanged to this day; and by all parties have been, from that time to this, regarded as obligatory. That is, if a Printer shall be elected to-day, in pursuance of the joint resolution of 1829, he is to execute the public printing according to the mode, and for the same compensation, prescribed by the resolution of 1819. In order that there may be a perfect understanding of this whole matter, I have subjoined an exact copy of the resolution of 1829. I have done this that the people may understand this subject, and be able to judge whether the next Senate has the power to set at naught the act of the present Congress, and to nullify the law of the land. The resolution is as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, within thirty days before the adjournment of every Congress, each House shall proceed to vote for a Printer to execute its work for and during the succeeding Congress, and the person having the majority of all the votes given shall be considered duly elected; and that so much of the resolution, approved the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, entitled 'A resolution directing the manner in which the printing of Congress shall be executed, fixing the prices thereof, and providing for the appointment of a Printer or Printers,' as is altered by this resolution, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded."

Such has been the legislation of Congress, and I have stated that the uniform usage, the invariable practice of the Senate has been to carry out that legislation. Not only have those resolutions received the sanction of the Senate by their conforming to their requirements, but in 1835 the question was distinctly presented to the Senate. The subject was fully considered and fully debated. And, sir, what was the result? Every political friend of the Senator from Connecticut so voted as to give an obligatory and binding force to the resolutions of 1819 and of 1829. I am aware that my own political friends at that time took a different view of the matter; but the result of that controversy was, as I have stated, that the vote of the majority of the Senate went to sanction the resolutions of 1819 and of 1829. And that majority was made up by gentlemen now members of this Senate, who are among the political associates and friends of the Senator from Connecticut; and the result of that controversy was to elect Gales and Seaton as Public Printers for the then next Congress.

It is true, that after the 18th ballot, Mr. Wright moved to postpone the further balloting to the next session of Congress; and he and his friends voted for the motion; but the friends of the Senator from Connecticut, being in the majority, voted against the motion. And I infer from this fact, that a construction has been solemnly given to the joint resolutions of 1819 and of 1829 which we are not at liberty now to disregard. And, sir, we have not only the resolutions themselves, which every man who will read must admit are in terms imperative, but we have the invariable practice of the Senate, from 1819 to the present day, in strict conformity to the letter of those resolutions; and we have also the solemn, deliberate decision of the Senate in 1835, when the direct question was presented, that the resolutions were obligatory, that the Senate could not disregard them, and the election took place accordingly; and the subsequent Congress acquiesced in that election, although at the commencement of the second session of that Congress the majority of the Senate was politically opposed to the Public Printers. Yet their election was never questioned—the party then in power acquiesced—they considered the question settled by the previous decision of the Senate, and they acquiesced, without a complaint, to the execution of the public printing, through the whole of that Congress, commencing in March, 1835, and ending in March, 1837, by Gales and Seaton. And will the Senator from Connecticut, after all this history, undertake to say that the joint resolutions of 1819 and of 1829 are not to be regarded as obligatory? I should like, after what has taken place, to see some of the friends of the Senator undertake to set aside any election which may now take place in obedience to the resolutions of 1819 and 1829. No, sir. It may be well to deal out this language of menace. It is one thing to say, and another thing to do. There exists too much record touching this matter to induce me to believe for a moment that the Senator himself will be found among those who seek to nullify any proceeding of the Senate which may now take place. In my judgment, it will not be done. And why do I so say? Because the active and political friends of the Senator from 1819 to the present day have justly and properly contended that the resolutions of 1819 and of 1829 were constitutional and obligatory. I have shown what has hitherto been the action of the Senate; and how has it been in the House? Has there been, at any time, any vote, any decision of the House, that the resolution of 1819 was not obligatory upon that body? No, sir; I challenge the Senator to bring forward any such record. It is true, that, since 1835, the resolution has been practically disregarded by the House; and the Senator from Connecticut, if correctly understood, contends that, inasmuch as the House of Representatives have not observed the resolutions of 1819 and of 1829, they are no longer binding upon the Senate. A strange argument indeed! Because the House of Representatives violate the law, it is a justification of the Senate to do the same. This may be good morality with the Senator, but it does not satisfy my mind. The only questions are, whether the resolutions be or be not obligatory—whether they are or are not constitutional; not whether this or that man—this or that body of men—have practically disregarded them. Mr. President, I hold that the resolutions are binding, and sure I am that the Senator so regarded them in 1833. We were then both members of the House of Representatives; and on the 15th day of February, 1833, after thirteen unsuccessful ballots for Public Printer, a motion was made by Mr. Boon of Indiana to postpone further proceedings until the second day of March ensuing, within the period of the Congress. And the Senator voted against the motion. I voted for it. If the Senator had then believed, as he now professes to believe, that the resolutions were unconstitutional, is it not singular that he should have then voted for an election in violation of that same Constitution? And the result of the fourteenth ballot secured the election of his friends, Gales and Seaton. In my judgment, Congress was then bound, as it is now bound, to elect a Printer to execute the public printing for the next Congress. On the 9th of February, 1835, Mr. McKinley, now one of the Judges of our Supreme Court, moved that "the House will, on Thursday next, proceed to the election of Printer for the House of Representatives of the next Congress, viva voce." I voted to carry into effect that resolution. But, mark it, Mr. President, it was ultimately defeated by the political friends of the Senator from Connecticut; and this was the first interruption of the practice of the House under the joint resolutions of 1819 and 1829, of electing a Printer for the succeeding Congress. It so happened that the resolution was not again reached during that session. From that time the House of Representatives, I freely admit, have not, at the close of one Congress, elected a printer for the succeeding Congress. But, on examination, it will be found to be owing to the press of business, and not to any avowed doubt of the binding force of the resolutions of 1819 and 1829. As evidence that I am correct in my view of the sentiment and feeling of the House, I subjoin the following extracts from a speech made in 1835, by Mr. EVANS of Maine, a distinguished member of the House, and soon to become a member of this body:

"Mr. EVANS moved the following amendment: Strike out viva voce, and insert, 'under the authority of the joint resolution, approved March 3, 1819.'"

"The amendment having been read,

"Mr. EVANS said it seemed obvious to him that, if the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Alabama ought to pass at all, it should pass in the shape Mr. E. proposed. If not, he would inquire of the honorable mover, by aid under what authority the House could undertake to go into the election of Printer at all for the next Congress? There was none except that derived from the resolution of 1819, as amended by the joint resolution of the 5th of February, 1829. Now, the very introduction of the resolution by the honorable member from Alabama recognised the force of those resolutions. It was by virtue of those two joint resolutions alone that one Congress had the right to appoint a Printer for the succeeding one, and the phraseology proposed by Mr. E. was the only phraseology that could consistently be used. He begged leave, also, to remind the House that such was the phraseology adopted ever since the former joint resolution was adopted. The motion had always been made and agreed to, that on such a day the House would proceed to the election of Printer under the authority of the joint resolution of the 3d March, 1819; and to entitle the House to do so on the present occasion, the same phraseology must be made use of."

"Gentlemen had said, on a former occasion, when this subject came up incidentally for consideration, that the resolution of 1819 was temporary in its nature, and limited to two years. As an answer to that, he could only say that it was never considered so, neither by the then, nor by the succeeding Congress, each of whom regarded it as binding upon themselves, and upon the succeeding Congress. Even so lately as 1829, the journals of the House show this, wherein it was stated that the House proceeded to the election of Printer in obedience to the joint resolution of 1819; and this was the phraseology for several years after the adoption of that resolution. Then if that is resolution be in force, and had not been repealed, we derived the only authority we had to choose a Printer for the next session from these two resolutions.

"The next question that came up for consideration was, whether the Printer was an officer of the House, or not. Mr. E. would not go into this at any length; but it was enough for the justification of his own vote to say that he did not consider the Printer an officer within the meaning of that clause in the Constitution giving each House the right to appoint its officers, any more than the person who supplied the House with stationery, or fuel, or furniture. In Mr. E.'s judgment, it stood upon the same principle." "He thought they would be incurring great hazard by repealing the joint resolution, or altering the present mode in any way at this late hour. At present he believed the existing mode the best. At all events, he was not assured that a better could be devised."

I fully concur in opinion with the honorable gentleman, from whose speech in 1835 I have made such liberal quotations; and it is a little remarkable that in the debate of the House of Representatives which has taken place upon the subject of the joint resolutions of 1819 and of 1829, and in the debate which has taken place in the Senate heretofore upon this same question, not a political friend of the Senator from Connecticut has ever contended that the passage of those resolutions was unauthorized by the Constitution—that they were not obligatory in their character. No, sir, their doctrine, as avowed, as expressed, has been entirely a different doctrine. I have, Mr. President, nothing further to say with reference to the constitutionality, and with reference to the force and obligation, of the joint resolutions of 1819 and of 1829. They have been transcribed, and are incorporated in my speech. The action of both Houses under the resolution of 1819, up to 1829, has been uniform; and the action of the Senate has been alike uniform up even to this day. I have placed this record before the people, and I have shown the deliberate decision of the Senate on this very question in 1835, and the acquiescence in that decision; and with all these facts I am willing to leave this matter to our masters. And notwithstanding what the Senator says about the state of popular opinion, I greatly misjudge if he will not find, now and hereafter, opinion and duty co-operating to sustain the law and the authority of our Government.

The Senator says that there is no necessity, at this time, for the passage of the resolution which I have had the honor to offer to the Senate, inasmuch as the new Senate will assemble here in a very few days; and that our Public Printer, now in office, will continue to the 4th of March, at which time the new Senate will be in session. Suppose the fact to be as stated by the Senator, does it exonerate us from the performance of our duty in obedience to the resolutions of 1819 and of 1829? No, sir. Those resolutions being imperative, we are bound now to proceed to the election, whether there be, or be not, any absolute necessity to make the appointment. But even if the law was not imperative, I should differ altogether with the Senator from Connecticut as to the necessity of making the election at this time. We have had experience upon this matter. At the commencement of the 24th Congress, there was an election of Printer for the House; and was he able to perform the service required? No, sir. Being unprepared for such an important, for such a responsible, for such an expensive undertaking, he was at once obliged to give over the public printing to others. And suppose that, on the 4th of March next, the Senate should elect Mr. Ritchie, of Richmond, or some one not having been employed to execute the public printing, would they be prepared to enter at once upon the service? No, sir. It requires time, labor, and a great outlay, to be prepared to execute the work. So said the joint committee in 1819; and to insure "despatch, accuracy, and neatness," in conducting the public printing, they recommended an election of one Congress for the service of another; and so has every succeeding one done. There would then be, looking merely to the necessity of the case, a fitness to select the Public Printer now to execute the printing for the next Congress. I trust it will be done; and all that the Senator has said upon the inexpediency of proceeding to the election, has already been answered. If the law enjoins upon us the duty to make the election, it should be done. If there is no positive and explicit law of requirement, then I say, necessarily, convenience, and economy, demand that we should now proceed to the election; and it should be done. In bringing forward the resolution, I did what I felt to be my duty. I did it unsolicited and unadvised. I have now submitted the considerations which induced me to offer the resolution, and I leave the matter to the Senate to dispose of according to their judgment and discretion.

Mr. HUNTINGTON replied that there was no difference between the Senator and himself as to the facts—indeed, there could be none, as the record spoke the truth. The practice, he admitted, under the resolution of 1819, had been to appoint a Printer prior to the next Congress, in order that sufficient time might be given the person appointed to make all the necessary arrangements; but now no such necessity existed. The resolution was nothing more than a tacit understanding between the two bodies, one of which had since virtually annulled it, having never acted under it since 1833. Was it, therefore, to be considered binding on the Senate? In the few remarks made by him the other day, he contended that the resolution was not compulsory; and he had then asked if it was necessary, expedient, or just, for an Administration going out of power to palm an obnoxious individual on a majority that was coming into power. He had shown that it was not necessary, because the present Printer would act until the 4th of March. Was it then expedient or just to appoint a Printer, when the moral certainty was that the dominant party, acting under its constitutional right, would annul it at appointment the next Congress? These were the grounds he had taken, and he certainly did not think them untenable. The Senator had referred to the journals of the House, with a view, as he supposed, to fix the charge of inconsistency upon him. Now he was not in the habit of referring to journals to look for the votes of Senators; but since his vote on that occasion had been alluded to, he would beg leave to show from the record how the case stood. On the 11th February, 1833, a motion was made to go into the election of Printer, (the Senator and himself were then members of the other branch,) but no election was held until the 14th of that month, when ten ballots were had without a choice being effected. On the 15th a motion was again made to proceed to the election, when Mr. Hall of North Carolina (he believed it was) moved to postpone the election until the first Thursday in the next session. Mr. Williams, of the same State, moved to lay that motion on the table, and Mr. Hall withdrew it. Mr. Boon then moved to postpone it until the 2d March; on which motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and it was decided in the negative, the Senator (Mr. HUBBARD) voting for the postponement, and himself against it. The ground on which I acted (said Mr. H.) was, that if the election were to take place, it was better to hold it at once than to postpone it until within one day of the close of the session. Now if the Senator then considered the joint resolution obligatory, why did he vote to postpone it? If there was any inconsistency, the Senator is certainly more justly chargeable with it than I am.

Mr. SEVIER said he was not a little amused with the observations of the two Senators, each busy in endeavoring to show he had voted right on former occasions. The amount of the matter was, that they intended to elect their Printer if they could, and the other party, he presumed, would prevent it if it could. It was a question of power altogether; and as they had the power then, they meant to exercise it, for it would not be very long that they should retain it. When in the ascendancy, he made it a rule to take care of the interests of his political friends, and would vote for Blair and Rives, and elect them if he could. Whenever the power was lost, he submitted like a man with the best grace imaginable.

Mr. HENDERSON was understood to say, in effect, that if the election was not indispensable at this time to the interests of the Senate, it would be improper to proceed with it. Nothing appeared to him more absurd than that the Senate was bound by the joint resolution of 1819. The right was inherent in both bodies to choose their officers, independent of any resolution, and it was wrong to suppose that one body was to be bound by the proceedings of the other.

Mr. MANGUM had hoped this matter would not have been pressed. He reminded the Senate that on previous occasions, when these elections had been made, they were not made by a majority of one political complexion for their successors of a different political party: nowever, if the resolution had always been treated in good faith, he should not stand there to justify their violation; but having been disregarded by one branch of Congress, he should consider them abrogated on this occasion. Yet he did not stand there to impugn the House for what it had done; for his opinion was, that the officers of the House should either represent the opinions of that body, or, at least, not conflict with them. Suppose a rule were adopted to appoint the committees in advance—the committees, in his opinion, in every legislative body, should represent the opinions of that body—and would then their successors be bound to retain committees of their predecessors' appointment? And so in respect to their Printer, who, it had been decided, was an officer of the House, and therefore they possessed the constitutional right to make or unmake, to retain or to remove. He had no doubt the resolution of 1819 was passed with the motive which had been mentioned—that the person appointed might lay in printing materials and make preparation to discharge his duties; but now they were not likely to be subjected to any inconvenience of that sort; but if they were, he would rather submit to it than that this election should now take place, for he should consider it as an outrage on the recent demonstrations of public sentiment, and on the body so soon to come there. Viewing it in this light, he could only say for one, in a spirit of candor, that if gentlemen pressed this motion, and went into an election, which, having the power, they could do, as soon as a body arrived there of a different opinion, and he were in the dominant party, he should not only feel it to be his right, but his duty, to seek to make a change. He made this declaration that there might be no outlays for materials, for he should move a reversal of the appointment, and the election of such a one as might be in accordance with the deliberate will of the Senate hereafter to assemble, or, at all events, of one who would not be obnoxious to the whole of them.

Mr. SEVIER said he had never known an instance of any party being in power that did not exercise that power for its own benefit; and it was in vain to tell him now to pursue a different course. He thought there was no analogy between the appointment of committees and of Public Printer—the latter contracted to do the work at a given price, for which he entered into bonds. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] had said he would conceive it a party outrage to select a Printer adverse to the Senator's principles. Now it was well known that this had always been done. He might advert to the time when Gales and Seaton and also Duff Green were Printers; and had not each of those Printers in turn been elected at the close of sessions when their party would not be in power in the succeeding Congress, and had any thing been said or done in the premises? The Senator now gives us notice that when he comes into power, he shall annul our choice; in other words, that he will expunge and draw black lines against our Printer. Sir, said Mr. S. I hardly think he will do that, as many of his own party were so averse to that measure, particularly my friend from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD] who has pledged himself for every year he remains in the body to bring forward his measure to expunge the great expunger. That Senator at least will not lend his aid to expunge, though our Printer may be against his political creed.

Mr. BAYARD said that if a person were appointed who had indulged in the most unmeasured detraction and abuse of the party soon to be the majority, however unpalatable his removal might be, he would perform it. But was the resolution of 1819 obligatory on this body? In order to settle that question, it was necessary to ascertain the relation in which the Printer stood to this body. He contended that the Printer was an officer of the Senate to multiply copies of their documents by his types and presses, which must be done by clerks if the art of printing had not been discovered. And next, what was the tenure of the office?—for that was as much an essence of the office as the duties to be performed. The constitutional tenure of all officers was "at will and pleasure," and no law of Congress could change the character of the Constitution. Well, then, in the third place, was it wise in the present majority to exercise the mere power they possessed to force on the Senate for the next Congress an individual that was so highly obnoxious to them? Was it expedient to do it? It certainly was not; for the Senate might rely that they (the future majority) would never submit to what the present majority had no right to impose on them. Would the Senate, then, exercise a power which must be nugatory in its results, and force a spy into the camp? If they did, he did not say they would hang him, but he assured the Senate they would get rid of him.

Mr. LINN called the attention of the Senate to the fact that this day was set apart for the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky for the repeal of the Independent Treasury act, and he hoped it was not intended by this discussion to slide over that and the bankrupt bill, which was a measure of much greater importance. He would also remind them that at this stage of the session there were thirteen special orders of the utmost consequence, to be disposed of, beside a great amount of other business, and, therefore, he wished this question to be speedily disposed of.

Mr. PRENTISS said his intention was to vote for the postponement. If the resolution of 1819 were of force, he, for one, would carry it out, but he did not so regard it. He thought the Printer was an officer of the Senate within the sense of the Constitution.

Mr. DIXON deemed this too important a question on which to give a silent vote; and he therefore gave his reasons at length for opposing the appointment of a Printer at the present session. He said there was no doubt that the printer for the Senate is exclusively an officer of the Senate. He is appointed by the Senate; all his labors are prescribed and directed by them, and for them only. Besides, he holds his office at the will and pleasure of the Senate, for they can remove him when they please. If that does not constitute him an officer of the Senate, nothing can make any man an officer of the body. The power to make the appointment is derived from the Constitution. It is conferred on the Senate alone. It is not a power to be divided or exercised in conjunction with any other branch of the Government, or to be compromised by any conventional arrangements. The provision of the Constitution that the Senate shall choose their officers, well comports with that familiar principle recognized in conferring agency and delegating power. Governments appoint their officers, principals appoint their agents, and masters appoint their servants. But it is said the Senate have qualified this exclusive power, and, by joint legislation, have changed the mode of exercising it. That by a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress, adopted in 1819, it has been provided that each House shall elect its printer for the next Congress; whereby it becomes the duty of the Senate to elect a printer at this time—not for the present, but for the next Congress. It would seem strange that a joint resolution should be passed for the regulation of that which could only be the subject of individual control. But there were reasons then existing for that joint resolution, which afterwards ceased; which reasons probably prevented any thorough consideration of the constitutional objections. The saving of expense of printing, as well as the better execution of the work, was contemplated by the joint arrangement; and another consideration was the want of any printing establishment here at that time, (in 1819,) with sufficient machinery and extent of means to perform the work required, without the allowance of long time to prepare for it. But the other House were doubtless disappointed in their anticipation of benefits from that joint resolution—for it is now said that since it has been disregarded in the other House, better and more economical arrangements have been made; and the House have not conformed to the provisions of the joint resolution since 1835. Now why have they not conformed to it? One answer is, that the reasons which had given rise to it had ceased; and hence the rule should cease. But doubtless the more satisfactory reason was, the resolution was deemed unconstitutional; it was not binding, and of course required no formal legislation to repeal it. Therefore, from 1835, it has been set aside in that branch of the Legislature; which amounts, as far as they can affect it, to a complete abrogation of the resolution. There is no power now to enforce its execution, and of course it has become a dead letter. It is true, sir, that the Senate continued to practise upon that joint resolution long after it was discontinued and violated in the other House. But when the Senate's action was in conformity with it in 1835, the resolution had not then been discontinued in the House. There was, at that time, some reasons, therefore, why the Senate should adhere to it; and they then appointed a printer for the next Congress. But is that any reason why they should do the same now, after the resolution has been five years discontinued in the other House, not only from the consideration that it had ceased to be useful, but from the higher consideration that it was unconstitutional?

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he had not intended to say a word upon this occasion; but sentiments and purposes so extraordinary had been avowed by gentlemen on the other side, that he could no longer remain silent. Perhaps the most singular notion of all that had been uttered fell from the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. DIXON,] who had just taken his seat. That gentleman maintains that the law which governs the election of Public Printer, is virtually repealed; and how? Why, simply by the non-user of one branch of Congress! Is not this extraordinary doctrine indeed? Both Houses unite in passing a law, according to all the forms of the Constitution; even the approval of the Executive has been sought and obtained; and the gentleman sagely maintains the idea, that because one branch of Congress disregards it, or does not carry it out in practice for a few years, it is, in effect, repealed! Mr. C. said this was certainly an entirely novel mode of repeal. He had always before supposed that it required the same power, and the same forms, to repeal a law, that it did to make it. Why, according to this doctrine, sir, we may soon be without law altogether. It did seem to him to be most astonishing doctrine.

Sir, said Mr. C. how stands the matter? On the 3d of March, 1819, a joint resolution passed, "directing the manner in which the printing of Congress shall be executed, fixing the prices thereof, and providing for the appointment of a printer or printers." This resolution required the election of a printer or printers for the then ensuing Congress, before the adjournment. The election accordingly took place, and had been made biennially thereafter, a few days before the close of every Congress, for the succeeding one, up to the 5th of February, 1829, when another joint resolution was approved by the Executive, amendatory to that of 1819. This last resolution is imperative, "that, within thirty days before the adjournment of every Congress, each House shall proceed to vote for a printer to execute its work for and during the succeeding Congress," &c. This is the only change or qualification which has been made in the law of 1819, since its enactment. Both resolutions were regularly passed through each House of Congress, and were approved by the President—became, and now remain, the law of the land. Yet, sir, what do we now hear from gentlemen of the other side? Why, they not only protest against an election of a Printer to the Senate, pursuant to this law, but they admonish us of the consequences if we proceed to make one. Yes, sir, almost every gentleman of the Opposition who has spoken upon the subject—amounting to some four or five—has threatened us with the expulsion of whomsoever we may elect, so soon as they get into power. Such is the very commendable and modest course of the party which claims all the decency, and all the morality and learning, and boasts of its devotion to the supremacy of the law. Notwithstanding the undeniable existence of the law, and though we may elect a Printer in strict accordance with its provisions, they tell us they will turn him out, whenever they get the power. Mr. C. said he had often heard the remark—proverb it might be called—of “feeling might, and forgetting right.” This was supposed to be the case with some who were in power; but the gentlemen on the other side go beyond this; they feel their might in anticipation; they cannot wait till they get into power; they warn us that they will inflict the penalty of expulsion against our Printer, if we go on to execute the law of the land, in conformity with invariable custom since its enactment. On the 3d of next month, twenty-two years will have elapsed since the passage of the law of 1819; and, during all that time, no matter what party has had the majority, the Senate has uniformly elected its Printer, at the same period, for the succeeding Congress.

Mr. C. asked, on what ground is it that gentlemen have given us the modest intimations with which we have been favored on this occasion? Why, they assumed that because the Constitution gives to each House the power to choose its own officers, they cannot unite in passing a law for the appointment of any person, in advance, to perform merely mechanical duties—duties which presuppose the necessity of laying in materials, and making preparation for the performance of duties, before their commencement. Mr. C. denied that the Printer of either House was necessarily to be regarded as an officer, in the Constitutional sense of that term. The Constitution had reference to the presiding officers of the two Houses—the Secretary, Clerks, Doorkeepers, and such as were charged with the performance of duties immediately within the rooms we occupy. The most that could be said of the Printer was, Mr. C. contended, that he was a quasi officer, but no more our officer than the man who drives a cart in the transportation of our documents, books, and papers. Upon any other view of the Constitution, he said, you might make every individual, who did any other mechanical duty, or rendered any other service beyond these walls to facilitate our business, an officer. If the law as it stood was objectionable, why did not those who so regarded it bring in a proposition for its repeal or modification? Was it not strange, after the operation of the existing law for twenty-two years, with the acquiescence of all parties, under the various changes which had taken place within that period, and without even a motion to inquire into the expediency of its repeal or modification, that we should now hear it boldly declared by gentlemen that it must not be carried into execution; and that if it be executed, they will treat it as a nullity? Yes, (said Mr. C.) gentlemen plainly tell us that they will disregard the law, and trample it under their feet, when it is not likely to be executed to their taste, and minister to their views.

And on what ground did they object to its execution? Why, simply because the person who, it was supposed, would be appointed, happened to be obnoxious to certain honorable gentlemen. And would not the person, that the gentlemen on the opposite side would appoint, probably be equally obnoxious to a large minority? Gentlemen had alluded to the character of the paper which is published by the present Printers to the Senate, and were pleased to denounce it for what they termed its slander and abuse, which had been sent forth in its columns. Now, he cared not which of the political papers they took, published in this city on their side, he ventured to say, as much slander and abuse—ay, and as infamous libels, to adopt the language used by one of the gentlemen—could be found in their columns, within the last six months, as had ever been published to the world through those of any other paper. Even the paper which had been held up by the party to which the gentleman belonged as the model of decency, had contained, during the last summer and fall, some of the most nefarious falsehoods and libels which had ever disgraced the columns of any party paper. He thought the doctrines advanced came with a bad grace from those who complained so much of the expunging operation, which had been alluded to in the debate. It accorded very badly with their boasted deference and respect for law and order, when, in defiance of law, and the uniform practice under it for so many years, they declared their predetermination to displace the person that might now be appointed—notens volens—right or wrong—because, forsooth, he was politically obnoxious. Well, sir, if gentlemen think proper to pursue such a course, let them do it, when they possess the power they anticipate; for one, said Mr. C. no threat of such a character shall deter me from the performance of a duty imposed by the law of the land.

Mr. MERRICK did not conceive himself bound by the joint resolution of 1819. The right of Congress to appoint its own officers was an inherent right, and could not be restricted by any resolution whatever. In the present case the Senator from Arkansas had stated the principles on which he and his party were acting—it was a question of party power, and the avowal had been frank and honorable on the part of that Senator. But as the Senator said he was determined to elect his Printer when he had the power, he (Mr. M.) hoped he would be excused for exercising the same privilege when the next came into power, and permit the Senate to select its own officers.

Mr. MANGUM again addressed the Senate, denying that the resolution of 1819 was considered in the light of a compulsory law, but as a mere tacit understanding of the two branches of the National Legislature. The Constitution was exceedingly clear on this right of Congress, and no resolution or law could so act as to deprive it of that right. Mr. M. alluded to a case on the Executive journal, where, owing, as it was thought, to the too frequent appointments by the Executive of persons from the old States to fill offices in the new, there had been a resolution passed by the Senate refusing to ratify in any case where the rule was departed from. It was thought wrong in principle to make appointments from old States when good material was to be found in the new, and he (Mr. M.) had always so considered it. No one would venture to say, however, that the Executive right was restricted by the passage of the resolution. It was considered a mere indication of the public feeling. Gen. Jackson, who was then President, was unwilling to make appointments while that resolution remained, and finally refused to do so until it was rescinded. The President had the right on his side. The resolution was rescinded, (said Mr. M.) and I voted for it. In the present case, if the rule had been acquiesced in by both Houses, then there could be no cause for cavil; but the right of Congress to select its own officers cannot even be restricted, much less abrogated. It was a question now of political power, and not having tasted any thing of the kind for some years, he felt disposed to exercise a little in this case. Without meaning to be personal, he affirmed that the appointment of certain individuals to the office of Public Printer would be odious to the country, and highly offensive to the body. He would not be understood as being favorable to a general proscription; on the contrary, he avowed that where an officer in his ministerial capacity had not abused his office or his trust, nor prostituted his office to political purposes, had not improperly interfered in the elective franchise, and was honest and capable, he would set his face against his removal. He considered that a contrary course would be opening the door to the corrupt followers of all parties to demand their reward; that it would be dangerous to our institutions and subversive of public liberty. Gentlemen said they had the power now, and would exercise it. Where is the necessity of doing so, on the very eve of its departure from them, when there was a moral certainty that their appointment would be annulled on the next meeting of Congress?

The question being about to be put—

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said that he had hoped this resolution would not have been pressed. He had hoped at this late hour of the session it would not have been attempted by an expiring Administration to force the Senate into an election of Printers who were to act, not for those at present in power, but for the succeeding Administration. He protested against the doctrine laid down by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. SEVIER] that those in power were determined to use their power as long as they could, leaving it to their successors to do the same. Especially when it was known that the individuals to be appointed were so utterly odious to those who were in a few days to succeed to the possession of the Government, that, if they were going to act like men and fearlessly discharge their duty, it was impossible they could allow such persons to remain in office for one single moment. I will now say, exclaimed Mr. C. that so far as I know the sentiments of my friends, there is not one of us who is not firmly and irrevocably determined, if the election is rescindable, to rescind it.

Mr. SEVIER expressed surprise at the remarks which had fallen from the Senator from Kentucky. Was it not perfectly well known that a party going out of power, in making appointments to office never inquired whether the persons appointed would be agreeable or not to the party coming into power? In the House of Representatives, just before the political change which brought General Jackson into power, Gales and Seaton had been appointed Public Printers, and when the dominant party came in, these gentlemen were suffered to remain in office for two years longer.

Were not nominations sent in by Mr. Adams to the very last hour of his term? The nomination of Mr. Burton of North Carolina, for the appointment of Governor of Arkansas, had been sent in by the Senator from Kentucky, who was at that time Secretary of State. But this, with all the other nominations, was laid on the table by the opposite party, who then had a majority in the Senate. Was the measure now proposed such a new and unprecedented thing that the Senator need be surprised at its being pressed at this time? At the close of the term of the elder Adams, had not nominations been made by him of judges at midnight on the third of March, and did not the Senate confirm the nominations? Some of the judges so appointed were in office to this hour. Was there any thing strange that it was proposed by those going out of power to elect their Printer while they were able to do it? He was really amused to see two old and experienced Senators, like the gentleman from New Hampshire and the gentleman from Kentucky, cajoling and coquetting about a thing that every body could understand. He was not for mincing matters in that way. What he had before stated were facts, which had since been avowed by every body but the Senator from Kentucky, and he had adduced a case in point, where a nomination had come in, at the last hour, from the Senator himself. He did not complain of this. He had thought at the time the nomination to be a very good one; and, so far as he was concerned, he would have been very willing to have the individual named as Governor of Arkansas, but that nomination, together with all others similarly made, had been laid on the table.

The Senator had told them about the party coming into power turning out Mr. Blair, (he supposed he was the man to be chosen—Mr. S. should vote for him,) if he should be appointed, the first moment they had the power to do it. Well, and were they to be deterred by threats like these? Not at all. He expected they would turn him out; and not him only, but whomsoever else they pleased. He cared nothing for this; he spoke not on his own account; for happily he never had held any office other than that the people had given him, and therefore, he could speak with the greater freedom. If, indeed, there happened to be in any office of this Government a man who had never in his life displeased the Whigs, he supposed he might be left to stand as a solitary monument of Whig forbearance. But as for the other party, they expected to be turned out, from one end of the country to the other. And, for one, he should disown them if they whimpered under it; he was very sure he should not. So far from it, he would furnish the gentlemen with the names of all who held office in his district. They might turn them out, every man, and they would hear no complaint. You have got the power, (cried Mr. S.) and I expect you will use it. You have got some hungry friends there, who have been eagerly waiting these twelve years, and now you may provide for them. I should, were I in like circumstances. I am not to be gulled by this talk about forbearance. For these fourteen years past all parties on all sides have exercised power as long as they had it; and I expect they will continue to do so always. Turn out Blair if you choose. We will elect him, and then you may turn him out as fast as you like.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky. I have but one or two words to say in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas. That gentleman has entirely misquoted the expression used by me some days since. What I said then I say now—that, in my judgment, every man who is not faithful, capable, and honest, and who has not abstained from using the power he derives from the possession of office to interfere with the freedom of elections, ought to be expelled from the office he has abused: I never said that all ought to be turned out who had displeased the Whigs. What will be done by the new Administration I do not know: but I express my own opinion openly, in the face of the world. The Senator referred to the appointment of what were styled "the midnight judges" in the time of the elder Adams: but that was not like this case. Those appointments were made to fill existing vacancies: it was a case where offices had been created by law and were not filled. Mr. Adams had a constitutional right to nominate persons to fill them. But does not the Senator know that very act of appointing those judges in the last moment of an expiring Administration produced one universal burst of indignation throughout the country; and that one amongst the earliest measures of Mr. Jefferson's administration was a motion made by a distinguished and illustrious Senator from my own State, now no more, to repeal that act? And what was the case under the younger Adams? I have no recollection of any nominations made by him to fill existing vacancies. I recollect as one the case of my colleague, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] who was nominated as a Judge of the Supreme Court, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Judge Trimble; it was so with the nomination of the Governor of Arkansas, and with all the other nominations referred to by the Senator. To carry on the machine of Government, it was the duty of the President to nominate, whenever a vacancy occurred. But is that this case? Here is an office filled; and the Senator who proposes an election is himself going out of his seat in the Senate on the 31 of March next. I presume it will be sustained by many gentlemen in a precisely similar situation. Here is an election to be held, not to fill a vacancy, for there is no vacancy, but to anticipate now a vacancy, which will not occur till a future and a distant day. For what? for what? I put it to the candor of gentlemen—can they think that this is right? Of all the delicate relations which can subsist between a public body like this and any of its officers, that which it sustains to the printer of its documents is the most delicate. That is not at all like the cases referred to. Here has been a revolution, a great civil revolution—peaceful, it is true—but still a revolution; and now, just at the last moment, when a repudiated Administration still holds possession of power, they propose, not for their own accommodation—for before the appointment takes practical effect they will be no longer in power—but simply because they have the naked power to do it, to force upon the succeeding administration an individual known to be abhorrent to all the feelings of their hearts, insomuch that nothing can be conceived more unacceptable to them than his occupation of that office. And this at the moment we are told, that all party animosities should cease, that we should forget that we have been opponents, and should part like brothers. Gentlemen who have held the Government for twelve long years, in this last agonized moment of departing power, make this attempt to force upon us, against all our feelings, this their special favorite, their cherished pampered Government organ! It is under these circumstances that I tell them, in my own name, and as far as I am acquainted with their sentiments, in the name of all my friends around me, that we should regard ourselves as recreant to our duty if we did not, the first moment we possess the power, turn him out, and put in his place a man more acceptable to those who will then occupy these seats. And now, I give this timely notice to the gentleman who presses this measure, to the individual proposed, and to all concerned, that no claims for damages may arise hereafter.

Mr. KER gave his reasons for the vote he should give, at some length, and said that, having no accounts to settle for any past inconsistent votes in relation to this matter, as some gentlemen seemed to have, he should record his vote, first, in favor of the amendment of his friend from Connecticut, to postpone the further consideration of the resolution till the 4th day of March next, and then, if it became necessary, against the resolution itself; and, at the proper time, when, in his judgment, the convenience of this body, and justice and propriety, as they regard the rights of the new Senators soon to come in, shall require an election of a Printer, he should freely cast his vote for that individual on whom he might think proper to bestow his preference.

Mr. NORVELL said that he did not rise to participate in the debate or the merits of the question before the Senate. That branch of the subject had been exhausted. He rose to say, that the indications which had appeared in the remarks of Senators on the other side, in the progress of the proceedings this morning, afforded a presage of their conduct, when they might come into the administration, in relation to the principle which they had so often and so long denounced, that "to the victors belong the spoils of office." He had heard enough to satisfy him that they would act upon that maxim. He trusted that they would, as their friends had done in every State in which they had obtained a temporary ascendancy, make a general change. He hoped that they would sweep, as with a tornado, every political opponent, every Democratic Republican, from office, from Maine to Georgia. They would thus demonstrate the insincerity of their professions. They would only carry out their practices, wherever they had obtained power, in opposition to their declarations when out of power.

Mr. PRESTON. I hope not. I hope and believe no such thing. It may do very well as coming from that quarter; it is natural enough that they should hope we shall follow their example; but I have heard no such determination avowed; no such sentiment even hinted at. I protest against it; it is not Whig doctrine; the Administration coming into power reject and repudiate the infamous maxim that to the victors belong the spoils. The spoils?—what spoils? The spoils of our common country? The spoils of our brethren and fellow-citizens? Is the country a vanquished country? God forbid. I should as soon think of making spoil out of the possessions of my own family. Too long have we seen the principle acted upon all over the country; we come into power repudiating it from the very bottom of our hearts.

Mr. NORVELL. I hope so.

The gentleman hopes so; just now he hoped not. Whatever his hopes or his fears may be, our course is independent of them, and will be shaped on far higher principles than those he has ascribed to us. Can any man object to the sentiment which the potential voice of my honorable friend from Kentucky—a voice that is the echo of patriotism and honor, has just made to ring through this hall? Why should any one object to the doctrine that a man who is not honest, nor capable, and who has prostituted the power of his office to subserve the purposes of party, and to interfere with the freedom of elections, should be turned out of the office he has abused? Is there any thing in principles of justice or policy, any thing in the highest code of morals, to forbid this? Is this sweeping the land like a tornado? Is this practising on the principle that to the victors belong the spoils? Did not the distinguished person, who is to be advanced to the head of the Government, expressly take ground against such a sentiment in a bill he introduced into Congress? Do not his sentiments stand recorded against it? We practise on a principle like that? No, sir, no; this system of proscription is itself to be proscribed. I stand on that ground: and so help me God, I will, so far as I am concerned, act upon it. I believe those who are to be at the head of the Government have put themselves upon the same ground. They come into power, not to divide the spoils of the country among the members of a faction. When that principle is avowed and followed, we cease from that moment to be a Government and a people: we pass into a conquered nation, and a conquering faction, that seizes the power and the forms of Government only for the gratification of cupidity and revenge. Never have I read in all the pages of political profligacy a sentiment so detestable as that the Senator has ascribed to us. Machiavel himself never conceived so foul a maxim, or dared to avow it. The author of "The Prince" would blush to utter such a thought.

There is, at the bottom of all this, a principle which has entered, in some sort, into the action of this Government: I mean the principle that public offices are not trusts held for the benefit of the people, but mere mercenary rewards for political partisans, and that in bestowing them our eye is to be directed only to the salary which accompanies them. I reject the principle. I protest against it. I regard office as a sacred trust, and the salary attached to the office as a mere incidental thing. I hold that, in appointing a man to office, it is not the interests of the man that are to be looked at, but those of the party for whose benefit the trust is conferred, namely, the people. I hold the opposite to be a most dangerous principle, and, for one, I tell gentlemen in advance that I will oppose the principle wherever I meet it. I shall resist and denounce all giving of office as a political reward, or turning out of office for mere political opinion. I admit that it may often be a very delicate task to decide in what case an individual holding office has acted improperly in the expression of his political opinions; when he has and when he has not transcended the line of his duty in mingling in the party strifes of the day. But I hold it to be a Whig doctrine, the doctrine on which General Harrison, as President of the United States, means to stand, that for mere political opinion no man is to be proscribed.

In the present case, I would apply the doctrine avowed by the Senator from Kentucky, that when a man has abused the power derived from his office, he should be turned out of office.

And here let me say what I believe. It will be asked, in reference to those who hold office, whether they have used the power of these offices for party purposes; if they have not, and are honest, capable, and faithful, they will not be disturbed.

[Here several voices on the other side of the Senate were heard to say: "There is no such case—there never will be."]

I admit it may be difficult to decide. Alas for poor, frail, fallen human nature! It is hard to judge a political opponent as we ourselves would be judged. The strong feelings of the heart will steal in and bias the judgment, in a greater or a less degree. All that can be asked is, that we put ourselves on a sense of duty—that we endeavor to act justly; and then, when a man is shown to us to have flagitiously departed from his duty as a public officer, and made himself a busy and a noisy partisan, punish him by removing him from office. I do not, however, pretend to set up a standard of conduct for my party. I know there will be mistakes; mistakes will happen to the most upright,

All I claim is, that we shall act on principle, not from passion.

In the present case, the individual now employed as Printer to the Senate may be, on many accounts, peculiarly disagreeable to those who are soon to be a majority here; and let it be remembered that he is not an officer of the Government at large, employed as a general servant of the public at large, but that he is our officer, to do our business. This is not a question of spoils; but it is a question whether we shall have for our own special agent a person agreeable to us. The question is, whether a majority of to-day, who are to be a minority to-morrow, shall fix upon us a man who is known by them to be peculiarly disagreeable to us or whom he is appointed to act? That is the question; and I should think it is a question easily answered. I repudiate, as I have said, all idea of turning a man out for mere opinion's sake. Let not a hair of any man's head be touched, say I, for the political notions which may lurk under it. Never, till he falls within the rule laid down by Jefferson—a rule which has now been avowed by a voice which, as I believe, but embodies the will of the whole country—never let a finger be laid upon him. I here pledge myself never, in any case where my will or action may be concerned, to indulge in one jot or tittle of that most abominable principle charged upon us by the Senator from Michigan, that men are to be punished for opinion's sake—that to the victors belong the spoils.

Mr. ANDERSON said, he rose for the purpose of throwing off the imputation which the gentleman who had just taken his seat had chosen to cast, as he understood him, upon the Republican party. He had but a word or two to make in reply; and he did this because, for himself, he was unwilling to have attributed to him, by implication or otherwise, sentiments he never entertained. For his part he never was an advocate of the policy of proscription—and he held now the opinions upon this subject he had always cherished. He was gratified to hear the gentleman from South Carolina say that he, too, was opposed to proscription, and that the present dominant party would enter upon their power in that spirit, and would carry out no violence upon the public feeling and sympathy of the country. He was pleased to hear him announce his opinion to be that honesty and capacity constituted the great and leading qualifications for office. He trusted that the opposite party would remember these declarations, and would fairly abide by them. He understood the gentleman to impute to the Republican party the policy of Machiavel—and to make it as a charge upon the whole party, as had been often done before, that a solitary individual, then a member of this body, had declared in his place, that to the "victors belong the spoils." For one, he repelled this imputation. He was neither an admirer of the maxims of Machiavel, nor the system of policy of Walpole, nor Richelieu; nor did he, for himself, nor did the party with which he had acted, as he believed, recognise the doctrine that to the victors belong the spoils. It was the declaration, he said, of a solitary individual, and had found no adoption with others, nor was it designed, as he always supposed, and understood, to be taken up in the literal and odious sense in which our political opponents have interpreted it for the public ear. He did not pretend to understand the origin of the term, or the exact sense in which it was designed to be received; but he could well imagine that it might have grown out of the classic recollections of the early readings of the speaker, and he might have referred to it in the sense in which the spolia opima were bestowed upon that gallant Roman who was, as the victor, and distinguished by peculiar valor and prowess, under their ancient customs, entitled to what they esteemed the most honorable reward. For himself, he utterly rejected the imputations which had been cast out; and he denied the pretended charge as to spoils, as being applicable to those with whom he acted, to be true to any greater extent, or in any other sense, than might be ascribed to their opponents; and he would repeat that he was pleased to hear the gentleman denounce proscription, and he trusted that he and his friends would abide by it. As to the question before us for the election of a Printer, he would say, if it was right in eighteen hundred and thirty-five, when their opponents acted under the existing regulation, and elected their friends as Printers in advance, at the close of one Congress, for the next, it is equally right now; and with this fact before him, and the usage of this body, he should vote for the resolution.

Mr. BENTON was happy to hear that gentlemen opposite disavowed a spirit of proscription; but the time was coming when action was to follow words. He assured the Senate that the doctrine, "to the victors belong the spoils," had never been known in Missouri except by rumor, and that during the administrations of General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren, the best offices had been held by persons who were in opposition to the Presidents under whom they served, and who expressed their sentiments as freely as any body else. The post office of St. Louis was in the hands of a gentleman belonging to the Opposition party for four years under one of those Administrations, and when his period of service expired, instead of being turned out, he was positively reappointed. Another held office eleven years under General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren, at the expiration of which time only was another person appointed; and he [Mr. BENTON] could assure honorable Senators that when he had been applied to respecting the removal of persons from office by those who desired the appointments, his invariable reply, whether by letter or word of mouth, was, "show me misconduct and then I will interfere." There were several cases of re-appointments by General Jackson in St. Louis of persons who were opposed to him in politics. In one case the incumbent died in his office, and then a person of different political principles was appointed. He could go on to give instance after instance, but he would mention but one. An Opposition gentleman holding an appointment in the Land Office, was found to be in default to the amount of a few thousand dollars—he came to him (Mr. BENTON) and explained his position, and satisfied him that the money would be replaced promptly. He (Mr. BENTON) wrote to the Secretary to excuse the officer. He was excused—the money was put up, and he remained in his office until his time was out, and a gentleman of different politics was then put in, and occupied it for the four years succeeding. This was the way they had acted. He denied that any officer had been removed, except for cause; and if honorable Senators would look at the removals, they would find as many on one side in politics, as the other. And he would also say, that during the twelve years of Democratic administration, in the State of Missouri there had not been a dollar lost by a disburser of the public money to the Federal Government, and there had been from twenty to thirty millions disbursed there; nor was there a set of officers that were more entitled to the confidence of the country. He spoke for his own State, alone—other gentlemen could speak for theirs; and as gentlemen had undertaken to gain so much reputation in advance for the incoming Administration, he could not conclude without saying, that the new Administration, on this subject, had only to copy after the old one; and if they did not do it, they should hear from him from the place which he then occupied.

Mr. NORVELL observed that the maxim, that "to the victors belong the spoils of office," was no maxim of his creation. It originated, years ago, in the East, in Massachusetts. It was quoted, in this body, by a distinguished Senator from New York, [Mr. MARCY.] And, when announced by him, it had been made the subject of bitter vituperation ever since by the party to which the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] belonged. But, profligate as the maxim might have been, that party had adopted and carried it out in every quarter in which they had obtained power. He believed that the new Federal Administration of this Government would follow the example. He had that day heard enough to satisfy him of that fact. If an honest, capable, and faithful Democrat could be found, who had taken no part in elections, such a man might be saved! This was the principle announced to the Senate this morning. Why, sir, who that was worthy of office would be left in office on this principle? Public officers might, forsooth, entertain feelings and opinions in their own hearts with impunity; but if they breathed them to others, they at once came under the proscriptive principle laid down for the new Administration! The "spoils of victory" maxim was merciful compared with this despotism over the mind, proposed as the rule of action for the triumphant party coming into power. When, in an under tone, he had, while the Senator from South Carolina was upon the floor, said that he "hoped so," he meant that he hoped that the Senator would adhere to his promise, that he would denounce the spoils maxim here and hereafter, come from what quarter it might. We shall see. The Senator had alluded to the bill brought in the session before the last by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN] to prevent office holders from interfering in elections. He had said that that bill contained the doctrine of his party. The honorable gentleman was mistaken. Upon the final vote on that bill, only five of his Whig friends voted for it. The others retired from the vote. Again, sir, for twelve years, that party had been engaged in denunciations, loud and deep, of the practice of appointing members of Congress to office. And what have we seen even in anticipation of their possession of power? Several members of Congress have already been announced as Cabinet appointments determined upon, and others rumored as probable appointments for diplomatic stations! These things manifest the sincerity of the professions of the party coming into power on the subject.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] first, and after him the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] had so clearly pointed out what would be the course of the next Administration in regard to removals from office, that doubt or difficulty on this question could no longer embarrass the public mind. This distinct announcement of Whig principles, proceeding, as it did, from such commanding authority, would instantly relieve the anxious minds of a very large number of office holders. According to the avowal of the two distinguished Senators, the inquiries respecting each man now in office would be, was he honest?—was he capable?—was he faithful?—and had he abused his official trust in promoting the re-election of Mr. Van Buren? If his past conduct had been such as would enable him to endure the application of these several tests without injury; then he would be retained. On the other hand, if it should be established that any officer was either dishonest, or unfaithful, or incapable, or had brought the influence of his office into collision with the freedom of elections, we should be very captious, indeed, if we were to complain of his removal.

A suspicious man might, until this auspicious day, have apprehended that an extensive latitude would be taken in construing what was meant by the abuse of office for electioneering purposes; but the Senator from South Carolina had also been clear and explicit upon this subject. He had declared, in the strongest terms, that an office holder, like all other citizens, had a right to express his opinion and to give his vote according to the dictates of his own judgment; and if he had confined himself to the exercise of these constitutional privileges, he would be in no danger of removal. To use his own strong language, he had proclaimed it to be a cardinal doctrine of the Whig faith, that proscription must be proscribed.

This liberal doctrine would save from proscription all our foreign ministers and other diplomatic agents who had been absent from the country during the late struggle; but he (Mr. B.) could hardly expect so much generosity even from the Whigs. These were essentially political offices, and we could not complain if they should be filled by individuals enjoying the entire confidence of the new Administration. He would not, therefore, hold his friends on this side of the House to such a strict construction of their own principle as would prevent them from making any changes in our diplomatic corps. There was, however, another numerous class of foreign agents, (he referred to our consuls,) which, he rejoiced to say, would all be protected from proscription, both by the letter and spirit of the rule. He had himself received some letters from individuals of this class, expressing strong apprehensions lest they might be removed from office; and he had not ventured to give any of them much encouragement. He could now tell them that they might dismiss their fears—nay, that they might even dispel their doubts—if they had had been honest, faithful, and capable. From their residence abroad, and from the purely commercial nature of their duties, it was almost impossible that they could have abused their official trusts in promoting the re-election of Mr. Van Buren. These useful public servants, then, who were scattered over every civilized country on the face of the earth, and who had been engaged in their appropriate duty of aiding and protecting our foreign commerce, would all be safe under the tolerant sway of the new Whig Administration.

There was another class of officers, if officers they might be called—he meant the clerks in the different Departments—who would sleep sounder to-night than they had done since the result of the Presidential election was known. Their condition was most dependent and pitiable; and many mothers, wives, and daughters, had spent anxious days and sleepless nights in dread, lest their sons, or husbands, or fathers, might be removed from office, and their families be thus deprived of the means of subsistence. Let them now cheer up and rest in perfect security. All was safe. The disfranchisement of these clerks would prove to be their best security. They could not by possibility have voted for Mr. Van Buren, and the expression of their opinion in favor of his re-election would never cause their removal. Nobody ever heard of a mere clerk's appointment, in this disfranchised District, being abused and brought into conflict with the freedom of elections. Such an idea would be ridiculous. Now he must confess that he himself had hitherto entertained an apprehension lest such clerks as had expressed their opinion in favor of the re-election of Mr. Van Buren, and against that of General Harrison, might be removed for this cause; but he was now happy thus publicly to acknowledge his mistake.

By the multitude of office-holders throughout the Union, "the potential voice" of the two Senators would be heard with delight. For his own part, he had been chiefly anxious about the fate of a worthy and respectable widow lady, who was postmaster in the city where he resided. Gentlemen might smile, but postmaster was the word; and an excellent postmaster she was. This lady was the only relic which remained of the olden time, when no rule existed to prevent ladies from being appointed postmasters. Her last companion had been a respectable lady who was postmaster at Georgetown; but even this companion had recently deserted her, and got married. She was, therefore, left solitary and alone, being the only female in the United States who now held a post office whose emoluments exceeded one thousand dollars, and who, under the law of 1836, had received her appointment from the President and Senate. Even this old lady became apprehensive, from the Whig movements around her, that she might not be permitted to serve out her term of office. He had told her not to be uneasy—that General Harrison had too much gallantry to remove her, whatever might be the fate of other office-holders. These assurances he had ventured to give on the merit of her own claims, which he had thought would constitute an exception from what he then believed would be the general rule. She might now rest doubly satisfied that she was in no danger, because there would be no proscription for mere opinion's sake any where, and nobody would pretend that this old lady had ever entered the field, armed with her official influence, either to defend Mr. Van Buren or to attack Gen. Harrison.

It was greatly to be regretted that the two Senators had not, at an earlier period, more distinctly avowed their horror of proscription. This might have saved their friends in different portions of the Union from much unnecessary trouble and expense. The general, though mistaken impression in his State, had been that the political friends of Mr. Van Buren would be removed, and that the Whigs, who had borne the heat and burden of the contest, would be rewarded with their places. This erroneous impression was not confined to Pennsylvania, but had certainly extended to New York, as he had recently received a letter from a town in that State, and that not a very large one either, informing him that there were twenty applicants for the post office there—all struggling to obtain subscribers, and all ready to rush to Washington to attend the inauguration. These gentlemen could not have known that the system of rewards and punishments was abolished forever, and that we were now soon to be blessed with a political millennium.

The virtue of the Senators would be violently assailed; and if it were capable of yielding to importunity, we might dread the result. When General Jackson first came into power, the applicants for office were more numerous than he had ever expected to witness; but, from what he had heard, the rush for office here on the fourth of March next, would greatly surpass any thing which had ever been seen before. Numerous as had been the individuals anxious to obtain office on the accession of General Jackson, he would venture to predict that there would be, in the city of Washington, on the day of General Harrison's inauguration, at least double that number of patriotic Whigs, ready to rush into the service of their country, and seize upon official stations.

The question was then taken on Mr. HUNTINGTON's motion to postpone, and negatived—yeas 19, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Southard, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Nicholson, Norvell, Pierce, Reane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—26.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and it was passed in the following words:

Resolved, That the Senate will, on Saturday next, at one o'clock, proceed to the election of a Public Printer for the Senate for the Twenty-seventh Congress.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky then moved to take up his resolution for the repeal of the Independent Treasury bill; which was agreed to—ayes 23, noes 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Graham, Henderson, Hubbard, Huntington, Ker, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Southard, Tallmadge, Webster, White, and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Nicholson, Norvell, Pierce, Reane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, and Young—22.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he had no intention of pressing a vote on the resolution to-night, and would therefore move an adjournment.

Several Senators expressed a wish that the question might be disposed of this evening, but the motion for adjournment was carried—ayes 22, noes 12.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1841.

As soon as the journal had been read,

Mr. HOLMES of South Carolina rose, and observed that as he had not the honor of hearing the speech of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] on last evening, he desired to ask that gentleman a question. (Mr. STANLY had attacked in a very unceremonious way the report and resolutions of the Committee on Federal Relations in the Legislature of South Carolina, and which were recently presented to the House.)

Mr. STANLY objected to it, unless an opportunity should be afforded to all other gentlemen who might wish to explain.

Mr. HOLMES was understood to appeal to the courtesy of the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw his objection. He (Mr. H.) did not intend to enter into any argument on the subject, but merely to ask a simple courteous question.

Mr. STANLY persisted in his objection, and desired the gentleman to wait until the House should go again into Committee of the Whole, when any remark he might wish to make would be in order.

Some discussion of a conversational character here arose, during which Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina rose, and hoped his colleague [Mr. HOLMES] would not notice any remarks the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] had made against their State. For, however puissant the member from North Carolina might deem himself, he, Mr. C. would assure him that his arm was too short to reach South Carolina. Mr. C. hoped that his colleague [Mr. HOLMES] would never notice any thing the member might say against South Carolina, but to adopt the course he, Mr. C. had resolved to do, viz: to treat the member, whenever he spoke against that State, with silent contempt.

Mr. STANLY rose, and holding out his arm, said it was long enough to reach any gentleman in the House, or words to that effect.

Much confusion here arose, with considerable laughter, and it was with some difficulty that the CHAIR succeeded in restoring order.

The SPEAKER stated that the question before the House was the motion made by Mr. EASTMAN last night, (and during the pendency of which the House adjourned,) to suspend the rules for the purpose of going into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and taking up the bill to extend, for five years, the act approved July 7, 1838, "granting half-pay and pensions to certain widows."

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON asked Mr. EASTMAN to withdraw his motion, to enable him to report a bill from the Committee on Military Affairs, in conformity with the resolution of the House of the 17th instant, instructing that committee to report a bill making the necessary appropriations for fortifications, naval armaments, and other necessary preparations to place the country in a proper state of defence.

But Mr. EASTMAN refusing,

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on suspending the rules, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 106, nays 42.

So the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. EVANS in the chair,) on said bill; which was read, as follows:

A BILL to extend, for five years, the act approved July seventh, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, "granting half pay and pensions to certain widows."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the "act granting half-pay and pensions to certain widows, approved July seventh, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, be, and the same is hereby, extended and declared to be in full force for and during the term of five years from and after the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and forty-one; and the widows already pensioned under said act, shall receive for and during said five years, the same annuity or pension that they now receive by virtue of said act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the marriage of the widow, after the death of her husband, for whose services she claims a pension under said act, shall be no bar to the claim of such widow to the benefit of said act, she being a widow at the time she makes application for such pension.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the widows of such officers and soldiers as have died since the passage of said act, or shall hereafter die, and the widows of such officers and soldiers as have died since the passage of the act of July fourth, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, granting half pay to widows and orphans in certain cases, shall be entitled to pensions under said acts respectively, they being otherwise entitled thereto, and widows at the time application for a pension is made.

Mr. EASTMAN briefly recapitulated the provisions of the bill; and concluded by saying that the question of pensions for Revolutionary services was well understood by the country, and it was not necessary to go into a history of the subject at the present time. He therefore hoped the bill would be passed without debate.

After some remarks by Messrs. HAND, STANLY, and MORGAN,

Mr. PROFFIT moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the House; but the motion was not seconded.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to strike out the first two sections, after the enacting clause, and insert as follows:

"That the widows of such officers and soldiers as have died since the passage of the act entitled 'An act granting half-pay and pensions to certain widows,' approved July 7, 1838, or shall hereafter die, and the widows of such officers and soldiers as have died since the passage of the act of July 4, 1836, granting half-pay to widows or orphans in certain cases, shall be entitled to pensions under said acts respectively, they being otherwise entitled thereto; and a second marriage shall be no bar to granting a pension to any widow of a Revolutionary officer or soldier, she being a widow at the time of her application."

Mr. PECK submitted the following amendment: "Strike out, in section 1, last line, the words 'that they now receive,' and insert 'to which they were now entitled.'"

The debate was further continued by Messrs. MONROE, TILLINGHAST, PETRIKIN, W. THOMPSON, REED, and JONES of Virginia.

Mr. PICKENS protested against the passage of the bill, involving so great an amount of money, without proper estimates. Where were the documents on which they were to found their legislation? He hoped the committee would not act on such loose estimates. Could gentlemen be aware of the consequences which would arise from this large system of pensions. Were they prepared at this late period of the session to go blindfolded into a measure, drawing upwards of two millions and a half from the Treasury. For his part he would not act upon so important a subject, without proper and correct information.

In the course of his remarks, Mr. P. alluded to the speech of Mr. STANLY on last evening, and intimated that he, Mr. P. would have to exercise proper caution, or he would have the misfortune to draw down upon himself the anger of that vindictive gentleman. And for fear of falling under that gentleman's puny arm, he would refrain from saying what he intended. Alluding to the attack of Mr. STANLY on the resolutions of the Legislature of South Carolina, Mr. P. intimated that the member had shot his dreaded arrows at South Carolina with about as much effect as the savage who let fly his arrows at the sun. The member had brandished his battle-axe like Richard, and strode over the whole country, dealing vengeance around. The course of the member forcibly reminded him of the nursery rhyme:

"Who shot cock robin?
I, said the sparrow,
With my bow and arrow,
I shot cock robin."

Mr. STANLY replied, and in the course of his remarks, expressed his conviction that his "pigmy arm" was strong enough to kill a dozen such cock robins as Mr. PICKENS.

After some remarks by Mr. BRIGGS,

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment submitted by Mr. PECK, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, after calling the attention of the committee to the nature of the amendment which he had submitted, gave way to

Mr. HAND, to propose an amendment viz: in the eighth line, first section, after the words "already pensioned" the words "or that may hereafter be pensioned;" and

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. DAVIES of Pennsylvania expressed himself briefly in favor of the bill.

Mr. FILLMORE moved to insert after the words "such officers and soldiers," the words "of the Revolution;" which amendment was adopted.

The question was then taken, by tellers, on Mr. UNDERWOOD's amendment, and decided in the negative—ayes 61, noes 89.

Mr. HOPKINS submitted the following amendment, viz:

"Be it enacted, That the provisions of the act approved 7th June, 1832, entitled 'An act supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution,' be and the same are hereby extended so as to embrace all those officers and soldiers, spies, and rangers, who, under one or more engagements, shall have served for a term of three months or upwards in the wars against the Indian tribes at any time previous to the treaty of Greenville, in the year 1795; and on application at the proper Department, and proof thereof, they shall be entitled to have their names placed on the pension roll."

Messrs. HOPKINS, HAND, JOHNSON of Virginia, and HALL, severally addressed the committee; and

The question on the amendment was put, and negatively—ayes 43, noes 83

Mr. CRABB offered the following amendment; which was adopted:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act directing the transfer of money unclaimed by certain pensioners, and authorizing the payment of the same at the Treasury of the United States," approved April 6, 1838, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. GRAVES submitted the following amendment, which was read, as follows:

Be it further enacted, That the widows and children of officers of the army and navy of the United States, who may have died of wounds received in the service of the country, but who may have left the service previously to their death, shall be entitled to the same pension as though they had been in the service at the time of their death.

Mr. GRAVES briefly advocated the amendment, and Mr. HAND opposed it.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and decided in the negative.

Mr. GRAVES submitted another amendment, as follows:

Be it further enacted, That Mary Barney, widow of Commodore Barney, shall receive during her life, the same pension which she has been in the receipt of up to the discontinuance of her late pension.

The question was then taken, but no quorum voting,

And it being now half past 2 o'clock,

The House took a recess until 4 o'clock, p. m.

Mr. EVANS, who was in the chair this morning during the debate between Messrs. PICKENS and STANLY, on leave recapitulated the circumstances under which the debate took place, with a view of correcting any misunderstanding between the parties. He, Mr. E. had not called the gentleman from South Carolina to order, because he understood him as referring to the arguments of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. STANLY,) and as intending no personal application. This the gentleman from South Carolina had of course a right to do, as the arguments of every gentleman were open to attack. But he, Mr. E. believed that the gentleman from North Carolina had misconceived the object of the gentleman from South Carolina, and appeared to have understood the language as intended to apply personally, instead of to the argument.

Mr. E. then appealed to Mr. PICKENS, whether he had not taken a correct view of the case.

Mr. PICKENS on being thus appealed to, said, in substance, that he had indulged in ridicule freely, but within the limits of parliamentary usage, and he had no hesitation in saying that the ridicule was intended to apply solely to the arguments of the gentleman.

On a similar appeal being made by Mr. EVANS to Mr. STANLY, the latter observed, in substance, that, at the time, he was disposed to think the strong language of the gentleman from South Carolina as something more than ridicule; but as the gentleman had disclaimed any personal allusion, he [Mr. S.] was willing to take the remarks as they were intended, and wished his language in reply to be understood in like manner.

[EVENING SESSION.]

After the recess—

The bill for extending the act granting pensions to certain widows and orphans, being under consideration in Committee of the Whole,

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. GRAVES, and it was agreed to.

Mr. EASTMAN submitted a further amendment merely to prevent a misconception as to the meaning of a portion of the bill, which amendment was concurred in.

There being no further amendments proposed, the committee rose and reported the bill, as amended to the House.

And the question being on agreeing with the several amendments by the Committee of the Whole, was put and decided in the affirmative.

So the amendments were concurred in.

The bill as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

And the bill having been read a third time,

The question recurred upon its passage.

Mr. DROMGOOLE demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and being taken were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Baker, Beatty, Blackwell, Boardman, Briggs, Brockway, Burke, Carroll, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, Clifford, William R. Cooper, Cranston, Cushing, Davee, Edward Davies, John Davis, Garrett Davis, Dickerson, Doan, Doe, Earl, Eastman, Edwards, Ely, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fine, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gates, Gerry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Granger, Graves, Hall, Hammond, Hand, Jehu Hastings, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Keim, Kempshall, Kille, Lane, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lincoln, Lowell, McCarty, McClellan, McClure, McCulloch, M. Mallory, Mason, Medill, Monroe, Montanya, Moore, Naylor, Newhard, Osborne, Palen, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Peck, Randall, Rariden, Reed, Reynolds, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Russell, Sergeant, Shaw, Simonton, John Smith, Truman Smith, Thomas Smith, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, John B. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Peter J. Wagner, Weller, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—112.

NAYS—Messrs. Alford, John W. Allen, Banks, Beirne, Black, Brewster, Sampson H. Butler, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Crabb, Dawson, Deberry, Dromgoole, Fisher, Gentry, Habersham, Hawkins, Holt, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Lucas, McKay, F. Mallory, Miller, Morrow, Nisbet, Pickens, Rhett, Rives, James Rogers, Samuels, Shepard, Stanly, Suater, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Underwood, and Warren—42.

So the bill passed.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana asked the general consent of the House to permit him to lay before the House a number of joint resolutions and memorials which he had been for a long time receiving from his Legislature on a variety of subjects.

It was objected to by Mr. RUSSELL of New York.

Mr. SMITH then moved to suspend the rules for leave, but was ruled out of order by the SPEAKER.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for 1841.

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. STANLY to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. RHETT being entitled to the floor, spoke at great length. His remarks will appear hereafter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD next obtained the floor; but gave way for a motion that the committee rise; which prevailed.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House the following communications, viz:

I. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, of the 19th ult. statements showing a comparative view of the average cost of the army proper, for each individual, taking the aggregate of the officers, professors of the Military Academy, cadets, and enlisted men in the service of the United States for the year 1837, 1838, 1839, and 1840, for subsistence to soldiers, clothing, and quartermasters and medical stores, and other articles embraced under the general character of supplies for the army not fixed by law, &c.

Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

II. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting in obedience to a resolution of the House passed the 25th of May, 1840, reports of the Paymaster General, Adjutant General, Commissary General of Subsistence, and Quartermaster General, together with documents in relation to the claims of the Territory of Iowa for the expenses of a portion of the militia of said Territory, called into service during the autumn of 1839.

Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

III. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the annual report of the Colonel of Ordnance, with a statement showing the expenses of the national armories, and of the arms, &c. made therein during the year ending Sept. 30, 1840.

Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

IV. A letter from the Commissioner of Patents, transmitting, in obedience to the act "to promote the useful arts," his annual report.

Referred to the Committee on Patents.

And then, at ten minutes past 7 o'clock, The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

Also, the number of reservations registered for under said treaties of 1817 and 1819. That he also communicate how much of the three hundred thousand dollars appropriated under the third supplemental article of the treaty of 1835, '6, for the satisfaction of reservation claims, has been applied to that object, and how much of said fund remains unexpended; whether, in his opinion, any, and what, reservation or other claims rejected by the Board of Commissioners are, from the evidence on file, within the equity of the provisions of the treaty of 1835, '6.

Mr. WRIGHT submitted the following motion; which was considered and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State inform the Senate what progress has been made in the completion of the census of 1840; whether the work, or any part of it, has yet been placed in the hands of the printer to Congress, as required by the laws; and whether the printed abstracts may be expected to be laid before Congress during its present session.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolutions, which were considered and agreed to:

Mr. NORVELL moved to take up the resolution relative to the admission of ladies to the privileged seats on the floor of the Senate, which was laid on the table on Thursday. The motion was disagreed to—ayes 17, noes 26.

On motion by Mr. NORVELL, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill authorizing the erection of certain light-houses and light-boats, and the establishment of certain buoys and beacon lights, and after various amendments had been adopted, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House bill concerning navy pensions and half pay, was taken up, and after various amendments had been adopted, it was, on motion of Mr. WALKER, laid on the table for the present.

The Senate then, in pursuance to the order of yesterday, proceeded to the

ELECTION OF PRINTER.

Mr. MANGUM announced his intention of not voting.

The ballots having been counted, the VICE PRESIDENT announced the result as follows:

For BLAIR and RIVES,	26
F. P. BLAIR,	1

So BLAIR and RIVES were declared to be duly elected Printers of the Senate for the 27th Congress.

[Mr. NICHOLSON (Dem.) and Mr. BATES (Fed.) were absent when the vote was taken.]

REPEAL OF THE INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

The resolution submitted by Mr. CLAY of Kentucky for the repeal of the Independent Treasury law, with the amendment proposed by ALLEN, was taken up, and Mr. CLAY addressed the Senate in favor of its adoption.

Mr. ALLEN, after a few remarks in explanation of the motion he was about to make, moved to lay the whole subject on the table, but withdrew it at the request of

Mr. CLAY, who briefly replied to Mr. ALLEN.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. WALKER followed, assigning their reasons for the votes they were about to give.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, that the yeas and nays having been ordered, and as the resolutions of his State, which it became his duty to present to the Senate a few days since, had reference to the question to be voted upon, he deemed it his duty to say something before recording the vote which he should give. The resolution now under consideration, instructs the Committee on Finance to bring in a bill to repeal the act passed last year, called the Independent Treasury bill; and it will be recollected that one of the resolutions passed by the Legislature of Maine, now in session, declares, "that the act of Congress in relation to the collection, keeping, and disbursing the public money, approved on the 4th of July last, commonly denominated the Independent, or Sub Treasury act, was uncalled for by the people, and is against the genius of our free institutions, tending to substitute a metallic for our present mixed currency, and ought forthwith to be repealed;" and another resolution is, "that the honorable Reuel Williams, previous to his election to the Senate of the United States, having declared and published that it is the duty of the elected to carry into effect the will of his constituents, if he is instructed what that will is, or resign his trust—we, therefore, hereby instruct him that the foregoing resolutions express the will of his constituents." Intending to obey the instructions of the Legislature, when given as such, or resign his trust, Mr. W. said the question was, whether or not the resolutions of his State were instructions to him how he should vote upon this or any other of the subjects named in the resolutions. Some one should be responsible to the people for every vote given by a Senator upon this floor, and that responsibility should not be uncertain, or the subject of contest between the Senator and the Legislature, if it should happen that the vote should prove wrong or adverse to the public good. A Senator must be held responsible to his constituents and to his country for all votes may give, unless he can say and prove that he gives the vote under the instructions of his Legislature, and in such case the vote so given is, virtually, not his vote, but the vote of the Legislature; in which case the responsibility attending it is upon the Legislature, and they are responsible to the people for it, and not the Senator. In this view of the case, Mr. W. said he could not regard the resolutions of his Legislature as instructing him how to vote upon this or any of the subjects named in them, and he was confirmed in this belief that they were not such instructions as would change the responsibility of the votes he might give, from himself to the Legislature, by the opinion of those in whose judgment he had great confidence. If, said Mr. W. the Legislature of his State desired him to vote for or against any measure, it was only for them to say so, in terms not liable to dispute or question, and he would obey or resign. He only wished the instructions to be in such language as would authorize him to say, now and hereafter, that the votes he should give under instructions, were the votes directed by his Legislature, and for which they, and not he, were responsible to their common masters.

Are the resolutions of the Legislature of Maine, then, to be regarded as such instructions as would make the Legislature responsible to the people of Maine for any consequences which may result from the adoption of the various measures they recommend? Did the majority of the Legislature which passed the resolutions contemplate or intend to assume any such responsibility? He thought not, because in terms they are not such, and he had seen in the reports of the proceedings of that Legislature, while the resolutions were under consideration, that the same majority which passed them, refused, by a vote, taken by ayes and noes, to adopt an amendment then proposed to precede the words "the honorable" in these words: "believing the doctrines of instructions to be founded in sound sense and enlightened reason, and holding firmly to the opinion that it is the duty of the elected to obey the will of the electors, or else to resign the trust confided to his care." Again, if the majority intended to instruct, and to make themselves responsible for votes given in conformity with the resolutions, why did they not do it in terms not liable to misconception or dispute? Why "instruct him that the foregoing resolutions express the will of his constituents," and nothing more? Suppose (said Mr. W.) his vote should be given in accordance with what the Legislature declare to be the will of his constituents, and it should prove that such was not the will of his constituents, or that ruinous consequences should result from such a vote; and upon being called to account for thus voting, he should attempt to screen himself from the responsibility of the vote, and cast it upon the Legislature of his State, could he do it? Might not the majority well say that by the resolutions they meant to instruct him what they considered and held to be the will of his constituents, and then leave him to act upon his own responsibility? and that they had no idea of responsibility further than to express their opinion of the will of his constituents?

But, continued Mr. W. it may be said that, although the Legislature had not instructed, or intended to instruct him, in such manner as to make them responsible for the votes he might give pursuant to their resolutions, still it was his duty to obey or resign, in consequence of his answers to certain questions published near the time of his first election to the Senate, and alluded to in the resolutions. Is this so? To determine this point, the question and answer should both be considered, and they are these. Question—"Is it the right of the people, through their Representatives, to instruct their public servants, and direct their action upon all matters of general interest; and is it, or is it not, the imperative duty of such public servants to obey such instructions, or give up the trusts confided to them?" Answer—"I regard the elected as the agent of the electors. By the election, a confidence is reposed in the agent, and he is to act, in the absence of instructions, according to his best judgment and discretion, when instructed, he is to vote the will of his constituents, if he can conscientiously—if not, to resign his trust, and thereby put it in the power of those who gave him power, to cause their will to be obeyed." Taking the question and answer together, is there any thing in them to charge or enlarge the doctrine of instructions as generally received and understood? What is there in this answer beyond admitting the right of the Legislature to instruct their public agents, and direct their action upon all matters of general interest, and the duty of the agent, when thus instructed and directed, to obey or resign?

For himself, he would say that nothing more was intended, and that he could not see how others could fairly make any think more of it. Mr. W. added that the Legislature of his State were now in session, and would have ample opportunity to instruct him and direct his action upon any subjects of general interest they might choose, before any action could be had by Congress upon such subjects; and if they shall take the responsibility of the votes which they may direct him to give, he should promptly obey or resign.

Mr. SEVIER then obtained the floor, and renewed the motion to lay the resolution on the table, giving notice he would not withdraw it for friend or foe.

The question was then taken on laying the resolution on the table, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 27, noes 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholson, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bates, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Rugles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—25.

Mr. LINN then moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills connected with the Territories, and after a few remarks from Mr. BUCHANAN in favor of the motion, it was agreed to.

Mr. MERRICK gave notice that on Monday he would ask the Senate to take up the bill for the re-charter of the banks of the District.

The bill to provide for running and marking the northern boundary line of a tract of land reserved for the half-breeds of the Sac and Fox tribes of Indiana; and

The bill granting to the county of Johnson, in the Territory of Iowa, the right of pre-emption to a tract of land for a seat of justice for said county; and repealing the second section of an act, approved the 3d day of March, 1839, entitled "An act making a donation of land to the Territory of Iowa, for the purpose of erecting public buildings thereon; were severally considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then went into Executive session.

And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, February 20, 1841.

As soon as the journal had been read,

Mr. SMITH of Indiana moved to amend the journal, as follows:

"Mr. SMITH of Indiana asked the general consent of the House to allow him to lay before the House, and have printed, a number of joint resolutions which had been accumulating on his hands from his Legislature.

"It being objected to by Mr. RUSSELL,

"Mr. SMITH then moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of leave; which was ruled out of order by the CHAIR.

"Mr. JOHN W. JONES having obtained the floor, moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union."

Mr. SMITH said he wished his motion to appear on the journal, that he had attempted, as he had frequently attempted, to obtain the floor for that purpose. He thought it due to his State, and especially to himself, as they were in his opinion intended for himself and others of his colleagues who act here politically with him.

Mr. CRABB and Mr. LINCOLN objected to the placing of this motion on the journal, on the ground that it was unusual, and if indulged in, would swell it to an enormous size.

Mr. SMITH replied, though it was unusual, and perhaps improper, he could have it appear on the journal by calling for the ayes and noes; but he said, as the time of the House was precious, and the session far spent, he would withdraw the proposition to amend; but gave notice that he would take every opportunity to introduce them, and he hoped the House would afford that opportunity.

Mr. RUSSELL said that as this was one of the days set apart for the consideration of private bills, he would move that the day be devoted to the purpose.

The SPEAKER suggested that a suspension of the rules was necessary.

Mr. FILLMORE then moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. JONES of Virginia hoped that the motion would not prevail, as there were but a few days of the session now remaining in which to transact the public business.

The question was then taken—ayes 79, noes 68, not two thirds

So the rules were not suspended.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1841. The question pending being the motion of Mr. STANLEY to strike out the enacting clause—

Mr. UNDERWOOD, being entitled to the floor, observed, after some introductory remarks, that his object was to call the attention of the House and the country to abuses which ought to and might be corrected to a great extent, if Congress would act properly on the subject now before them; and after saying that he had some amendments which he intended to offer, alluded to the waste of time by members of the House, in raising useless questions of order and calling the yeas and nays, as one of these abuses. He also referred to the fact that the postmaster of the city of New York received, in addition to his salary, by perquisites from box rent and branch post offices, the sum of twenty-six thousand dollars per annum—one thousand dollars more than the salary of the President of the United States. In relation to custom houses, Mr. U. would not speak of those in Charleston, Boston, New Orleans, Philadelphia, and other cities, but would merely point to the custom-house of New York, and by that, gentlemen might make their estimates in respect to those of other cities of the Union. It appeared from documentary evidence that the collector of the customs, the naval officer, and the surveyor of the port, received $14,000 each from the condemnation of a single importation; and the collector, in addition to his salary, etc. in one year, amassed the enormous sum of thirty-nine thousand dollars!

Mr. U. after some suggestions respecting the customs, said that in no possible way could the revenue for the coming year amount to anything like what was estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury; and for that reason, Mr. U. said we ought to husband our resources, so far, at least, as this Congress was concerned, because he apprehended there would be a deficit in the Treasury. He would not go into a discussion of the tariff, duties on wines and silks, etc.; that would be premature; and in effect, remarked that the duties on all the articles that entered into the consumption of the people ought to be so equalized as to make the burdens of Government fall equally upon all.

Mr. U. expressed his opinion that, to accomplish the objects for which this Government was established, it was necessary to diminish the number of Representatives in the House to one-half—to a business standard; and after illustrating his argument, said that, as the House was now constituted, it was impossible to transact the public business with any degree of expedition.

Mr. U. said the presumed conduct of the next Administration, and a number of important questions—the public lands, internal improvements, as well as the tariff, had been made the subjects of discussion in the House. It had been said by a gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] that the dead march would be played over General Harrison and the Whig party in 1844. That was Lochiel's warning; and, said Mr. U. it ought to come to pass unless the Whig party adhere to the principles which they promulgated before the election. But if you will carry out the principles which brought you into power—if you will make an Independent Treasury in fact, let Congress appoint the Secretary of the Treasury, and amend the Constitution so as to appoint the Postmaster General in the same way. If you allow them to be independent men, requiring them to look into laws, and not to the White House, for a definition of their duties, your administration will be glorious.

Mr. U. said, he would belong to a party so long as it fought for principle; but so soon as they should scramble for the spoils, he was off. He never belonged to such a party, and never would. But he believed the coming Administration would adhere to its policy, and carry out the great principles for which its friends had contended.

Mr. U. was in favor of a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and for a National Bank. If that could not be established, he would agree so to amend the Sub-Treasury law, that every man might there deposit a silver dollar, and receive a Government bill in return for it. Mr.

U. contended it was the bounden duty of Government to furnish the people with such a currency as could be used for the purposes of exchange; and concluded his remarks (of which this is necessarily but a brief sketch) by adverting to the subject of the public lands.

Mr. SERGEANT said he had a few words to say on the question before the CHAIR; for it appeared, according to the course of gentlemen; that the good old-fashioned rule of speaking to the subject before them was to be exploded.

Mr. S. then proceeded to reply to some of the arguments of the last speaker in relation to a reduction of the number of members, etc.

Without concluding, Mr. S. gave way to a motion that the committee rise; which motion prevailed.

So the committee rose, and reported progress.

A motion was then made to adjourn until Monday next.

Mr. JONES of Virginia demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 76, nays 60.

And, at twenty minutes to four o'clock, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 22, 1841.

Mr. WHITE presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of Indiana in favor of a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and in favor of supporting the General Government by duties on imports, and not by direct taxation. The resolutions were read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented the memorial of citizens of East Tennessee, praying the imposition of duty on foreign silks, and of counter-vailing duties; which was laid on the table.

Mr. YOUNG presented the memorial of Levi Owen, and others, of Illinois, praying the opinion of Congress as to the true meaning and construction of the Constitution, touching the right of property in slaves; the right of the States to issue bills of credit, and the power of Congress to create a National Bank.

Mr. Y. vouched for the great respectability of the memorialists, though their opinions might, to some, appear singular. The memorial was laid on the table.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented a memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, in favor of a general bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. PRENTISS presented two memorials of citizens of the county of Erie, State of New York, and the memorial of citizens of the town of Alexander, in the same State, remonstrating against the ratification and execution of the late treaty with the Seneca Indians; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. P. also presented the petition of John Pope; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HENDERSON presented resolutions of the Legislature of Mississippi, asking that a River Land District may be established in that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. ROBINSON presented the petition of Joseph Shoemaker; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. KING, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Legislature of Louisiana, respecting the placing of buoys at the mouths of the Mississippi—a bill having been already passed on this subject.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill to authorize the Legislative Council of the Territory of Iowa to increase the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in civil cases;

The bill to provide for running and making the northern boundary line of a tract of land reserved for the half-breeds of the Sac and Fox tribes of Indians;

The bill granting to the county of Johnson, in the Territory of Iowa, the right of pre-emption to a tract of land for a seat of justice in said county; and repeating the second section of an act, approved the 31 day of March, 1839, entitled "An act making a donation of land to the Territory of Iowa, for the purpose of erecting public buildings thereon;

The bill to provide for the allowance of invalid pensions to certain Cherokee warriors, under the provisions of the fourteenth article of the treaty of 1835; and

The bill for the relief of John McLeod; were severally read a third time, and passed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN asked leave to introduce a bill to prevent the interference of certain federal officers in elections, and explained and advocated the propriety of the bill, concluding with a wish that a test vote might be made on granting leave.

He was followed in the debate by Messrs. NORVELL, WRIGHT, CLAY of Kentucky, CALHOUN, BUCHANAN, CUTHBERT, and PRESTON.

At the close of Mr. PRESTON's remarks much noise was made in one of the galleries by the stamping of feet and clapping of hands.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama demanded that the gallery should be cleared.

Mr. ANDERSON also insisted that the gallery should be cleared.

Several other Senators joined in the request.

Mr. CLAY: Spare the ladies—they have not sinned. I hope they may be suffered to remain.

Mr. ANDERSON said the noise proceeded from the eastern gallery; and he or his friends had no wish to disturb the ladies.

The eastern gallery was then cleared; and

Mr. CALHOUN having made some remarks on the bill, the question was taken on granting leave to introduce it, and it was decided in the negative—ayes 14, noes 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Mangum, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Southard, and Tallmadge—14.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted the following letter to the Senate:

"WASHINGTON, Feb. 22, 1841.

"Hon. R. M. JOHNSON,

Vice President of the United States:

"SIR: It is the object of this letter to make known to the Senate the resignation of my seat as one of the Senators from Massachusetts, having already informed the Executive of that State that from this day my place would be vacant.

"In retiring from a situation in which so considerable a part of my life has been passed, I hope I may be permitted to express my high respect for the body of which I have been a member, the interest I shall ever feel in the preservation of its character and dignity, and my cordial wishes for the health and happiness of all those with whom I have been associated.

"With much personal regard, I have the honor to be your obedient servant, D. WEBSTER."

When the letter had been read,

Mr. CUTHBERT and Mr. WRIGHT simultaneously rose, but the former gentleman obtaining the floor, expressed his regret that the Senator from Massachusetts was not present to explain or retract certain opinions heretofore expressed by him on a subject of vital interest to the Southern section of the Union.

An animated debate followed, in which Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky, PRESTON, CUTHBERT, and RIVES, participated, and which was terminated by a successful motion for adjournment.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 22, 1841.

Mr. LANE moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of taking up the bill from the Senate, confirming to the State of Indiana certain lands for canal purposes.

At the suggestion of Mr. CLIFFORD,

Mr. LANE modified his motion so as to include the bill making further provision for the expenses of an exploration and survey of a portion of the Northeastern boundary line.

Mr. JONES of Virginia, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, expressed his willingness that one hour should be devoted to these bills; after which time he should feel bound to insist on the further execution of the special order on the general appropriation bill.

NATIONAL DEFENCES.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, (Mr. LANE having given way for that purpose,) reported a bill, in compliance with the instructions of the House, making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States generally for the year 1841, and for armament of fortifications; also, for raising a company of sappers, miners, and pontoniers, and appropriating $500,000 for steam ships of war. The amount proposed by the bill to be appropriated is $1,678,000.

The bill was read a first and second time, and,

On motion of Mr. THOMPSON, it was committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules; which was decided in the affirmative; and

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—Mr. BANKS in the chair—and proceeded to the consideration of the bill entitled "An act to confirm to the State of Indiana the land selected by her for that portion of the Wabash and Erie canal which lies between the mouth of the Tippecanoe river and Terre Haute, and for other purposes."

INDIANA CANAL LANDS AND NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY OF THE UNITED STATES.

At the instance of Mr. PROFFIT, the report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate on the subject was read; and the bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House.

The committee then proceeded to the consideration of the "bill to make further provision for the expenses of an exploration and survey of that part of the Northeastern boundary line of the United States which separates the States of Maine and New Hampshire from the British Provinces."

When this bill was under consideration on the 13th instant, a motion was made by Mr. UNDERWOOD to amend it by striking out $75,000, the amount proposed to be appropriated, and inserting $37,500. Mr. PETRIKIN, on the same day, moved to reduce the appropriation to $12,000.

Mr. PROFFIT said he believed he was entitled to the floor when the bill was up before. Since that time he had paid some attention to the bill, and was convinced that the sum contemplated to be appropriated was necessary for the purpose. He, therefore, should withdraw opposition in every shape, and he would vote for the bill. He had ascertained that there were three lines to be run instead of one.

Mr. CLIFFORD expressed the hope that he might have the attention of the committee for a few minutes, while he made a brief explanation of the necessity of the appropriation asked for in the bill under consideration. He believed it would be wholly unsafe to reduce the amount, and he could not doubt that all would concur with him when the facts of the case were fully understood. Before he attempted to explain the estimates which had been submitted by the commissioners, he desired to make one or two remarks in reference to the position which the State he in part represented, occupied in regard to this survey and exploration. He wished to remind the committee that neither the people nor the authorities of Maine have ever asked this Government to institute it; and he did not know as it would be going too far to say it was not desired by his State at the time it was first recommended, or when that recommendation received the sanction of Congress. At that time the Executive of Maine was pressing upon this Government the performance of its constitutional obligations to protect the State against invasion from a foreign foe. If the wishes of the State had been consulted, a military occupation of the territory in dispute, under the authority of the United States, in all probability would have removed the necessity which may now be supposed to exist, to take any steps to counteract the influence of the ex parte exploration of British agents. But, sir, what answer did the action of Congress instituting this survey give to the authorities of Maine, as a reply to the demand to repel the invaders from its soil? It amounts to this, in my estimation: England is a great and haughty power; if the request made should be immediately granted, there is danger that the peaceful relations between the two countries may be interrupted; it has become important to institute a counter survey, to be made the basis of another effort (fruitless he feared it would be) to convince Lord Palmerston of the preposterous character of the British claim. This survey is not necessary to convince the people of Maine of their rights; they understand them full well; nor is it necessary to enable this Government to judge of the rightful character of their claim under the treaty of 1783. Every branch of this Government, over and over again, and in the most solemn manner, has admitted the right of the State to the whole territory in dispute. No objection, however, was made to the proposed survey; none will be by any member from Maine, unless it should be converted into an excuse for unreasonable delay in removing the British troops quartered upon the soil, and within the jurisdiction of the State. Mr. C. said, he did not desire any extravagance in this or any other branch of the public service. All he desired was, that the amount should be sufficient to insure the completion of the work during the next season. Negotiation is at a stand for the want of the information expected from commission. Let the survey be completed—to that he would not object. It ought to be made; but let it be well and quickly done. Last year's appropriation is now exhausted, and but little, comparatively, has been accomplished. The commissioners, in pursuance of that duty, have estimated the expense to complete the survey, basing the calculation upon the actual cost per mile of the last year's work. It is said to be extravagant—doubtless gentlemen think so—but does any one know, and can it be demonstrated, that a less sum will be sufficient to ensure the accomplishment of the object in view, without unnecessary delay? He would appeal to the committee if it is not more reasonable to believe that if any considerable reduction should be made from the estimates submitted, the effect of it will be to throw the whole matter over another year, and to invite an application at the next session of Congress for a new appropriation. He thought so, and he feared such would be the result. It is true the sum is large, but the service to be performed is far greater than gentlemen seem to suppose, and much more expensive than an ordinary survey of courses and distances; the commissioners are required to make a barometrical survey to ascertain the altitude of all the principal elevations on the different routes, and, as he supposed, their latitude and longitude. There are three lines to be explored, each extending through a wilderness, or rather a dense forest, the distance of two or three hundred miles. One of these lines or routes, called the meridian line, extends from the monument marked on the map, to the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, and the other two extend quite across the State from west to east, being the true north line, and the one recently surveyed by the British agents. As every member of the committee must perceive, it requires three companies to prosecute the work, and as he (Mr. C.) understood, of forty men to a company. The necessity of so large a force is easily explained, on account of the distance from settlements, and the difficulty of transporting provisions and the necessary implements to prosecute the work. Mr. C. made some further explanations as to the extraordinary character of the report of Messrs. Featherstonagh and Mudge, and concluded by remarking that, as the members on all side of the House informed him they were ready to vote the whole amount asked for, he would not pursue the subject at this time.

Mr. PETRIKIN said that any member of the committee had been challenged to show that the appropriation asked for by this bill was not too large. Now, Mr. P. would state, that two distinct lines were run between Texas and the United States, and only $10,000 were appropriated for that purpose. The distance was about three times greater than that part of the Northeastern boundary line of the United States which separates the States of Maine and Hampshire from the British Provinces. He said that the reason for this small appropriation was obvious. Men had been taken from the woods, and were acquainted with the country; while, on the other hand, gentlemen had been taken from colleges, who knew nothing.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

And the question was then taken on the amendment, and it was also rejected.

On motion of Mr. JAMESON, the committee then rose, and reported the bills to the House.

The question was then taken, Shall the bill to confirm certain lands to the State of Indiana be read a third time? and passed in the affirmative.

The bill was read a third time; and the question being put, Shall the bill pass?

It was passed in the affirmative.

The question was about being taken on engrossing, for a third reading, the bill to make further provision for the expenses of an exploration and survey of a portion of the Northeastern boundary line, when

Mr. PETRIKIN moved that the words $75,000 in the third line be stricken out, and that $20,000 be inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved $50,000.

Mr. W. B. CAMPBELL moved that $37,500 be inserted.

Mr. STANLY moved the previous question; which being seconded, was put and carried, and

The main question was then put,

1. On striking out $75,000 and inserting $50,000.

2. On striking out $75,000 and inserting $37,500.

2. On striking out $75,000, and inserting $20,000.

All of which amendments were severally rejected.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and was read a third time.

And the question was then stated, Shall the bill pass? when

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to re-commit the bill to a Select Committee, with instructions to inquire how many French cooks, pots of currant jelly, and sweet meats, were required for the commissioners to conduct the survey.

Pending which motion,

Mr. SMITH of Maine moved the previous question; which was seconded, put, and carried; and

The main question was then put, and passed in the affirmative.

So the bill was passed.

STEAMBOAT EXPLOSIONS.

Mr. PETRIKIN inquired of the SPEAKER whether there was not a special order for this day?

The SPEAKER replied that a special order—the steamboat bills—had, on the 16th instant, by a vote of two-thirds, been further postponed until this day.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the special order was postponed until Monday next, and

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—Mr. BELL in the Chair—and resumed the consideration of the CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. STANLY to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. SERGEANT resumed his remarks, and concluded at one o'clock.

Mr. STANLY then withdrew the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, stating that he did so at the earnest request of gentlemen of both sides. He had made the motion in the first instance, in order that he might have an opportunity of making his speech. He was satisfied, if others were. If other gentlemen desired to speak, they could renew the motion.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. HUNT to strike out the following proviso:

"Provided, however, That the district attorneys of the United States, in and for the several districts, the clerks and marshals, respectively, of the same, shall render an account quarter yearly, each and every year hereafter, to the Secretary of the Treasury, of all fees, emoluments, and receipts, of every name and nature whatever, by them respectively received by virtue of their said offices; which account shall be rendered upon oath or affirmation, and shall be in such form, and supported by such proofs as the Secretary of the Treasury in his judgment may prescribe for the purpose of enforcing the provisions hereinafter named, that is to say: if it shall appear that the salaries, fees, emoluments, receipts and earnings, of any of the said attorneys, shall exceed the sum of ——— dollars, then such attorneys shall pay such excess into the Treasury of the United States for general purposes of the Government; and if the salaries, fees, emoluments, or earnings, of any of said clerks shall exceed ——— dollars, then the excess shall, in like manner, be paid into the Treasury for the purposes aforesaid; and if the salaries, earnings, fees, and emoluments, of any of the said marshals shall exceed the sum of ——— dollars, then such excess shall also be paid into the Treasury for purposes aforesaid."

Mr. CUSHING then obtained the floor, but yielded it momentarily, for purposes of explanation, to Messrs. STANLY, RHETT, and RIVES.

[These explanations had reference to some facts stated by Mr. STANLY in his speech on Thursday evening last.]

Mr. RIVES requested the gentleman from Massachusetts to let him have the floor for a few moments, to notice the charge of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] "that Abolitionists were in the caucus that prepared the Atherton resolutions."

Mr. CUSHING consented; and

Mr. RIVES was about to proceed, when

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina and Mr. PECK objected.

Mr. RIVES insisted that he had the floor, and as the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] was in conflict with the account he had given during his canvass for Congress two years ago, he hoped to have the attention of the committee for a few moments.

Mr. R. said he went into that caucus, but not with Abolitionists. There was not any man in it who wished Congress to interfere with slavery. He would not go into an examination of the opinions of the member from Ohio, [Mr. DUNCAN,] but he felt it his duty to say here, what he had said at home, "that the gentleman from Ohio had no agency in preparing the resolutions alluded to, nor was he in the caucus."

Mr. STANLY insisted that he was, and that he could prove it by respectable members of the party to which Mr. R. belonged.

Mr. RIVES said the gentleman's informant was mistaken; that the same thing had been said, and perhaps founded on the same evidence, in his district, which caused him to inquire into the matter when he came to the last session of Congress, and he had not met with a man who had any recollection of seeing the member from Ohio in caucus, and that the member himself had authorized him to say that he was not there.

Mr. CUSHING then renewed the motion to strike out the enacting clause, but after some remarks on the impropriety of attempting reform at the present session, withdrew it.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. HUNT to strike out the proviso in relation to district attorneys, marshals, &c. (as above stated.)

Mr. HUNT took the floor, but yielded it for the moment to

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi, who desired to submit an amendment; but, it not being in order then to do so, he gave notice that he would move it at the proper time.

Mr. HUNT then addressed the committee strictly with reference to the immediate motion submitted by him—explaining certain particulars in which his former remarks had been misunderstood; and expressing himself ready to enter upon a system of retrenchment and reform whenever the moment arrived at which, from the composition of the House, any efficient action could be had.

Mr. REED entered into a history of this matter, and of the various efforts that had been made to provide a remedy for what he considered an evil which ought to be corrected. The fees were exorbitant and should be reduced.

Mr. G. DAVIS submitted the following amendment to the amendment:

"After the word districts, in the 416th line, insert 'shall render an account quarterly, each and every year hereafter, to the Secretary of the Treasury, of all fees, commissions, and other emoluments, of every name and nature whatever, accruing to them, directly or indirectly, in consequence of any service pertaining to their office rendered for the Government of the United States; and no district attorney shall be entitled to be paid, or to retain as compensation for all such services so rendered the Government of the United States, a sum exceeding $—, in any one year, including his salary, and all other emoluments arising directly or indirectly from his office, and."

"Also amend said clause by striking out these words: 'If it shall appear that the salaries, fees, emoluments, receipts, and earnings, of any of the said attorneys shall exceed the sum of $—, then such attorneys shall pay such excess into the Treasury of the United States for the general purposes of the Government.' And before the words salaries, fees, &c. insert the word net."

"And at the end of the proviso proposed to be stricken out, add: 'And that in all cases where the fees, emoluments, receipts, and earnings of any clerk of any District or Circuit Court of the United States, or of both together, where they may be blended and united in the same individual, shall in any year exceed the sum of $—, such District Court may allow to the Clerk thereof, and such Circuit Court may allow to the Clerk thereof, a reasonable compensation for as many deputies as may have been necessary, in addition to his own attention and labor, to have enabled him to perform the duties of his office in any one year. And the Circuit Court that may sit in any district, or, if there be no such Circuit Court, then the District Court thereof, may allow to any Marshal of any District of the United States the like reasonable compensation for as many deputies as may have been necessary to have enabled him to perform the duties of his office in any one year in which his emoluments, earnings, and receipts shall have exceeded the sum of $—; and also the reasonable travelling expenses of such Marshal and his deputies, actually incurred in the execution of their official duties; which several allowance for deputies, and the expenses of any Marshal or Deputy Marshal, so made by any Court, shall be forthwith certified to the Treasury of the United States.'"

Mr. D. explained to the committee the effect of his proposition, and submitted some general remarks in regard to the reform and retrenchment which they had undertaken to carry out. He had not concluded when, the hour of 2½ having arrived,

The House took a recess until 4 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess,

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky resumed his remarks in support of his amendment. He spoke at some length in favor of reducing the salaries of all officers in the employ of Government. When that shall be the case, he contended that the Executive would no longer be annoyed, as under the present system of high salaries. If the salaries were not higher than a fair compensation, then individuals would no longer aspire to office, for it would hold out no inducement. Mr. D. went on to show, that by this plan the influence of the Executive would be lessened, and concluded by slightly modifying his amendment.

Mr. SALTONSTALL agreed that this subject required attention, and that there were many abuses in the system which called loudly for reform. He submitted, however, whether at this late period of the session there was time for the investigation of so important a matter. Only a few days remained of the session, and there were now no less than five appropriation bills to be acted upon. He hoped, therefore, that the appropriation bills would be first passed, and the present subject be postponed until there should be a more favorable opportunity for doing it justice.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON hoped, that in case he could not vote for the proviso, he should not be accused of being opposed to retrenchment and reform. If the system were an evil, it appeared to him an irremediable evil. Mr. W. proceeded to contend that although in two or three places the fees of United States district attorneys, etc. might be too large, yet in the majority of cases in various parts of the country, the compensation was hardly sufficient to ensure the services of competent men. The consequence was, that, in numerous instances, none but third-rate lawyers could be procured to act for the Government. It was absurd and unjust to reduce the fees of a whole class merely because one or two might receive a liberal sum. The fee bill did undoubtedly require some alterations, but yet he did not hesitate to say that the fees in the majority of cases in other parts of the Union, were not sufficient to ensure the services of competent men.

Mr. MASON of Ohio followed, and concluded by raising a point of order as to whether the proviso in question could, under the rules, be inserted in an appropriation bill.

Mr. VANDERPOEL contended that the proviso, according to the previous practice of the House, was strictly in order. He referred to various instances to show that, when crying abuses existed, Congress had always corrected those abuses in an appropriation bill. Mr. V. also gave his views at some length on the merits of the question involved in the proviso.

The point of order raised by Mr. MASON still pending,

The CHAIR observed that he could not decide that the proviso should be stricken from the bill, because the committee only had the power, and could strike out the proviso as improperly reported if they thought proper. Were the CHAIR to decide that it should be stricken out on the ground that it was improperly reported, it would be a usurpation of power. He must therefore leave it for the action of the committee.

The committee then acquiesced in the decision of the CHAIR.

The question then being on the amendment of Mr. DAVIS to the motion of Mr. HUNT to strike out the proviso, Messrs. GRINNELL, VANDERPOEL, and MONROE, gave their views.

Mr. FLOYD said that he had not intended to address the committee upon this provision of the bill for reducing the fees of district attorneys, and should not do so now, were he not an ardent admirer of the principles of "economy and reform," which appeared to be deserted by those who had professed for them the highest regard. We have been told (said Mr. F.) that the party which has lately triumphed had inscribed, in the ample folds of its banner, "economy and reform;" and he supposed, when he came to attend this session of Congress, that those who had preached so loud and so long on that subject would make some attempt to practise, after election, what they had preached before the election. We have been told, too, that the present Administration has been condemned for its extravagance; and where is the member on this floor, of the Opposition party, who can rise in his place and say that he did not give circulation to speeches, delivered here at the last session, denouncing the Administration as prodigal and extravagant? And yet we have reached the 17th page of the general appropriation bill, and the first dollar is not yet stricken out by any move from any member of this great "economy and reform" party. An honorable member has told us that the reform called for by the recent election is a general reform, and not a trifling picayune business. So be it. Let him apply his general reform to this bill, and reduce the expenses of the Government. Another has told us that they will begin the work when they have the power. Sir, said Mr. F. they have the power now—let them try; and if any one has the courage to make the attempt, my word for it, he will find enough here to help him carry it through. Now is the time to commence the good work, before the offices are filled with their friends; now, when they can escape the odium of reducing salaries after appointments are made. Will they be more willing to apply the pruning knife when their political friends are in possession of the offices? Why, sir, it is but a day or two since, that my honorable colleague from the Columbia District [Mr. VANDERPOEL] attempted to strike out an appropriation of $1,000 for a clerk in the Fifth Auditor's office; but, although the clerkship is vacant, and has been for some time, he got no aid from the economy and reform party; they shrunk from abolishing a single solitary vacant clerkship; and if they cannot spare one clerk from so large a bureau as this, where, I ask, are they to carry out their principles of reform? They have told the people that the expenses of the Government were too great. I have no doubt that many believed them, and have decreed a reduction of expenditures. Let gentlemen now redeem their pledges to the people. Let them begin somewhere; and they will find those here who will aid them in carrying out the principles of economy and reform on the most enlarged and liberal scale.

Mr. EVANS rose to a question of order. The amendment proposed to alter the fees allowed by the existing law, and was, to that extent, a repeal of the law. The proviso, as reported in the bill, did not alter the charge for fees, but this amendment did. He considered it irregular and unusual, and put it to the Chair whether the proposition to amend could be admitted.

The CHAIR observed that if this were an original proposition to insert such a proviso in the bill, he would have no hesitation in ruling it out of order. But though the proviso in the bill was irregular, yet the Chair could have no control over it, inasmuch as it had been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, and entertained by the House. Therefore, the proviso being in the bill, it was competent to amend or perfect the same, although it might go to change an existing law.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi, in pursuance of notice given, then submitted his amendment, as follows:

Strike out, in the eighteenth and nineteenth pages of the bill, that part relating to the district attorneys, clerks, and marshals, respectively, and insert:

"That hereafter, in lieu of all fees, emoluments, and receipts, now allowed, it shall and may be lawful for the United States clerks, attorneys, counsel, and marshals, in the district and circuit courts of the United States in the several States, to demand and receive the same fees that now are, or hereafter may be, allowed by the laws of the said States respectively where said courts are held, to the clerks, attorneys and counsel, and sheriffs, in the highest courts of the said States in which like services are rendered; and no other fees or emoluments, except that the marshals shall receive in full, for summoning all the jurors for any one court, thirty dollars; and shall receive, for every day's actual attendance at any court, five dollars per day; and for any services, including the compensation for mileage, performed by said officers in the discharge of their official duty, for which no compensation is provided by the laws of said States, respectively, the said officers may receive such fees as are now allowed by law according to the existing usage and practice of said courts of the United States; and every district attorney, except the district attorney of the southern district of New York, shall receive, in addition to the above fees, a salary of two hundred dollars per annum."

After some incidental remarks by Messrs. HAND, FILLMORE, J. THOMPSON, UNDERWOOD, CURTIS, JONES of Virginia, BROWN of Mississippi, and WELLER,

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 67, nays 66.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to amend the amendment first adopted, by adding thereto the following:

And provided also, That in addition to the account now required to be rendered by every collector of customs, naval officer, and surveyor of ports, every such collector, naval officer, and surveyor shall, each and every year hereafter, render a quarterly yearly account under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury in such form as said Secretary shall prescribe, for the purpose of giving full effect to this proviso, of all sums of money by them respectively received or collected for fines, penalties, or forfeitures, or for seizure of goods, wares, or merchandise; or on account of suits instituted for frauds against the revenue laws; or for rent and storage of goods, wares, or merchandise, beyond the rents paid by the collector or other such officer; and if from such accounting it shall appear that the account received in any one year, by any collector, naval officer, or surveyor, an account of fines and penalties, or forfeitures, and on account of any seizures made or suits instituted for frauds or evasions of the revenue laws, and for rents and storage as aforesaid, shall, in the aggregate, exceed the sum of two thousand dollars, such excess shall be paid into the Treasury for the use of the United States. And no such collector shall hereafter, under any pretence whatever, have, or receive, or retain for himself, in the aggregate, more than six thousand dollars per year, including commissions for storage, and any other commissions or salaries as now allowed and limited by law. No such naval officer shall, on any pretence, in the aggregate, have or receive, or retain for himself, more than five thousand dollars per year, including commissions and salaries as aforesaid:—no such surveyor shall, in the aggregate, have or receive, or retain, more than four thousand five hundred dollars per year, including commissions and salaries as now allowed and limited by law.

The CHAIR decided the amendment out of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved that the committee rise; but the motion did not prevail.

Mr. C. JOHNSON appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

The CHAIR said that a similar proposition—to reduce contingent salaries—was, at the last session of Congress, ruled out of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD inquired if the appeal was debatable?

The CHAIR said he would not refuse to hear any suggestions on the subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then asked the CHAIR to point to any particular rule which prohibited such amendments.

The CHAIR remarked that his decision was based upon the 50th rule, which is as follows:

"No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment. No bill or resolution shall, at any time, be amended, by annexing thereto, or incorporating therewith, any other bill or resolution pending before the committee."

Several precedents were then read in support of the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. CASEY asked Mr. JOHNSON to withdraw his appeal.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said he had some important amendments to offer to the bill under consideration, and that if the decision of the CHAIR should be sustained, they would be cut off. He believed, however, that there was nothing in the rules of the House which would prevent his amendments from being offered. Mr. U. contended that he had uniformly seen the rules of the House bent to the circumstances of the times, and proceeded, at some length, to contrast the decision of the CHAIR with the provisions on the statute book; but, without concluding, gave way for a motion that the committee rise; which prevailed—and

The committee then rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Mr. GALBRAITH submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That from and after one o'clock to-morrow, all debate in Committee of the Whole on House bill No 601 (the general appropriation bill) shall cease; and after said period, the committee shall proceed to vote on any amendments that may be offered thereto, and report the same to the House.

Mr. G. moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of considering the resolution at this time.

But, pending the motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, February 23, 1841.

Mr. ANDERSON presented the petition of Samuel Martin, submitting a plan for a National Bank.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that in 1836 he had presented the documents of Charles F. Sibbald, asking indemnity for property destroyed by the United States. These documents were now on file, and he asked that they might be again referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRENTISS presented the memorial of citizens of Chataque county, and citizens of the towns of Collins and Brandt, in the State of New York, remonstrating against the removal of that portion of the Seneca nation who refused their assent to the treaty; which were severally ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of J. Epes Cowan, praying the confirmation of his title to a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WHITE presented the petition of a number of the citizens of the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, praying the establishment of a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. KING presented the petition of a number of the citizens of Marengo county, Alabama, praying the enactment of a bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented the memorial of citizens of Princeton, New Jersey, in favor of a bankrupt law; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENFON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid, out of the contin-gent fund of the Senate, to each of the messengers of the Senate and office of the Secretary of the Senate, three dollars per day per annum; and to the assistant messenger of the office of Secretary of the Senate, and laborers of the Senate, two dollars per day per annum, in lieu of all other allowances whatever.

Mr. KING thought the system proposed by the resolution was much better than the one at present pursued, but, that it might have proper consideration, he hoped it would be referred to the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; which was agreed to.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce

A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to amend the act approved May 13, 1800, entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States.'"

Leave was granted, and the bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of James McDonald; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill to continue in force the first section of an act entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon, to the General Land Office, approved July 7, 1838."

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, made an adverse report on the petition of David Green; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, to which was referred the petition of a number of the stonecutters employed on the new Treasury building, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

GENERAL ORDERS.

The following bills were taken up, and considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

The bill for the relief of certain railroad companies therein named.

The bill to authorize the issue of patents to certain entries of the public lands.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Scott.

The bill explanatory of an act supplemental to an act entitled "An act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands;" approved June 22, 1838.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Eckford, deceased.

The bill for the relief of Samuel Crapin.

The bill in favor of Mary Snow.

The bill from the House making further provisions for the expenses of the exploration and survey of the boundary line between Maine and New Hampshire, and the British Provinces, was taken up on its first reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS explained the objects of the bill, and hoped that the Senate would unanimously agree to consider it at the present time, without referring it to a committee.

No objection being made, the bill was considered as in committee of the whole, went through its various stages, finally passed, and wants but the signature of the President to become a law.

BANKS OF THE DISTRICT.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill to revive and continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia; and after a debate, in which Messrs. CLAY of Alabama, WRIGHT, MERRICK, BENFON, and TAPPAN, participated, and the adoption of amendments proposed by Messrs. CLAY of Alabama and WRIGHT, the bill assumed the following shape:

A BILL to revive and continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the charters of the Farmers and Mechanics Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of Metropolis, Patriotic Bank of Washington, and Bank of Washington, in the city of Washington, and the Farmers Bank of Alexandria, and Bank of Potomac, in the town of Alexandria, be, and the same are hereby, revived as they existed on the third day of July last, and extended to the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and forty-three:

Provided The said banks shall each for itself redeem all its notes and specie liabilities in specie when demanded from and after the passage of this act, and throughout the whole period for which the said several charters are hereby extended. And in the event that any one or more of said banks shall decline to meet its liabilities in specie as aforesaid, or having commenced to pay specie, shall, hereafter, during the period aforesaid cease or fail to do so, any bank so declining, ceasing, or failing to pay in specie, shall, ipso facto, forfeit its charter, and shall proceed to wind up its concerns under the provisions of the law passed on the 3d of July, 1840, entitled "An act to continue the corporate existence of certain banks in the District of Columbia for certain purposes," which said act is hereby made applicable in all its provisions to every of said banks failing as aforesaid, for the period of two years from the date of any such failure or neglect to pay in specie. And any attempt by the officers of any of said banks so as above said forfeiting its charter, after any such forfeiture, to exercise any of the banking privileges conferred by this act, shall subject such officers to all the penalties of illegal banking.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That neither of the said banks shall, by virtue of any thing in this act contained, be authorized to issue or pay out any note, bill, check, or draft of any bank company, incorporation, association, or individual, which said note, bill, check, or draft, shall not be payable and paid on demand in specie at the place where it is made payable; and any violation of this restriction shall be, ipso facto, a forfeiture of all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act in the manner specified in the first section thereof as to a failure of specie payments.

Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall prohibit either of said banks from receiving the paper of any non-specie paying bank or special deposit, and returning the same to the depositor.

Mr. TAPPAN then offered a substitute for the whole bill, and spoke at great length in opposition to the present banking system; and without concluding his remarks, yielded to a motion to postpone its further consideration until to-morrow.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business.

And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 23, 1841.

The SPEAKER stated the first business before the House to be the motion of Mr. GALBRAITH to suspend the rules to enable him to offer the following resolution, and pending which motion last night the House had adjourned, viz:

Resolved, That from and after one o'clock to-morrow, all debate in Committee of the Whole on House bill No. 601 shall cease, and after said period the committee shall proceed to vote on any amendments that may be offered thereto, and report the same to the House.

Mr. GALBRAITH then modified his resolution, at the suggestion of a number of friends, so as to read "four o'clock this day."

Mr. FILLMORE suggested to Mr. GALBRAITH to delay the time one hour longer, so that the bill in relation to taking testimony in cases of contested elections might be taken up.

Mr. RIVES concurred in the suggestion of the gentleman from New York. The matter was important, and he understood that it was probable several cases of contested election would be brought before the next Congress.

At the suggestion of Mr. FILLMORE, Mr. GALBRAITH further modified his resolution by substituting "five o'clock this day."

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and decided in the affirmative.

The resolution, as amended, was again read. Mr. GALBRAITH moved the previous question, which was seconded, put, and carried.

The question now recurring on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. PECK called for the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The resolution was then adopted.

And so the debate on the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1841, will cease this day at 5 o'clock.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BELL in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1841.

The pending question was on the appeal taken by Mr. CASEY JOHNSON from the decision of the Chair last evening, that the following amendment offered by the gentleman was not in order, on the ground, first, that the subject was entirely different from that under consideration; and secondly, that the amendment related to a class of officers for whom no appropriation was made in the bill.

And provided also, That in addition to the account now required to be rendered by every collector of customs, naval officer, and surveyor of ports, every such collector, naval officer, and surveyor, shall, each and every year hereafter, render a quarterly account under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury in such form as said Secretary shall prescribe, for the purpose of giving full effect to this proviso, of all sums of money by them respectively received or collected for fines, penalties, or forfeitures, or for seizure of goods, wares, or merchandise; or on account of suits instituted for frauds against the revenue; or for rent and storage of goods, wares, or merchandise, beyond the rents paid by the collector or other such officer; and if from such accounting it shall appear that the account received in any one year, by any collector, naval officer, or surveyor, on account of fines and penalties, or forfeitures, and on account of any seizures made or suits instituted for frauds or evasions of the revenue laws, and for rents and storage as aforesaid; shall, in the aggregate, exceed the sum of two thousand dollars, such excess shall be paid into the Treasury for the use of the United States. And no such collector shall hereafter, under any pretence whatever, have, or receive, or retain for himself, in the aggregate, more than six thousand dollars per year, including commissions for storage, and any other commissions or salaries as now allowed and limited by law. No such naval officer shall, on any pretence, in the aggregate, have or receive, or retain for himself, more than five thousand dollars per year, including commissions and salaries as aforesaid; no such surveyor shall, in the aggregate, have or receive, or retain, more than four thousand five hundred dollars per year, including commissions and salaries as now allowed and limited by law.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana rose and moved to reconsider the vote taken last evening on the proposition of Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN said that it was not in order to move to reconsider a vote in committee; the question would gain come up in the House.

And the question recurring, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The question of order was debated at considerable length by Messrs. ATHERTON, CLIFFORD, TILLINGHAST, BANKS, UNDERWOOD, WINTHROP, and EVERETT.

After which the CHAIRMAN stated briefly the grounds of his decision.

Mr. TILLINGHAST said, if the gentleman from Maine would direct his mind, with that discrimination of which he was so capable, to the distinction between this point and that upon the proviso which had been sustained, he believed he would be satisfied that the present decision of the Chair was correct. That proviso was reported to the House by the Committee of Ways and Means, was received by the House as part of the report, was a part of the bill committed to the Committee of the Whole by the House, and was, therefore, of itself a subject-matter on which the House had directed this committee to act and report. The committee, therefore, could not, of its own authority, discharge itself on this subject-matter on the ground that the House erred in referring it to them. Besides, that proviso pertained to the appropriation of $325,000 for the support of the judiciary, to which it was attached as a condition, relating to offices of the judiciary, and in effect conditionally reducing that identical appropriation. But he had understood the Chair that even that proviso, if it had been originally moved in the Committee of the Whole, would have been ruled out of order. The amendment now proposed did not relate to any appropriation in the bill; it related to the collectors; it went into a branch of the Government which was not in anywise a subject of the bill, and for which no proposition for an appropriation was before the committee. It did not pertain at all to the subject-matter of the proviso itself, or to its substitute, to which the gentleman said it was an addition. True, it might be called an addition in point of locality and position in the bill, but not otherwise. On looking it over at the table, he found no provision in it in regard to any judicial officer. Here, then, was the express rule that no proposition on a subject different from that under consideration should be admitted as an amendment. On what ground could the committee disregard this rule, and proceed to the consideration of a subject not committed to them? Additions of this sort had, it is true, been made in former bills, in a few instances remembered as aberrations, but they had been made either by general consent, expressly dispensing with the rule, or in the Senate, where the rule did not exist. No decision of the House could be shown, upon the point of order raised, sanctioning such an amendment as in order when objected to. He believed the decision of the Chair was conformable both to the words of the rule and to all former constructions of it, and should therefore support it.

And the question being then put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" it was decided in the affirmative without a division.

So the decision of the Chair was affirmed.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON then offered the following amendment:

"Provided further, That the district attorneys for the United States in and for the several districts, the clerks and marshals respectively of the same, shall render an account quarterly, each and every year hereafter, to the Secretary of the Treasury, of all fees, emoluments, and receipts of every name and nature whatever by them respectively received by virtue of said offices; which account shall be rendered upon oath or affirmation, and shall be in such form, and supported by such proofs as the Secretary of the Treasury in his judgment may prescribe for the purpose of enforcing the provisions hereinafter named: that is to say, if it shall appear that the salaries, fees, and emoluments, receipts, and earnings of any of the said attorneys shall exceed the sum of $4,500, then such attorneys shall pay such excess into the Treasury of the United States for general purposes of Government. And if the salaries, fees, emoluments or earnings of any of the said clerks or marshals shall exceed $3,500, then the excess shall in like manner be paid into the Treasury for the purposes aforesaid. And if the salaries, earnings, fees, and emoluments of any of the said marshals shall exceed the sum of $5,000, then such excess shall also be paid into the Treasury for the purposes aforesaid."

Mr. CUSHING inquired of the CHAIR whether this proposition was not substantially the same as that struck out last evening?

After a few moments' consideration, the CHAIRMAN said that he had not had time to examine the proposition minutely, but, from looking at it, he thought he saw that it was a proposition to insert as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. THOMPSON] engrafted on the bill last evening, that portion of the original proviso which was struck out, almost in the very terms of the proviso. If that was so, it was not in order.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON then offered the following amendment to the amendment:

Provided, That the fees and emoluments retained by the district attorneys, marshals, and clerks, shall in no case, exceed, for the district attorney and marshal, or either of them, the sum of $6,000; and those for each of the clerks shall not exceed, in any case, $4,500; the surplus of fees and emoluments to be paid into the public Treasury, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, subject to the disposition of Congress.

Mr. HUNT submitted that this was precisely the same proposition in principle as the proposition struck out last night, which was, fixing a maximum.

The amendment was debated by Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON, EVANS, WISE, CURTIS, VANDERPOEL, STANLY, GRANGER, GRAVES, and CUSHING.

The latter observed that, during the debate, he had been much edified at the exhibition of such new born zeal of the Administration going out of power, to reduce the salaries of these officers. It was a sudden conversion—a conversion in the very agonies of death. Mr. C. went on to contend that, during the last twelve years, the Administration had made no effort for the reform now proposed, but now their successors were about to be carried into power, this attempt was made. Mr. C. also contended that under the present and last Administrations, the burdens of the people, instead of being diminished, had been increased. He then proceeded to say that Mr. Van Buren had expended $23,000,000 during his term, of the surplus revenue of the fourth instalment, not distributed among the people. Yes, all this, in addition to the ordinary revenue of Government, had been devoured, destroyed, burnt up, by this Administration. After some further remarks, complaining that this measure of reform had not been introduced until the dying throes of the Administration, Mr. C. concluded by appealing to members of both parties to suspend all further debate of a party character, and proceed at once to the merits of the bill before them.

After some remarks from Mr. CRARY in favor of commencing reform at the present time, without waiting for another opportunity,

Mr. GENTRY took the floor, and made some very violent remarks against the party now in power, for not commencing this reform at an earlier period.

Mr. ALFORD was surprised to hear his Whig friends talk in the way they did. His object in rising was to urge upon them not to reserve the work of reform until General Harrison should come into power, but to do it now. This was the proper time to do the deed. He hoped his friends would not think because he deemed this an improper time to touch the tariff, that he considered it too soon to commence reform. It was always too soon to do wrong, but never too soon to commence doing right.

After some further remarks in relation to the impropriety of wasting time in party recriminations, now that the battle had been won, Mr. A. again urged that now was the accepted time—now was the day of salvation. He would tell his friends, that after making thousands of stump speeches through the country about "reform," it ill became them to refuse to commence that reform whenever they had the power.

At the late canvass there were three candidates, viz: Harrison, Tyler, and Reform. They had elected two of the candidates, Harrison and Tyler, and it was their duty to bring up the third.

But, (continued Mr. A.) gentlemen say they will not commence now. Why not? What excuse could they have in not carrying out their promises whenever an opportunity should offer? These Loco Focos, as they are called, and I think very properly too, although they do repent at the last moment, like the thief on the Cross, yet as they do not repent, I call on my friends to embrace the opportunity and co-operate with them, whatever may be their motive, in the correction of these abuses. No matter what may be the motive, now these Loco Focos are ready to go for reform, although at the last hour, I say go with them. Do good whenever you can.

After drawing a contrast between the high salaries of the United States District Attorneys, Marshals, etc. and those of the high officers of the Government, Mr. A. asked his friends what excuse they could possibly have for refusing to reduce the salaries of these attorneys. For a long time past the Whigs have been condemning the extravagance of the Loco Focos, and bawling about "reform, reform," on every stump; and now when they had a chance to commence that reform, they were anxious to put it off until another opportunity. They had been constantly teasing the Loco-Focos about retrenchment, and now those sinners repented, the Whig reformers refused to co-operate with them. Mr. A. continued his remarks at some length, censuring his Whig friends for their indisposition to show their faith by their works, now that the opportunity was afforded. He warned them that the people would never consider it a good reason for opposing measures of retrenchment, that those measures originated with the party now going out of power. Neither would the people hold them blameless for violating their promises, upon the pretence that those who called on them for the performance, belonged to an expiring Administration. He hinted that the real motive of the Whigs, who opposed a limitation of the excessive salaries which the pressure of the times had produced, was that certain gentlemen, belonging to the incoming Administration, were casting their eyes towards them, and looked to enjoy them. But, said Mr. A. I tell the gentlemen who have opposed this reform, that if no one can be found in the North who will accept the office there, at the limited salary of $6,000 a year, I shall be glad of it, for then there will be some chance for a Nullifier of Georgia to come in for the appointment.

Mr. A. concluded by saying, that with all his prejudices against the present Administration, yet now they proposed reform, although at the last hour of their existence, he was ready and willing to co-operate with them. And he would say to his friends in the words of Shakspeare,

"Lay on Macduff,
And d—d be he who first cries hold! enough."

Mr. STEENROD asked Mr. THOMPSON when he (Mr. T.) introduced his bill to reduce the salaries of the marshals and district attorneys.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi said, in answer to the question propounded to him by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, he had to say that, when he came here last session, being fully apprized of the enormous sums (as the gentleman from Ohio will have it) received by the marshals and clerks of the courts of the United States for their services, he, at a very early period of the last session, introduced a bill, the object of which was to remedy the evils now complained of, and which contained the identical principles of the proviso he had offered on last night. This bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and on several occasions he sought interviews with some of the members of that committee, and urged upon them to report the bill back to this House. At last, it was reported, and placed upon the calendar of this House; but it was at so late a period of the session, that it was impossible to reach and act upon it. Among all his political friends with whom he had consulted as to that bill, he never heard one of them object to its principles, propriety, or policy. The course of remarks which had been indulged in during this debate, made it proper for him to make this statement.

But, while he was up, he thought it proper to make one or two remarks further. Gentlemen ask, whence this new-born zeal for reform? So far as he was concerned himself, all who have observed his course in this House will bear him witness that it was by no means a new feeling or a new line of conduct. He had always been prepared to vote for every thing which savored of reform, whenever it came up, and wherever it could be reached. The question was now up in order, and he hoped the practice of gentlemen would square with their often repeated professions. He hoped that a great principle was not to be lost and frittered away by technical questions of order. But the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. GENTRY,] who has just taken his seat, has been pleased to denominate the Democratic party as an expiring party, in the last gasp. He would tell that gentleman, he shoots wide the mark in supposing the Democratic party a dying party. He, no doubt, would be glad to have it so. He, no doubt, would rejoice in his heart, firmly to believe its truth. But he would tell him, lay not the flattering unction to his soul; the spirit of Democracy is not dead—it is not down; and like Banquo's ghost, it will not down at his bidding. But, in some shape or other, he will have to speak to it, either as "a spirit of health or a goblin damned;" and if he did not mistake, it would bear to him no joyful tidings of quiet and repose. It is true the people have, in their sovereign pleasure, taken the offices of the country out of their hands and given them to the Whig party. We have been defeated and not overthrown. We have lost power, but our principles the principles of the people. And if the incoming Administration shall fail to carry out those great principles, gentlemen will find, to their great discomfiture, that after this supposed death, will come the resurrection and the judgment, when righteousness, justice, and truth, will prove triumphant.

But the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GENTRY] likens the Democratic party to condemned criminals under the gallows, in a condition of infamy, and are now making the confessions which are extorted from them by a guilty conscience. This, sir, is not an original idea with the gentleman; it is but the echo of what has been said by another greater man in Israel in the other end of the Capitol. He protested against the application of any such terms to the party to which he belonged. They were unjust and unmerited, and found no justification in his opinion, in the feelings of the people. But should the gentleman seek to apply the infamy he speaks of to the individual members of the Democratic party—

Here the CHAIR interposed, and said he did not understand the gentleman from Tennessee as intending his remarks to be taken in any personal sense whatever.

Mr. THOMPSON said he had not a word more to say, if that was his intention, and would not longer detain the committee.

Mr. MORGAN moved to amend the amendment by inserting a proviso that all the fees over $6,000 received by district attorneys, marshals, etc. for the last twelve years should be refunded, but subsequently withdrew it, with the remark (as the Reporter understood) that, as he supposed very little could be obtained from the gentlemen who had held these offices during that time, he would not press it.

Mr. MORGAN then moved to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "service" the words "exclusive of clerk hire."

Which motion was rejected.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON; and, by ayes 98, noes 48, it was agreed to.

The House then took a recess until 4 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

At 4 o'clock, Mr. BELL, the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, resumed the chair, and called the committee to order.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the question before the committee was now on the motion of Mr. HOWE to strike out the entire proviso.

Mr. FILLMORE asked if the amendments were not in lieu of the motion to strike out the proviso.

The CHAIR answered no; that the amendments had been made under the law of Parliament, which permitted a proposition to be amended so as to make it as perfect as possible before the question be put on striking it out altogether.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON took the floor and spoke upon the subject of reform generally, and as to his own course in particular, in relation to that subject, during the ten years he had served in Congress.

Mr. GRAVES, Mr. GENTRY, and Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS, made frequent explanations during Mr. JOHNSON'S speech.

Mr. J. had not concluded at 5 o'clock, when, under the order of this morning, the debate was arrested, and the committee commenced to vote.

The question was then put on striking out the entire proviso, as amended on the motions of Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi and Mr. CAVE JOHNSON. The House was counted by tellers, and there appeared for striking out 57, against it 113.

And so the proviso, as amended, stands.

Numerous other amendments were offered to the bill, some of which elicited interesting explanations. A full report is in course of preparation.

At half past nine o'clock, on motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the bill, as amended, was reported to the House.

Whereon,

Mr. WISE moved the previous question on the bill and amendments.

But, pending that motion,

The House adjourned.

After some remarks by Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. CLAY, the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—ayes 28, noes 13.

The Senate then went into Executive session, And afterwards adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, February 24, 1841.

Mr. ANDREWS asked the unanimous consent of the House to present a resolution from the Committee of Accounts, directing the payment of the per diem to such members as were prevented from reaching Washington at the commencement of the present session, in consequence of the storm which prevailed about that time.

Objection being made,

Mr. ANDREWS moved a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER stated that the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky could not be then entertained, inasmuch as the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] made last evening for the previous question on the amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole to the

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL,
Was then pending.

The question was then taken on seconding the motion of Mr. WISE, and resulted: Ayes 75—noes 21.

But no quorum voting.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved a call of the House, and thereupon called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted: Yeas 106—nays 42.
So a call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk was proceeding in the call, when Mr. MORGAN moved that all further proceedings therein be dispensed with; and on that motion, Mr. ANDERSON called for the yeas and nays; but

Mr. MORGAN having withdrawn his motion, The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The Clerk resumed the call.

Mr. EVANS moved that all further proceedings therein be dispensed with; on which motion,

Mr. ANDREWS called for the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The call having been concluded, the names of the absentees were then called; and it appeared that 189 members answered to their names.

The names of the absentees were about being again called, when,

On motion of Mr. CLIFFORD, all further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

The motion for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question now recurring on agreeing to the amendments to the general appropriation bill, adopted in the Committee of the Whole.

Several of the amendments were then agreed to seriatim.

The question was then taken on the amendment appropriating $30,000 for the repair of the Potomac Bridge, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 115, nays 75.

On the proviso relating to the reduction of the fees and emoluments of United States District Attorneys, Marshalls, etc. as amended by Messrs. JACOB THOMPSON and CAVE JOHNSON,

Mr. GRANGER called for a division of the question.

And the SPEAKER decided that it was divisible.

Mr. WISE appealed from the decision; but on the question being taken, the decision of the SPEAKER was affirmed.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the first branch, being the amendment of Mr. JACOB THOMPSON, of Mississippi:

"That hereafter, in lieu of all fees, emoluments, and receipts, now allowed, it shall and may be lawful for the United States clerks, attorneys, counsel, and marshalls, in the district and circuit courts of the United States in the several States, to demand and receive the same fees that now are, or hereafter may be, allowed by the laws of the said States respectively where said courts are held, to the clerks, attorneys, and counsel, and sheriffs, in the highest courts of the said States in which like services are rendered; and no other fees or emoluments, except that the marshalls shall receive in full, for summoning all the jurors for any one court, thirty dollars; and shall receive, for every day's actual attendance at any court, five dollars per day; and for any services, including the discharge of their official duty, for which no compensation is provided by the laws of said States, respectively, the said officers may receive such fees as are now allowed by law according to the existing usage and practice of said courts of the United States; and every district attorney, except the district attorney of the southern district of New York, shall receive, in addition to the above fees, a salary of two hundred dollars per annum."

The question was about being taken, when

Mr. MEDILL called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered. But

Before the question was taken, it being now half past two o'clock,

The House took a recess until four o'clock.

[EVENING SESSION.]

After the recess,

The SPEAKER resumed the chair, and there being but few members present,

Mr. ANDREWS moved a call of the House.

The SPEAKER said that as the previous question was pending on the amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, a motion for a call of the House was not in order.

Mr. ANDREWS. Well, then, I move to adjourn.

On that motion, Mr. BANKS demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and resulted, yeas 4, nays 103.

So the House refused to adjourn; but no quorum voted.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. What are we to do then? We have no quorum; the House refuses to adjourn, and a call of the House is not in order.

Several other members having now arrived, the SPEAKER decided that a quorum was present.

The question pending being on the following amendment:

"For annual repair of the President's House, gardener's salary, horse and cart, laborers and tools, and for amount due F. Masi and Company for repairs on furniture, $2,628;" it was agreed to—yeas 112, nays 49.

After the adoption of several other amendments, without a division,

The amendment appropriating $3 000 for completing the court-house at Alexandria, was concurred in as follows: yeas 105, nays 7.

The next amendment was then read as follows:

"For payment to the stonecutters and the other workmen on the new Treasury building, of the sums allowed them by the commissioners appointed by the President of the United States to superintend the prosecution of the work, etc. in fulfillment of the resolution of Congress of 20th July, 1840, $12,923;" and it was agreed to—yeas 109, nays 60.

The question then recurring on agreeing with the Committee of the Whole in their amendment striking out the appropriation for "a Minister to Mexico, and inserting an appropriation for a Charge only;"

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON wished to know whether the Committee on Foreign Affairs had seconded this amendment, striking off the Minister to Mexico.

Great confusion here arose, owing to many members attempting to speaking at once.

Mr. MONROE, in a very loud tone, propounded a question to the SPEAKER as to the effect of a rejection of the amendment.

The noise prevailing was so great that the response of the SPEAKER was not heard.

But several members now calling on Mr. MONROE to sit down, and not ask such simple questions,

Mr. MONROE insisted on his right to ask any question he might think proper, before he was called upon to vote.

Mr. WISE. Well, then, will the SPEAKER please to tell me how to spell apple pie?

After some remarks from Mr. STANLY, in which he asked to be excused from voting,

Mr. GRAVES took the floor, and was proceeding with some remarks, when

Mr. WISE said he insisted on having order, and requested the gentleman to take his seat.

Mr. GRAVES said, well, then, let him state his point of order for the decision of the CHAIR, but I will not take my seat at his [Mr. Wise's] command.

Mr. WISE. Well, I submit my point of order, which is, whether a gentleman has a right, for the purpose of evading the previous question, to—

Loud cries of "order," "sit down," etc. arose from various parts of the hall.

Mr. WISE. It's of no use; gentlemen may call "order" as much as they please; I cannot be put down on my own point of order.

Mr. GRAVES. What is the point of order?

Mr. WISE. Hear it, and do not call upon me to sit down before you know what it is. The point of order is, whether a gentleman can, to evade the previous question, ask to be excused from voting, and then give his reasons?

The SPEAKER said it was obvious that such a course was not in order.

Mr. GRAVES desired to know if, under the consideration of a bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for 1841, the gentleman from Virginia was in order in asking the SPEAKER "to please to tell him how to spell apple pie?"

After some further discussion of a conversational character, the question was taken on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, and decided in the negative, as follows:

Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Swearingen, Sweney, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpool, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Weller, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, and Wise—86.

Campbell, Carroll, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Cranston, Cushing, Edward Davies, Garrett Davis, Dawson-Dennis, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Garland, Gentry, Giddings, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, William S. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Winthrop—101.

So the House refused to strike out the appropriation for a Minister to Mexico.

The question was then taken on the following amendment of Mr. UNDERWOOD:

After the word dollars in the 535th line, page 23, insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, that in addition to returns now required to be rendered by postmasters, it shall be the duty of the postmasters at New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New Orleans, and the other several cities of the Union, each and every year hereafter, to render a quarterly yearly account to the Postmaster General, under oath, in such form as the latter shall prescribe for the purpose of giving full effect to this proviso, of all emoluments or sums, by them respectively received for boxes or pigeon holes, or other receptacles for letters or papers, and by them charged for to individuals; or for the delivery of letters or papers at or from any place in either of the said cities, other than the actual post office of such city, and of all emoluments, receipts, and profits, that have come to their hands by reason of keeping branch offices in either of said cities; and if from such accounting it shall appear that the nett amount received by either of the postmasters at either of such cities for such boxes and pigeon holes, and other receptacles for letters and papers, and for delivering letters or papers at or from any place, in either of said cities, other than said post office, and by reason of keeping a branch post office in either of said cities, shall, in the aggregate, exceed the sum of three thousand dollars in any one year, such excess shall be paid to the Postmaster General for the use and purposes of the Post Office Department; and no postmaster shall hereafter, under any pretence whatever, have or receive, or retain for himself, in the aggregate, more than five thousand dollars per year, including salaries or commissions now allowed and limited by law.

The amendment was agreed to, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Banks, Baker, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boardman, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Williams, Winthrop, and Wise—152.

YAYS—Messrs. Barnard, John Campbell, Chinn, Chittenden, Edward Davies, Evans, M. Mallory, Marvin, Pallen, Sergeant, Toland, and Christopher H. Williams—12.

The amendment of Mr. JACOB THOMPSON, appropriating $10,000 for continuing a survey of the Gulf of Mexico, was also agreed to—yeas 97, nays 84.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to a third reading, and, being read a third time by its title, was passed.

The House then adjourned.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, when his name was called on an amendment to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, appropriating $6,000 for furnishing the President's House, arose and said: On yesterday, when the amendment was proposed in Committee of the Whole, he was unavoidably absent, and he asked the CHAIR for information whether the amendment was reported by a responsible committee having that matter in charge, or whether it was proposed on the responsibility of a single member? He said he desired this information, for upon it depended the vote he felt bound to give. The SPEAKER said it was not in order to give any explanation, but many voices cried out that the amendment was proposed by a single member. If so, Mr. S. said he did not deem it required, and should vote against it.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 25, 1841.

The bill from the House, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1841, was taken up, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which a memorial on the subject was referred, reported a bill to grant the right of pre-emption to settlers upon the Dabueque claim, in the Territory of Iowa, which was read, and ordered to a second reading; and on motion by Mr. W. and by unanimous consent, it was considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a memorial of citizens of Maine, praying that measures may be taken for a Congress of Nations; which was laid on the table.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill to revive and continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia; The bill for the relief of Isabella Hill, widow, and John Hill, Elizabeth Hill, and Samuel Hill, children and minor heirs at law of Samuel Hill, deceased;

The bill for the relief of Sarah M. Charlton, a Cherokee Indian, and others;

The bill for the relief of Garry Hinant;

The bill for the relief of Jacques Bon and Alexander Coleman;

The bill for the relief of John McClanahan; and

The bill granting a pension to Margaret Jamison; were severally read a third time, and passed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The following bills were taken up as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Mary Neal, widow of Samuel Neal, deceased.

The bill for the relief of Huldah Tucker.

The bill granting pension to William Rand.

The bill for the relief of Converse and Rees.

The bill for the relief of Samuel Norris and Frederick Saugrain of Arkansas.

The bill for the relief of Jesse Carpenter.

The bill to cause monuments to be erected in honor of Brigadier General Francis Nash and Brigadier General William Davidson, being taken up,

Mr. GRAHAM advocated its passage at some length.

Mr. KING regretted that, from a sense of duty, he was compelled to oppose this bill. Resolutions to erect monuments to the memory of the brave officers who fell in our Revolutionary contest, were numerous in the journals of the Congress of the Confederation. They were deemed appropriate tributes of respect for the distinguished services of the deceased; but up to this day not a single monument has been erected—not even to Washington. No one felt more deeply the obligations we were under to the illustrious men of our Revolution. To them we owe every thing; to their exertions are we indebted even for the right to our seats in this hall. But he hoped, when we entered into this subject, it would not be in isolated cases, but to consider it generally—to take up the numerous resolutions that have been passed in cases similar to those of Generals Nash and Davidson, who he knew were brave and worthy officers, but not more brave and worthy than many others who fought and fell in the Revolution. As there was not time at this advanced period of the session to do justice to this subject, he would move to lay the bill on the table.

After a few remarks from Mr. GRAHAM, the bill was laid on the table.

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, the bill for the relief of Joseph M. Hernandez was taken up, read a third time, and passed.

The bill to revive and continue in force, for a limited time, an act approved on the third day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, entitled "An act for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to reservations of land, under the fourteenth article of the treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty, with the Choctaw Indians;" and, also, an act approved on the twenty-second day of February, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'an act for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to reservations of land, under the fourteenth article of treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty, with the Choctaw Indians,'" was taken up and debated at much length by Messrs. SEVIER, HENDERSON, LINN, and WALKER; and after being amended, on motion by Mr. SEVIER, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate went into Executive session.

And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, February 25, 1841.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama asked that, by general consent, the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to consider Senate bill No. 12, "to establish a land office in the State of Alabama, for the lands acquired by the late treaty with the Cherokees."

Mr. C. said, that as he should be obliged to move a suspension of the rules to take up this bill, if any objection should be made, he would ask the indulgence of the House to state that this territory, for the sale of which this bill was intended to provide, had been acquired more than five years ago. The Legislature of Alabama had, at every session since, memorialized Congress to establish a land district for the sale of the lands, and a bill had passed the Senate, and one had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands in this House, at each session of Congress since; but (said Mr. C.) owing to the state of the public business, he had failed in every effort to have the subject acted on, and the bill had regularly failed for want of time only. He had made frequent motions to take up this measure, so important to his constituents, and, indeed, to the country, and had watched, week after week, to get the floor at this session, and this was the first time he had succeeded.

Mr. C. said that the settlers on the public lands in the Cherokee country were anxious to have an opportunity to enter their lands, which they could not do, unless a new land office was established, or the territory annexed to other districts. He believed there were some two millions of acres of public land in the territory, one half of which, he presumed, would sell, and a considerable portion of it at an early day; so that he could inform gentlemen who were apprehensive that the accruing revenues of the country would fall short of the current expenses of the year, that he believed the passage of this bill would bring into the Treasury nearly a million of dollars. Mr. C. said that as he troubled the House but seldom, he hoped no objection would be made to his motion.

But objection being made,

Mr. CHAPMAN moved a suspension of the rules; whereupon,

Mr. GRAVES called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. CRABB said he hoped he should be permitted (although no debate was allowable) to make a suggestion to his colleague [Mr. CHAPMAN] who had made the motion to suspend the rules. It was this: that he would amend his motion so as to go into Committee of the Whole upon another bill on the same subject of the Cherokee lands, at the same time with the bill to create a new land district. It was a bill which had passed the Senate since the one on which the gentleman proposed to act, and provided for an attachment of the Cherokee territory to two existing land districts, instead of creating a new land district. It had passed the Senate, in accordance with instructions from the Legislature of Alabama, and he desired the Committee of the Whole to have before it, at the same time, both bills, so as to determine between them.

To this suggestion, Mr. CHAPMAN acceded. Mr. C. further modified his motion, at the request of Mr. CHINN, so as to take up, at the same time, the bill to establish a new land district in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. CHAPMAN said that, as he could assure the House he would consume as little time as possible, not intending to enter into any debate, he would, in order that his motion might prevail, ask for a suspension of the rules for one hour only.

The question was then taken, and resulted—yeas 64, nays 89.

So the rules were not suspended.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, (Mr. McKAY in the chair,) and took up the bill making appropriations for the

NAVAL SERVICE FOR THE YEAR 1841.

The bill having been read,

Mr. SALTONSTALL moved to amend the following section, viz: "for increase, repairs, armament, and equipment of the navy, and wear and tear of vessels in commission, $1,425,000," by striking out that amount, and inserting in lieu thereof $2,000,000.

A discussion on the amendment arose, in which Messrs. SALTONSTALL, JONES of Virginia, EVANS, TILLINGHAST, REED, and PROFIT, participated.

When, the hour of two and a half o'clock having arrived,

The House took its usual recess.

[EVENING SESSION.]

After the recess,

The consideration of the

was resumed, in Committee of the Whole, the question pending being on the amendment moved by Mr. SALTONSTALL, to amend the following section, viz: "for increase, repairs, armament, and equipment of the navy, and wear and tear of vessels in commission, $1 425 000," by striking out that amount, and inserting in lieu thereof $2,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana being entitled to the floor, addressed the committee, at some length, against the amendment. His remarks will be given hereafter.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. MASON, COOPER of Georgia, and WISE, when Mr. MALLORY moved further to amend, as follows:

"$500,000 of which sum shall be expended in building and equipping war steamers of medium size."

After some remarks from Messrs. HOFFMAN, WISE, CUSHING, VANDERPOEL, and ALBERT SMITH,

On motion of the latter, the committee rose.

And, at a few minutes before eight o'clock,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, February 26, 1841.

DEATH OF THE HON. P. P. BARBOUR.

Mr. ROANE submitted the following letter, which was read:

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26, 1841.

SIR: As one of the Senators of the State of Virginia, of which our lamented brother, Judge BARBOUR, was so distinguished a citizen, I enclose you a copy of the funeral ceremonies which have been determined upon.

I am, sir, with great respect,

Your obedient servant,

R. B. TANEY.

Hon. WM. H. ROANE,

Senate Chamber.

Order of the funeral ceremonies attending the removal of the remains of the Hon. P. P. BARBOUR, late Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Judges of the Supreme Court, with its officers, and the Judges of the Courts of the District, with the members of the bar, will assemble at 2 o'clock to-day at Mrs. TURNER'S, (Pennsylvania avenue,) and thence attend the remains of the deceased to the room of the Supreme Court, where the usual services will be performed by the Chaplains of Congress; and where

THE PRESIDENT,

The Heads of the Departments,

The Senators and Representatives in Congress,

The Members of the foreign Legations,

And citizens and strangers, are requested to attend; after which, the procession will move in the above order to the steamboat wharf, where the remains of the deceased will be embarked with proper attendants, in order to be conveyed to his country seat in Orange county, Virginia, for interment.

The documents having been read,

Mr. ROANE addressed the Senate in the following words:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I ask a moment of the precious time of the Senate: I will not abuse it—for already had the mournful intelligence, now officially announced to us, reached every member of this body; and already had the heart of every individual in this community been touched by that pure and exalted feeling which is ever awakened, when the patriot hears that his country has suddenly lost, and that forever, one of its benefactors.

Mr. President, had I the talent and the material, which I have not, to offer a just tribute to the memory of the distinguished Judge, whose funeral we are now invited to attend, I should deem it inappropriate to do so on the present occasion. That task I shall leave in other and abler hands.

But knowing, as I do, the exemplary virtues of the deceased, in all the social and domestic relations of life; knowing, as I do, the exalted estimation in which his virtues, talents, and patriotism were held in his native State, which I have the honor in part to represent; and knowing, as does every member of this body, his long, faithful, and valuable public services within the walls of this building, I feel myself authorized to ask the Senate to adopt the resolution I now offer:

Resolved unanimously, That in testimony of their respect for the memory of the honorable PHILIP P. BARBOUR, late Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Senate will adjourn this day at two o'clock, for the purpose of attending the funeral of the deceased.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. KKIGHT presented the memorial of Amey Babbitt; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill to remodel the judicial circuits of the United States.

Mr. WHITE, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Wm. R. Davis; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which a memorial of citizens of Illinois upon the subject had been referred, reported a bill concerning an act granting lands to certain exiles from Poland; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, the bill for the relief of Charles F. Sibbald was considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for creating a new land district in the State of Missouri, and for changing the boundaries of the southwestern and western land districts in said State; and

The bill for the relief of Jesse Carpenter, were considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of the Eagle Railroad and Lumber Company was taken up.

Mr. BENTON thought, at this advanced period of the session, we had not time to investigate the affairs of railroad companies. He hoped, therefore, that all bills in relation to them would be passed over.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama assented, on the understanding that the rule should apply generally.

The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was then taken up.

Mr. KING hoped the bill would be also passed over.

Mr. YOUNG said he had no expectation of being able to pass this bill the present session; but he gave notice that it was by no means the intention of the friends of this work to abandon it. He alluded to the sales of the implements engaged in the improvements on the lakes and Western waters, as evidence of an intention to refuse appropriations to the West for the purposes of internal improvement, while large sums were appropriated to works on the seaboard. If they had the constitutional right under the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, to vote money for the improvement of harbors on the seacoast; under the power to regulate commerce between the States, they had the right to make appropriations for the improvement of the channels of the commerce of the West. He called on the representatives of the West to rally in defence of their interests, and to see that appropriations for improvements in the North and the South, the East and the West, went hand in hand.

Mr. KING said the Senator from Illinois had taken occasion to speak of improvements and harbors, and had made the extraordinary assertion that the West was neglected and abandoned. Why, four-fifths of the expenditures for harbors and improvements had been made for the West.

Mr. YOUNG. Not of late.

Mr. KING. Why, of late, none had been made, and for the reason that they had not the money to make any. But the Senator called upon the West to rally in defence of itself: why, the West had been their favorite child. He (Mr. KING) was a Southwestern man, and he had hitherto shown that he was in favor of giving every facility to the West that could properly be given to her. Look at her harbors, and they would find some of them made where nature never intended they should be; in this they had gone beyond the bounds of prudence, and it was from an anxiety to foster the West. They had aided in speculations of companies, and then to give value to their lands they had given them harbors. With regard to these roads, he hoped the Senator from Illinois would bring the subject forward, and if those who are coming into power are willing to take up these internal improvements, let them do so; he (Mr. KING) had felt it to be his duty to oppose every appropriation of the kind on constitutional grounds, and he should continue to do so. And he protested against any attempt to produce sectional prejudices. He asked the honorable Senator where were the expenditures for the South and the Southwest? Where were the expenditures for the East? Had New Hampshire got them?

Mr. HUBBARD. Not a dollar.

Mr. KING would not further detain the Senate.

Mr. YOUNG said, in reference to the condition of the Treasury, that with the resources of this great country, it weighed with him as nothing. Former appropriations were made when they were ten times more in debt than they are at present; and yet they had found means to pay the national debt. The public debt ought not to operate as an objection, nor ought the works already commenced on that account to be allowed to fall into dilapidation. But he had risen to say that he had no sectional prejudice: he was willing to promote the interests of the West and the South, the East and the North; but he wished them to go hand in hand. Let them all go together. However, under existing circumstances, he was willing that the bill should be passed over.

The bill was accordingly passed over.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were read a third time and passed:

The bill for the relief of Mary Neal, widow of Samuel Neal, deceased;

The bill for the relief of Huldah Tucker;

The bill granting a pension to William Rand;

The bill for the relief of Converse and Rees;

The bill for the relief of Samuel Norris, and Frederick Saugrain of Arkansas; and

The bill for the relief of Charles F. Sibbald.

GENERAL BANKRUPT BILL.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order—the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy—the question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HUBBARD, to include incorporated companies within its provisions.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama spoke at length in opposition to the amendment, and in reply to the remarks of Mr. BENTON.

The Senate then adjourned to carry into effect the resolution to attend the funeral of the Hon. PHILIP P. BARBOUR.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, February 26, 1841.

On motion of Mr. ANDREWS, the rules were suspended, to enable him to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be instructed to allow the pay of all such members of this House as may have been unavoidably detained on their way to the seat of Government at the commencement of this session, by the storm which occurred about that time; they having left their respective places of abode in sufficient time to have reached the Capitol in time to have taken their seats on the first day of the session.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said, that there was a rule of the House which prevented those whom this resolution was designed to benefit from voting for the resolution. He referred to the 25th rule, which provided, that "no member shall vote on any question in the event of which he is immediately interested," etc.

The SPEAKER stated that, in his opinion, the rule did not apply to the case now before the House.

The question being on the passage of the resolution,

Mr. DROMGOOLE called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The CLERK was proceeding in the call, when

Mr. CRABB asked to be excused from voting.

The SPEAKER said, that the gentleman should have asked leave before the call was commenced.

Mr. CRABB replied that he did arise for that purpose.

Mr. BRIGGS asked Mr. CRABB his reasons for making that request.

Mr. CRABB remarked that he was one of those who left their homes in time to arrive here before the commencement of the session, but he had been detained on the way by the storm. He believed that the rule of the House, referred to by the gentleman from Virginia, excluded him from voting, although the SPEAKER had decided otherwise.

The question was then taken on excusing Mr. CRABB from voting, and decided in the negative—ayes 51, noes 94.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 48.

DEATH OF JUDGE BARBOUR.

Mr. BANKS laid the following letter before the House:

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26, 1841.

SIR: As the Representative of the district in which our lamented brother, Judge BARBOUR, resided, I enclose you a copy of the funeral ceremonies which have been determined upon.

I am, sir, with great respect,

Your obedient servant,

R. B. TANEY.

HON. LINN BANKS,

House of Representatives.

Order of the funeral ceremonies attending the removal of the remains of the Hon. P. P. BARBOUR, late Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States:

The Judges of the Supreme Court, with its officers, and the Judges of the Courts of the District, with the members of the bar, will assemble at two o'clock to-day, at Mrs. Turner's (Pennsylvania avenue,) and thence attend the remains of the deceased, to the room of the Supreme Court, where the usual services will be performed by the Chaplains of Congress; and where the President, the Heads of the Departments, the Senators and Representatives in Congress, the members of the Foreign Legations, and citizens and strangers, are requested to attend. After which the procession will move, in the above order, to the steamboat wharf, where the remains of the deceased will be embarked, with proper attendants, in order to be conveyed to his country seat, in Orange county, Virginia, for interment.

Mr. BANKS arose and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not rise for the purpose of interrupting the business of the House, but to announce the death of the Hon. PHILIP P. BARBOUR, late a Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States. In the performance of this painful duty, (said Mr. B.) no language which I possess is adequate to portray the virtues, talents, and the distinguished public services of the individual whose loss we are now called upon to deplore. In all his relations, whether in public or in private, he stood pre-eminent for his high honor, and his incorruptible integrity. Whether in the halls of legislation, or engaged in expounding the laws of his own State, or of the Union, he was always prompt, impartial, and able. In 1812, when war was declared against Great Britain—the second Declaration of Independence—when the political horizon was darkened o'er with portentous clouds—Judge BARBOUR was elected a member of the Legislature of Virginia from his native county of Orange. He served his constituents at this important crisis of our history with distinguished ability in sustaining the interest, the honor, and the glory of his country. In the month of May, 1814, he was elected a member of the House of Representatives of the United States, and served from that time, without intermission, and with the entire approbation of his constituents, until 1825. During that eventful period, he was the Speaker of this House from December, 1821, to March, 1823. In 1825 he was elected by the Legislature of Virginia, a Judge of the General Court of that State; the duties of which station he discharged with great ability and to the satisfaction of all parties interested.

In 1827, Judge BARBOUR was called upon by some of his old friends in the Congressional District in which he resided, to become a candidate for Congress. He promptly obeyed the call, and forthwith resigned his judicial station, and was again elected to Congress without opposition. He served until the end of the first session of the 21st Congress, in 1830, when he was appointed a judge of the federal court for the Eastern district of Virginia. He continued to discharge the duties of that office until 1836; at which time he received the appointment of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Judge BARBOUR was a member of the Convention which assembled in Virginia in 1829, to amend the Constitution of that State, and was president of the Convention, which contained some of the most distinguished men of Virginia, among whom were Judge MARSHALL, JAMES MADISON, JAMES MONROE, WM. B. GILES, LITTLETON W. TAZEWELL, and others of distinguished abilities.

I have attempted, Mr. Speaker, to give a brief epitome of the public stations voluntarily bestowed upon PHILIP P. BARBOUR by his countrymen. I say voluntarily, because he was one of those high-minded and honorable men who never sought office. His high and commanding talents and virtues made him one of Virginia's most distinguished sons. In the discharge of all the high duties devolved upon him, his course was marked with great ability; and, above all, his motives of action were never suspected. He was connected with a numerous train of friends and relatives, and beloved by all. If he had an enemy on earth, he did not know it. No man stood higher than Judge BARBOUR for his purity of character, and his high and ennobling virtues. No language can describe them. He was a kind, tender, and affectionate husband, father, and friend, and a humane master.

I can only say, in conclusion, that his sudden death admonishes us all of the sacred volume, which declares that "in the midst of life we are in death."

I move you, Mr. SPEAKER, that the House adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House have learned with deep sensibility the decease of the Hon. PHILIP P. BARBOUR, for many years a member, and late Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and at the time of his death an associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, which melancholy event took place suddenly in the city of Washington on the 24th of February, instant; and that, as a mark of the respect entertained for the memory of the deceased, this House will adjourn at two o'clock this day, for the purpose of attending the funeral of the deceased, and will at four o'clock of the same day re-assemble in the hall of the House for the despatch of the public business.

Mr. WISE, after cordially uniting in the sentiments just uttered, expressed his regret that Mr. BANKS had not consulted with his colleagues before he offered his resolution. With all due respect, Mr. WISE said he could not vote for it, for the reason that a mightier man than Judge BARBOUR had fallen, and whose death was not even announced to the House. He meant the illustrious father of the judiciary, JOHN MARSHALL. He would ask his colleague to withdraw the resolution, and not compel him to vote against it.

Mr. BANKS said it so happened that, at the time Judge MARSHALL died, Congress was not in session, nor was the Supreme Court in session; besides, the event took place in another city. The Supreme Court was now in session, and the Senate had adopted a similar resolution unanimously. Mr. B. paid a high compliment to the talents and virtues of Chief Justice MARSHALL, and said there was no man to whose memory he would more cheerfully pay a tribute of respect. Mr. B. remarked that when the death of the Hon. WM. WIRT was announced to this body, although he was at that time a private citizen, the House, on motion of the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] adjourned. Mr. B. stated that he had consulted with several of his colleagues, but having just received the communication from the Chief Justice, it had not been in his power to consult with Mr. WISE. He hoped this explanation would be satisfactory.

The resolution was then adopted.

DEFECTIVE LAND PATENTS.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, by general consent the House took up the following bill, introduced by him on the 17th instant, viz:

A BILL to confirm land patents.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all patents for public lands, which have been issued from the General Land Office since the passing of the act, entitled "An act for the establishment of a General Land Office in the department of the Treasury," passed on the 25th day of April, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, in the name of the President of the United States, instead of being "in the name of the United States," as prescribed in the eighth section of said act; and all patents for public lands, which have been issued from the said General Land Office since the passing of the act entitled "An act to reorganize the General Land Office," passed the fourth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, and which have been countersigned by the Recorder of the General Land Office, or other person acting in his stead, instead of being countersigned by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as prescribed in the act of the twenty-fifth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and twelve; and all patents which have been issued from said General Land Office since the passing of the act entitled "An act prescribing the mode by which patents for public lands shall be signed and executed," passed the second day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, and which have been subscribed by a secretary duly appointed, pursuant to the provisions of said act, with the printed or written name of the President prefixed to the personal signature of such secretary, in the execution of such patents, notwithstanding the name of the President may not have been written personally by the secretary, shall be deemed, taken, and held good and valid patents in law, and shall have all the force and effect to pass from the United States to the patentee or patentees named in such patents, respectively, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, the lands described therein, as though, in each and all the respects before enumerated, the patents, in their form and manner of execution, had conformed to the requirements of law.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passing of this act, it shall be the duty of the Recorder of the General Land Office, in addition to the duties now required of him by law, to countersign all patents issued from said office, instead of the same being countersigned by the Commissioner, as required by the eighth section of the act entitled "An act for the establishment of a General Land Office in the Department of the Treasury," passed the twenty-fifth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and twelve.

The bill was then engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. McKAY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the

NAVAL SERVICE FOR THE YEAR 1841.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. SALTONSTALL, to strike out $1,425,000 "for increase, repair, armament, and equipment of the navy, and wear and tear of vessels in commission," and insert $2,000,000; and the amendment to the amendment, submitted by Mr. MALLORY, as follows: "$500,000 of which sum shall be expended in building and equipping war steamers of medium size."

Mr. MARVIN, being entitled to the floor, spoke at some length in favor of the amendments pending.

Mr. SALTONSTALL followed, and replied to the objections which had been urged against his amendment. He said if the gentleman [Mr. MALLORY] who had moved the additional amendment on last evening, would alter it so as to insert $400,000, instead of $500,000, he (Mr. S.) would accept it as a modification of his own.

Mr. MALLORY acceding to the request, his amendment was accepted by Mr. SALTONSTALL as a modification.

The hour of two having arrived, the House, in pursuance of the resolution of Mr. BANKS, adjourned until 4 o'clock.

[EVENING SESSION.]

At four o'clock, p. m. the House met.

After some debate of a conversational character to the propriety of ordering a call of the House,

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, (Mr. McKAY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question pending was on the modified amendment of Mr. SALTONSTALL, to strike out "$1,425,000 for increase, repair, armament, and equipment of the navy, and wear and tear of vessels in commission," and insert "$2,400,000, of which sum $400,000 shall be expended in building and equipping war steamers of medium size."

Mr. WELLER being entitled to the floor, made some remarks expressive of his regret that members of both parties did, at this late period of the session, think proper to spin out the debates of a party character to such a length. He alluded more especially to the prevalence of that evil after gentlemen had been to dinner, and mentioned some instances, when, on the previous evening, the House had heard a display of eloquence which could not have been displayed before dinner.

Mr. W. then proceeded to reply to the speech of his colleague [Mr. Mason] on yesterday. That gentleman, said Mr. W. told us there was no money in the Treasury, and then, in the same breath, said he was willing to vote large sums for the navy.

Mr. W. went on to shew, in a very forcible manner, that the charges of his colleague and other members in relation to a neglect of the navy, were without foundation. He showed that the navy had been materially increased since 1829, and that since that period the active force of our navy had been doubled. After some further remarks, which will appear hereafter, Mr. W. said that having given facts to show that the charges of gentlemen were erroneous, he would make an appeal to all parties to allow the question to be taken at once.

Mr. FLOYD said he wished to state very briefly his objections to this proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SALTONSTALL] to increase the appropriations for the naval service, half a million of dollars beyond the amount deemed sufficient by the Secretary of the Navy, and which had been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. He regretted that the propriety or impropriety of this amendment could not have been discussed upon its merits without the disparaging remarks upon the present condition of the navy, in which some gentleman had indulged, and which they had appeared to consider necessary in urging this amendment upon the committee. He would not proclaim his attachment to this proud arm of our national defence, nor would he build a man of straw, to show his prowess in demolishing him, by supposing that there was a man upon this floor opposed to the navy. Upon other subjects we may have sectional feelings of interest or may be influenced by State pride—one may boast of his Bunker hill—another of the plains of Saratoga—another of Yorktown—but all, all, glory in the achievements of our navy, and all here, he had no doubt, were ready and willing to make such liberal appropriations as would sustain its honor and its efficiency.

But he would bring to this and every other subject under the control of Congress the same wise and prudent principles which are applicable to the ordinary affairs of life—and those principles required that in making this appropriation, regard should be had to other and equally urgent claims upon the public Treasury, and to the probable amount of revenue for the coming year. Mr. F. asked if those who urged this increase of half a million, were aware that the bill already appropriated five millions and a quarter for the naval service? And was this a niggardly appropriation? Was it not liberal, considering that it amounted to one quarter of the whole estimated revenue for the current year, and considering, too, the other duties which this Government is bound to discharge? This amount is deemed sufficient by the officers of the Government, who have the best means of forming an opinion upon this subject, and Mr. F. believed that with economy and good discretion in its disbursement, it would be found ample to sustain the Naval Department in all its necessary operations, and give a respectable increase to our naval force.

Sir, said Mr. F. notwithstanding the reflections which have been cast upon our navy, I insist that it has performed every duty which has been required of it, and has answered every beneficial object of its establishment. Our commerce has been protected on every sea. In the single instance of insult to our seamen which has occurred in many years, and that by a barbarous people, chastisement was promptly and effectually administered, and redress demanded and obtained; and at this moment the lightest shallop that dare venture her frail sides upon the mountain wave may fold her wings in safety in every port of the civilized world under the simple protection of the stars and stripes.

I deny, said Mr. F. that our flag has been insulted again and again for want of an efficient maritime force, as has been alleged by the honorable member from Maine [Mr. SMITH]. We have heard rumors, it is true, recently, of detention of several vessels by British cruisers on the coast of Africa, but we have heard but one side of the story. These matters are proper subjects of inquiry by our Government; and if these detentions were without excuse, they are proper subjects for a demand for redress. But there may be palliating circumstances. These vessels may have been found under suspicious circumstances, though, in fact, driving a legal traffic. It should be remembered that the detentions complained of were made upon the African coast by the vessels of England stationed there for the suppression of the slave trade—a most honorable undertaking, in which I hope she may be eminently successful. She has reaped profit enough from her unjust aggressions in other parts of the world to enable her to be humane where she can gather nothing by conquest. Africa offers nothing to her rapacity but flesh and blood, of which she has already more than she can well take care of; and, therefore, affords a proper field for the exhibition of a national virtue, because there is no temptation to be unjust.

Complaint has also been made that, during the recent difficulties between Great Britain and China, our nation was not properly represented, nor our commerce protected in the Chinese seas by our vessels of war. Why, sir, do not gentlemen know that representations were made here by those interested in the Chinese trade, that it was inexpedient to send a fleet there; that American interests there were in no danger; that our merchantmen were profiting by the troubles between England and China; and that an armed force there might do more harm than good, by exciting the jealousy or suspicions of that peculiar people? Sir, said Mr. F. gentlemen are mistaken. Our flag is known, and is respected wherever a vessel can float in the known world, and it is related of the late Sultan that before he knew any thing else of America, he acknowledged he had "heard of a fellow with a blue jacket who had flogged John Bull on the ocean."

Our present navy consists of sixty-eight sail, of which thirty-six are now in commission. Will any one say that this is not enough for a peace establishment? The Secretary of the Navy informs us that it has been found sufficient for all the purposes of a navy in time of peace; and the sum of six hundred thousand dollars of the naval appropriation of last year remains unexpended because it was considered unnecessary.

Gentlemen have compared our navy with that of Great Britain. Sir, it is not to be expected, nor is it desirable, that our navy should equal that of Great Britain. We have no colonies to keep in awe—we have no negotiations which it is necessary to conduct under the influence of a large fleet—we have no entangling alliances to guard, nor are we surrounded by ambitious States, ever ready to take advantage of any moment of apparent weakness. The material of which our naval force must be composed, is now employed in more profitable avocations than the public service. Our navy must grow with a necessity for a navy. Napoleon's wars made Napoleon's marshals; and when the naval service offers the proper inducements, in the shape of pay or of honor, a force can be gathered from your coasters, your fishing vessels, and your merchantmen, such as the world has never yet seen for bravery, enterprise, and every quality which can ensure the honor and safety of our country. In a young and peaceful nation like ours, where every avenue of business is more inviting than the public service, it is not surprising that the naval spirit should fall somewhat to decay. What inducement has a man of ability and enterprise who can earn his bread in any other way, to embark for a three years' voyage in a man of war, to leave behind nearly all the attachments of life, to endure, as Dr. Johnson says, all the privations of a prison, with the additional risk of being drowned. But the naval spirit "is not dead, it sleepeth;" and the first gun which shall boom across the water, will awake it, refreshed and invigorated, "like a strong man to run a race."

Another reason has been urged, said Mr. F. why this amendment should pass, and that is the present state of our foreign relations and the possibility or probability of a war. He considered this entitled to less consideration than any other which had been mentioned. It was conceded that we were in no danger of collision with any power except England, and he would imagine no such extremity of folly in the year 1841, as it would be on the part of Great Britain to declare war against the United States. What is and has been the national policy of Great Britain? Why, sir, to talk of glory and to fight for gain—and surely there is nothing in this country which can excite her cupidity; which would pay the cost of taking. What must be the inevitable, to say nothing of the probable, consequences of such a war? Sir, put down the certain and immediate loss of her North American Colonies—the destruction of her manufactures, by cutting off the supply of the raw material which gives her operatives employment, the destruction of the best market for her manufactured articles; add to this, that she suspends, perhaps extinguishes, a debt due to her citizens, it is said, of some two hundred millions of dollars. Besides, sir, has she no unsettled questions with her European neighbors; or, if there are none, may they not be raised when her neighbors think a favorable opportunity occurs for a successful negotiation? Is not France almost “sick of a calm?” Is she not her “natural enemy?” and does she not now possess the abundant means, as she ever has had the inclination, for an encounter with England? Has not Russia, in her eastern progress, already reached the confines of the British possessions? But, aside from all these collateral considerations, what can England gain by a war with us? Nothing, sir, nothing. The utmost she can do is, the destruction, perhaps, at the onset, of some maritime towns, which would not weaken our ability by the strength of a single man, or the value of a single dollar; as to conquering a foot of American soil, no man in his senses ever thinks of it. Sir, said Mr. F. I have but glanced at a few of the considerations which, in my opinion, show that we are in no danger of a war with Europe; and all these things she knows, as well as we do; she knows our strength and our resources; she knows that a war begun is not to be ended in a day; she has had a “taste of our gifts” in the Revolution, and again in the last war; and within the last few years, she has seen a specimen of the stuff of which American militia are composed, which will not suffer by a comparison with Bunker Hill or the San Jacinto. I allude to that most unfortunate occurrence, the battle at Windmill Point.

Let me add, Mr. F. continued, that in my opinion there is not, and has not been, any cause for collision between the two countries. The correspondence between the two Governments on the questions at issue, which has been carried on both here and at London, is, in my opinion, in all respects creditable to the present Administration. And notwithstanding the odium which a reckless party has sought to heap upon the Executive for pusillanimity, for cowering before the British lion, I was pleased to hear my honorable colleague, [Mr. GRANGER,] but a day or two ago, express his approbation of the negotiations as conducted by this Government. On this subject all has been done which the honor of the country required; and I shall be content if the coming Administration do as well. Again, it is argued that the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, lately made to the House, is calculated to produce dissatisfaction on the part of the English Government. I have read that report, and I approve of it—it speaks out boldly in terms worthy of the nation, and will, I doubt not, find a hearty response in the bosom of every patriot in the country, and especially among those on the Northern frontier, who feel the deepest interest in the questions discussed in that report. The language of that report, said Mr. F. falls far behind, in spirit and force, the language of the public press on the frontier, where the public mind has been most excited on this subject. True it is, sir, that much of that excitement has been created by political demagogues for the basest party purposes, and when the debate took place here on the motion to print that report, and my honorable colleagues from Erie and Ontario objected to the violence of its language, it occurred to me that those whose friends had rode into power upon the whirlwind, already began to tremble, lest, now that they are about to assume the reins of Government, they should be unable to direct the storm.

I shall mention, continued Mr. F. but one other reason why I shall vote against this increase of the naval appropriation. I am not disposed to treat the recent election as if it had not taken place. The people were told that the expenses of the Government were too great; and if the gentlemen of the successful party have forgotten the pledges of retrenchment they made before the election, I have not; and I assure them that so far as my vote is concerned, both in this Congress and the next, “the economy they teach I will execute, and it shall go hard, but I will better the instruction.”

Mr. JONES of Virginia observed that after the able speech of the gentleman who had preceded him, it would be hardly necessary for him to say a word. He would, nevertheless, submit a few facts by way of correcting the erroneous impression which was likely to be made on the public mind, by the remarks of gentlemen who considered the navy had been neglected. After noticing the various and contradictory statements which had been given by members of the Opposition in relation to the condition of our navy, Mr. J. referred to authentic documents to show what was the actual condition of that branch of the public defence, and that it was not in the “ruinous and dilapidated” condition as was represented.

Mr. J. then read from official documents to show that we had now twenty-six vessels in commission, and that these twenty-six were so arranged as to afford an effectual protection to the commerce of the country.

After showing the great and gradual increase of the navy for the last fifteen years, Mr. J. said he referred to those facts to show that much had been done to strengthen this arm of our national defence, and that a larger amount of money had been appropriated than was thought necessary to be used.

He then called attention to the preparations made by the Navy Department so as to put it in the power of Government, in case of emergency, to bring into service almost any amount of vessels that might be required.

Gentlemen appeared to have lost sight of the fact that contracts had been entered into by the Department for frame-timbers of a great number of vessels, which frame-timbers were reasoning and being prepared in a proper shape, ready to be put together when required. From the document appended to the report, it would be seen that contracts had been made for frame-timbers for 15 ships of the line,

18 frigates,
15 sloops of war,
9 steamers,
9 brigs and schooners,

besides copper, iron, &c.

Here, then, was the wood seasoning and being prepared in a proper shape, ready for putting together this great force, whenever an emergency might arise.

Mr. J. then read from the report to show what number of the above were actually complete and required nothing more than putting together. This, in addition to the increase of the navy during the last ten years, would exhibit a state of preparation which certainly could not have been borne in mind by the gentlemen who had addressed the committee.

Mr. PICKENS said it was his intention to vote in the first instance for the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MALLORY] and then to have voted against the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SALTONSTALL] as amended. He had intended to do that because, at this time, he felt it his duty to go against all further appropriations than $1,425,000, as reported in the bill.

The CHAIR observed that there was but one amendment then pending, that of the gentleman from Virginia, having been accepted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, as a modification.

Mr. PICKENS said he would then vote against the whole proposition to amend, as he considered $1,400,000 amply sufficient for all practical purposes, at the present time. He protested against any action being had with a view to a contingency, or any legislation being based on the expectation of a war. If that were the real aspect of things, the sum proposed by the amendment would be a mere bagatelle; instead of such a paltry amount, they would want millions; and he, in such a state of things, would be ready to vote for ten millions, instead of $1,425,000. But, at present, he did not desire any thing to be done which looked towards war. There was no necessity for it.

Mr. J. went on to say that when the proper time should arrive for a revision of the tariff, he then would pledge himself to go with gentlemen of the North for such a tax as should be amply sufficient for every want of the country. But let gentlemen wait until the time should arrive, for he protested against this legislation by piecemeal. At this late period of the session, now that four days only remained, we were not prepared to do justice to the subject referred to by the mover of the amendment. But if any thing should occur, which might lead to a war, he trusted that an extra session would be called, and that then, when the case should actually exist, they would act like a free people. But at present he would raise his voice against any legislation looking towards a war.

Mr. HAWES, after some remarks, offered the following amendment:

“Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy may, if he may deem it expedient, disburse two hundred thousand dollars of said sum in the construction of two steam ships of such size as will pass the outer bar of the Mississippi; said ships to be built at Cincinnati, Ohio, and Louisville, Kentucky; and said steam ships to be built by contract, or otherwise, as said Secretary may order.”

After some remarks from Messrs. WICK, PROFFIT, and SMITH of Indiana,

The amendment was then modified at the suggestion of Messrs. GRAVES, W. C. JOHNSON, and PROFFIT, as follows:

“Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy may, if he may deem it expedient, disburse two hundred thousand dollars of said sum in the construction of two steam ships of such size as will pass the outer bar of the Mississippi; said ships to be built at Cincinnati, Ohio, at Louisville, Kentucky, or Covington, Kentucky, or New Albany, Indiana, or Paducah, Kentucky, or any other place or places on the Ohio or Mississippi rivers, if he believes the public service will thereby be promoted; said steamships to be built by contract or otherwise, as the said Secretary may order.”

After some remarks by Messrs. WM. COST JOHNSON, PROFFIT, THOMPSON of Mississippi, MALLORY, W. THOMPSON, GRAVES, and BRECKENRIDGE,

The question was taken on the amendment, and disagreed to.

Mr. FILLMORE submitted the following amendment:

“And in case the Government of Great Britain shall build any naval armaments for any of the lakes or rivers separating the United States from the Canadas, then it shall be the duty of this Government to build vessels on our side of at least a corresponding size; and so much of the money hereby appropriated as may be necessary, shall be applied to that object.”

The CHAIR ruled the amendment out of order. Mr. RIVES submitted the following; which was also ruled out of order:

“Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have authority to employ an amount out of said sum, not exceeding $10,000, in testing the utility of the inventions of Messrs. Hunter and Hobdy for propelling steam vessels.”

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. SALTONSTALL, as modified by Mr. MALLORY, as follows:

“For increase, repair, armament, and equipment of the navy, and wear and tear of vessels in commission, $2,000,000; $500,000 of which sum shall be expended in building and equipping war steamers of medium size,” and decided in the negative—ayes 62, noes 67.

The item “for medicines and surgical instruments, hospital stores, and other expenses on account of the sick, $30,000,” having been read,

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to amend the item, by adding:

“For payment of debts contracted in the purchase of sites for the erection of marine hospitals, under the act of March 3, 1837, to those individuals who have actually conveyed their property to the United States, ——— dollars.”

After some remarks by Messrs. GRAVES, UNDERWOOD, and MALLORY,

The CHAIR decided the amendment out of order.

Mr. GRAVES appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama moved that the committee rise; but the motion did not prevail.

The question was about to be taken, Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House? when

Mr. GRAVES withdrew his appeal.

Mr. ANDREWS moved that the committee rise; but no quorum voting,

The question was taken by tellers, who reported—ayes 25, noes 94: no quorum.

On motion of Mr. GRAVES, the committee rose and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. MONROE then moved a call of the House, and

The question was taken by tellers, who reported—ayes 34, noes 75.

No quorum voting, and the House refusing to have a call,

Mr. BEATTY moved that the House adjourn; And the question being taken, there appeared—ayes 39, noes 92.

A quorum being now present, the House again went back into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRAVES then offered the following as a modification of Mr. UNDERWOOD's amendment.

"And that the sum of thirty-eight thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and are hereby appropriated, out of which the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to pay for such of the sites, selected on the Western waters for marine hospitals, as have been deeded to the Government, with the approval of the Secretary of War.

The CHAIR decided the amendment to be out of order, for the reason that the 50th rule declares that "no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment," etc.

Mr. GRAVES appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

The question was then taken, "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House? and decided in the affirmative—ayes 97, noes 13—no quorum voting.

Mr. GRAVES moved that that fact be reported to the House; but

A quorum now appearing,

Mr. GRAVES withdrew his motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD offered the following amendment:

"For the purchase of Raub's Self-acting Safety Valves, to be applied to the boilers of the steamships heretofore authorized to be built, if in the opinion of the President such valves should be deemed useful."

The amendment was disagreed to.

The following item was then read:

"The improvement and necessary repairs of the navy yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, $15,000."

Mr. SALTONSTALL moved to strike out $15,000 and insert $25,000; but the motion was negatived.

The next item was read, as follows:

"For improvement and necessary repairs of the navy yard at Charlestown, Massachusetts, $25,200."

Mr. HOFFMAN moved to amend by striking out all after the word Massachusetts, and inserting "and for the erection of barracks, $55,200."

Mr. H. gave notice that, if this motion should prevail, he would move to amend similarly all the items for the several navy yards; but

After some remarks by Messrs. JONES of Virginia, SALTONSTALL, DOWNING, and REED, Mr. HOFFMAN withdrew his amendment for the present.

Mr. SALTONSTALL moved to amend by striking out $25,200 in the same item, and inserting $42,000.

The question being taken, the amendment was disagreed to.

The next item being read, viz:

"For improvement and necessary repairs of the navy yard at Brooklyn, New York, $46,800."

Mr. SALTONSTALL moved to strike out $46,800 and insert $78,000; but the amendment was negatived.

Mr. SALTONSTALL further moved to strike out $5,400 "for the improvement and necessary repairs of the navy yard at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania," and insert $9,000; but the amendment was negatived.

Mr. SALTONSTALL also moved to strike out $6,600 for the improvement and necessary repairs of the navy yard at Washington, District of Columbia, and insert $11,000; and this was likewise negatived.

Mr. MALLORY moved to amend the item "for improvement and necessary repairs of the navy yard at Gosport, Virginia," by striking out $29,400, and inserting $49,000.

After some remarks by Messrs. MALLORY and JONES of Virginia,

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOWNING then moved to amend the item "for improvement and necessary repairs of the navy yard near Pensacola, Florida," by striking out $12,000, and inserting $20,000.

The question being taken, the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HOFFMAN offered the following:

"For the purchase of a site and to commence the erection of barracks at Brooklyn, New York, $30,000.

"For the purchase of a site and to commence the erection of barracks at Charlestown, Massachusetts, $30,000.

"For the purchase of a site and the erection of barracks at Gosport, Virginia, $30,000.

"To commence the erection of barracks at Pensacola, Florida, $10,000."

The CHAIR ruled the amendment out of order.

Mr. REED moved to strike out $1,500 for necessary repairs of the hospital building at Charlestown, Massachusetts, and insert $5,000; but the amendment was decided out of order.

Mr. SALTONSTALL moved to amend the bill by inserting after the seventy-ninth line, as follows:

"To commence the erection of barracks in Pensacola, Florida, $10,000."

The CHAIR having decided the amendment out of order,

Mr. SALTONSTALL appealed from his decision; but

The question being taken, the decision of the CHAIR was sustained by the House.

Mr. MALLORY offered the following amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the duties heretofore discharged by the Commissioners of the Navy shall be apportioned as follows, viz:

The first division shall comprehend whatever relates to the construction, repairs, equipment, and preservation of vessels of war, and the officer presiding over its administration shall have attached to his bureau, to aid him in the performance of his duties—

A chief naval constructor;

An engineer qualified to superintend the operations of steam; and

A draughtsman.

The second division shall comprehend the construction, repairs, and preservation of all buildings on shore belonging to the navy, or used for naval purposes, and generally the superintendence of navy yards, hospitals, magazines, and other appendages to a naval station. This officer shall have placed under his direction—

A captain in the navy, as inspector of ordnance;

A commander, and two lieutenants and assistants;

A commander having charge of charts and instruments for hydrographical purposes;

A lieutenant, and two passed midshipmen;

A civil engineer; and

A draughtsman.

The third division shall comprise the purchase, manufacture, collection, and distribution of all provisions, clothing, and materials of every description required for the use of the navy. The officer charged with this division shall have placed under his direction—

A surgeon to superintend the purchase of medicines, hospital stores, and surgical instruments, and to perform such other duties, in connection with the medical branch of the service, as may be required of him by the Department; and two assistant surgeons to aid him in their performance;

One purser for contracts, and correspondence, for slop-clothing, and provisions.

And be it further enacted, That so much of an act approved February 7, 1815, entitled "An act to alter and amend the several acts for establishing a Navy Department, by adding thereto a Board of Commissioners," as comes within the meaning of this act, and is contrary thereto, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The CHAIR decided that under the 76th rule of the House, the amendment was not in order.

Mr. MALLORY appealed from the decision of the CHAIR; and

On the question being taken, Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House? It was decided in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the committee then rose, and reported the bill to the House.

The question was then stated, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time? when

Mr. EVANS moved various amendments.

Mr. DROMGOOLE inquired of the CHAIR, whether it was in order to offer a series of amendments at one time?

The SPEAKER replied that it was not in order to offer more than one amendment at a time, and that the amendments offered were not in order.

From this decision, Mr. EVANS appealed; and pending the question on said appeal,

On motion of Mr. HOFFMAN, at ten o'clock, p. m.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, February 27, 1841.

The bill from the House making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1841, was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. STURGEON, one thousand extra copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents were ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. WALL, the Senate took up the "bill to declare the rights of the children of the citizens of the United States born abroad;" and, after being considered, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a bill for the relief of the administrator of William A. Slacum; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. RUGGLES, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting copy-rights to inventors of designs, &c. which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. TAPPAN presented a memorial from a citizen of New Jersey, praying Congress "to adopt measures for securing an equitable and adequate market for American wheat." Mr. T. said that the memorial now presented was one of great value and importance; it contained an examination and expose of the present capacity of the six Northwestern States to grow wheat, and the probable increase of the wheat culture, the want of a foreign market for the already surplus production, and the consequence of continuing the existing restrictions of foreign Governments upon the introduction into their dominions of foreign wheat. It also examines the nature, and exposes the effect, of the British corn laws upon the revenue of that Government, as well as its effect upon their people, showing conclusively that the existence of those laws is alike detrimental to the interests of both countries. Mr. T. did not expect any action upon this important subject at this late period of the session; he would, however, move that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON submitted the following resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Delaware, which were laid on the table and ordered to be printed:

IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF DELAWARE—January session, 1841.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Delaware in General Assembly met. That the cession by the States of Virginia and Maryland of the territory of the District of Columbia, their grants of money to facilitate the erection of suitable buildings and fortifications for the accommodation and security of the President, Congress, and the several Departments of the Government, and the generous donation of lands by the proprietors of the soil upon which the city of Washington was laid out, and its plan projected, to the United States, was highly beneficial, and merited a kind, liberal, and generous consideration in return.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this Legislature, the refusal by a majority of Congress to recharter the banks of the District of Columbia, was unwise and oppressive.

Resolved, That this Legislature are unwilling to believe, with the citizens of Washington and Georgetown, that their only chance for good government and prosperity, rests in a retrocession of the territory ceded to the United States to the State of Maryland, but confidently hope the next, if not the present Congress, will grant them ample redress of all their grievances.

Resolved, That the people of the District of Columbia ought to be represented in the Congress of the United States, and that measures should be taken, as soon as conveniently may be, to bring about such a just and desirable end.

Resolved, That the foregoing resolutions be signed by the Speaker of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and transmitted to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, to be laid before their respective Houses.

R. HOUSTON,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

CHARLES POLK,

Speaker of the Senate.

Mr. PRESTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate a report of the experiments made upon the bomb cannon invented by John Cochran, in conformity with the joint resolution of April 25, 1840.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating a sufficient sum for defraying the expenses of the employment of a special agent to procure information as to mining and smelting lead, copper, and other ores.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to amend the act approved May 13, 1800, entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States,'" reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W. said he would take that occasion to say that it was the unanimous opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary that no such defect existed in the law as that which this bill was intended to remedy.

Mr. BUCHANAN concurred in opinion with the Judiciary Committee; but the highly respectable judges of the court in Pennsylvania thought otherwise; and the consequence was, that all the criminal business in the circuit courts was prevented. In this state of things, it was highly necessary that the bill should pass; and he hoped the Senate would indulge him by acting upon it at that time.

After a few remarks from Mr. CLAYTON, concurring in the remarks of Mr. WALL, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Indiana, the Senate took up, as in committee of the whole, the bill to reorganize the judicial circuits of the United States.

Mr. S. said his object in moving to take up the bill was to have it amended so as to conform the circuits and the duties of the judges to the state of the business of the country, by an equalization of the business and duties. At the time the bill was introduced and reported to the Senate, he had little hopes of seeing it become a law, as there were at that time many difficulties to encounter in the adjustment of the matter, the most of which he conceived were removed by a recent melancholy event—he alluded to the decease of Judge Barbour. That distinguished judge having been removed by Providence, the way was now clear to do that which would long since have been done, but for the locality of the judges. As the circuits were now arranged, six judges were located east of the mountains in the Atlantic States, and the other three in the West and Southwest. A most unequal and unjust imposition of duties was imposed upon the latter judges. He believed this to be the accepted and propitious time to do complete justice on the subject. He understood that the judges had agreed to an arrangement which would give four circuits to the West and Southwest, and leave five in the East; so that the West and Southwest would have the services of an additional judge. This arrangement he believed to be necessary to a due administration of justice, as well as to a just equalization of the laborious duties of the three Western judges, with those rendered by the judges of the Atlantic. He would only premise this much in anticipation of the amendment which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] was ready to propose.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama then offered the following amendment, explaining the reasons which induced him to offer it:

"That hereafter the eastern and western districts of Pennsylvania and the district of New Jersey, and the district of Delaware shall form the third circuit; the district of Maryland and the eastern district of Virginia shall form the fourth circuit; the district of North Carolina, the eastern and western districts of South Carolina, and the district of Georgia shall form the fifth circuit; the southern district of Alabama, and the Eastern district of Louisiana shall form the sixth circuit; the southern district of Mississippi, the eastern and middle districts of Tennessee, shall form the eighth circuit; and the district of Arkansas, the district of Missouri, and the district of Kentucky shall form the ninth circuit."

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the circuit court for the district of Arkansas, shall be holden on the fourth Monday of April, and the fourth Monday of October in each and every year; and it shall be the duty of the associate justice of the Supreme Court allotted to the ninth circuit, to preside at the spring term of the circuit court for the district of Arkansas; and the associate justice of the Supreme Court allotted to the eighth circuit, to preside at the spring term of the circuit court, for the southern district of Mississippi, which shall be holden on the second Monday in December."

Mr. ROANE said, he could not reconcile it to himself to permit this question to be taken, without offering a word or two on the subject. If he understood aright the amendment just offered and read to the Senate, its object and effect is to abolish, to obliterate from existence, the ancient judicial circuit composed of the States of Virginia and North Carolina! Never was he taken more by surprise than now! Without the time and the means of giving due consideration to the reasons we have just heard in favor of this measure, and without the possibility of any express knowledge of the wishes of these two long associated old States in regard to this proposed severance, I but yield to the impulse of the moment in rising in my place, and entering my solemn and earnest protest against the proceeding. I protest against it, sir, because at this last hurried moment of an expiring session of Congress, it is impossible that such a change as this can be made with that deliberation which a due regard to the wants and interests of all the parts of the Union requires at our hands. I protest against it, sir, because if a general change is required so as to equalize the labors of all the judges, I cannot see why this particular circuit is to be made the point of departure, and thereby cut in twain, merged into two other circuits, and thus blotted out from her old position on the judicial map of the Union.

Mr. President, these are two of the old Atlantic States of the good "old Thirteen." They embrace a long extent of seaboard, and from their local position, and long standing judicial connection, are certainly entitled to consideration. The reasons assigned for this measure are, first, the long travel of some of the judges of the West and Southwest to their courts, and second, the heavy dockets they find in them. The first is caused by the extensive territory and sparse population of those States, and must soon be obviated by the strong stream of immigration which is rapidly filling up our wilderness. And as regards the second reason, if there is now but little business in the circuit proposed to be abolished, I am very thankful for it, as it indicates two things: that our citizens are free from debt; and that our country is at peace with foreign nations. If there be, as is alleged, an unusual crowd of business at this time in the courts of the Western and Southwestern States, no man deplures more than I do the state of indebtedness which it indicates. But that state of things cannot always be. The deranged state of the currency, and the rage for speculation and wealth, which has caused this heavy mass of litigation in these courts, cannot always be; nor can peace a ways exist. And it should be borne in mind that, in time of war, when some of those courts would feel no consequent accession of business, the circuit proposed to be sponged would, from its local position, necessarily have thrown into its courts maritime and admiralty business. But, sir, it is not to the precise quantum of court business to which I look in this matter; for that cannot be kept equalized amongst the circuits, except by a legislation too frequent for the necessary permanency of any system. It is to the local position of this circuit—it is to the section of the Union in which it stands—it is to the position it has so long and so honorably occupied on the judicial map of the country, that I look. And, sir, it is the causes which come before the Supreme Court, no matter where originating, involving her dearest constitutional rights, that add to my feeling on this subject. But, Mr. President, if a new arrangement of the judicial circuits is necessary to equalize the labors of the judges, why not, let me ask, add to this old circuit her sister South Carolina, or her beloved daughter Kentucky, or her respected neighbor Tennessee, and thus obviate the evil complained of, and at the same time preserve this old circuit and its homogeneous character. I am certain, sir, that there is no reasonable expansion of this circuit which the public weal may demand, to which it would not cheerfully yield. But, sir, whilst it is at this moment submitting, in mournful resignation, to the late heavy dispensation of Providence, which has suddenly deprived it and the country of an eminent jurist and judge, I do hope that this body will pause before it avails itself of that dispensation as a reason for striking from existence a circuit almost coeval with our judicial system, and which, to say the least, has never yet impaired its strength, or disturbed its symmetry. I have thought these hasty remarks due to my position here on the present occasion; and however they may be received, and whatever may be the fate of the proposed measure, I feel that in making them I have done my duty.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said, for the last few years there had been more or less said about the inequality of the duties of the members of the Supreme Court; and in 1837, as would be recollected, he submitted a resolution calling upon the Secretary of State to furnish information respecting the number of suits tried, and the number of miles travelled by each judge, with a view to an equalization of the labors of the judges. The return of the Secretary was then in his hand, and it showed that the West and the Southwest furnished much the greatest part of the business of the Union; but there had been difficulties in the way of any alteration of the different circuits, and the proposition made for that purpose was voted down. But a late melancholy and deplorable event which had occurred, (the death of Judge Barbour,) had obviated the difficulties that were previously in the way, if the Senate thought proper now to act, and there would now be no violation of good faith with the judges. And what objection could be opposed to the proposition now before the Senate? Because a State had heretofore had, should a State always have a judge appointed from, and resident within, her limits? He felt for Virginia as much veneration as any other honorable Senator, and he was as ready to see that she had a just participation in all that was enjoyed by the other States; but did they not know that Virginia had had a judge of the Supreme Court almost for the last forty years, when associated with North Carolina? Really, complaint from Virginia came now with a very bad grace; it would come with a better grace from North Carolina, which, during the period he had mentioned, had not been represented in that court. But this was a question in which the public interest was involved; it was a question how the circuits could be best arranged, so as to promote a proper discharge of judicial duties, and how the public interests could be best taken care of and best despatched. The arrangement now proposed was to add Virginia to the circuit in which the Chief Justice resided, and to add North Carolina to the circuit in which Judge Wayne resided. And what was the objection, unless it was that one State should always have a judge? This was no valid objection. If any claim existed, it was that of North Carolina. But the present judge of the circuit to which North Carolina was now proposed to be added, was fully competent to the performance of the additional duties that would devolve upon him; and when he should resign, or his seat should be vacated in any other way, North Carolina would then be entitled to consideration. But there was no objection; and he hoped they would not pass over the auspicious moment which then presented itself to equalize the duties of these judges. He then referred to the report on his table, to which he before referred, to show that there should be some modification of the circuits. The honorable Senator read largely from the returns of judicial business on the circuits, by which it appeared that the business of the other circuits was very inconsiderable, as compared with those of the Southern and Southwestern circuits, and he invited the attention of the Senate to the state of the business, that they might see how impracticable it was that the judges of those circuits should do justice to themselves and to the country. The amount of business was to great to be despatched by the judges to whom it was assigned; and should they then, by a reference to any supposed claim of any particular State or individual, and in disregard of those who were so nearly interested, refuse to equalize the amount of labor which the judges should bear? He trusted they would not; and he hoped they would put the court on a footing, in special reference to the public interest, against all other interests and considerations whatever. Virginia had no claim which should operate to the rejection of this proposition. He had said that she had had one judge for the last forty years; but he had not stated the whole truth, for she had not only had the Chief Justice, but one of the Associate Judges also. He was not disposed to do injustice to any one; and he was satisfied no injustice would be done by the adoption of this measure. It was an arrangement which met the approbation of all the judges on the bench, and he was of opinion it should receive the acquiescence of the Senate. He hoped the Senate would adopt the amendment he had proposed.

Mr. CLAYTON suggested a modification of an amendment by which Delaware would be included in the fourth district; which was accepted by Mr. CLAY.

Mr. HUNTINGTON supported the proposed change in the arrangement of the circuits as conducive to the public interests, and contended that every other State had as good a right as Virginia to a judge to reside within their limits.

Mr. KING rose to say that if the Senate should debate this bill, they might as well lay it on the table; for unless it was sent to the other branch of Congress to day, it could not be sent at all, without a suspension of the rules, in which the other House must concur. He (Mr. KING) was in favor of the bill, and he entreated gentlemen who might likewise be favorable to the measure, not to consume the time with a lengthened debate, for they might just as well vote it down at once.

Mr. MANGUM said in a short time the West would require more judicial aid, and he supported this proposition because he was unwilling to see the bench of the Supreme Court increased in number. In times of peace, the business of the court, in his own State, could be despatched in two or three days; in times of war, the business would be increased, but, when it became necessary, it would be easy to detail more force to that part of the country. But in order to keep down the number of Judges in the Supreme Court, it became necessary to re-arrange the circuits.

Mr. ROANE. It is said by the friends of this bill that it cannot pass for want of time, if it is to be debated! Sir, I assure those gentlemen that I would not defeat the most obnoxious measure by mere debate, for that purpose only. He had but discharged what he felt to be his duty in rising in the first instance, and promptly entering his protest as one of the Representatives of Virginia against this sudden and unexpected attempt to put that old Commonwealth out of that position in our judicial system which she had so honorably maintained from its foundation. And, sir, I should not have risen again, but for remarks which have fallen from two or three Senators. In reference to that of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY] that he hoped and believed that Virginia, in any desire she might feel to remain in her judicial position, would not be actuated by any consideration of office; he had cordially to thank the Senator for the justice he does his native State in this respect. No man knows better than does that honorable Senator, that Virginia has been as little actuated by low considerations of office, as any other State in the Union, and been at all times as prompt and ready as any one of them to sacrifice all selfish considerations on the altar of the public good; and, for myself, I solemnly declare that no consideration of the kind moves me in the course I have taken on this sudden emergency. My heart tells me that if I was a North Carolinian, my feeling and conduct would be the same that I now manifest.

The Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY] has adverted to the same subject in another aspect—and urges that Virginia has had the judge of that circuit for a continuous period of more than forty years, and also, that on one occasion two judges of the Supreme Court were residing within her limits at the same time. True, sir, for more than forty years the judge of that circuit has resided in the State of Virginia, but let it be borne in mind that during that entire period there were but two judges. Had there been during that long time many judges appointed, and all of them taken from Virginia, I do not know that, in such a case, complaints of the fact could be properly urged except from her associate sister, North Carolina. Sir, the very distinguished late Chief Justice of the United States, who all admit to have been one of the brightest ornaments to the bench and the country, was a resident judge of Virginia for more than thirty-five of the forty years! His distinguished successor, whose sudden death we are now mourning, resided in Virginia during the balance of that period; and never have I heard, nor do I believe there ever existed, a murmur of complaint in North Carolina or elsewhere, that these two eminent judges happened to be natives and residents of Virginia. It is also true, as the Senator alleges, that two Judges of the Supreme Court did reside at the same time in Virginia. Yes, sir, Judge Washington, who presided in the circuit immediately north of us, resided on the northern margin of Virginia; but, sir, he was thus most conveniently situated to attend to the duties of the circuit assigned to him, and he did attend to them faithfully; and I am perfectly certain that no human being would have torn him from the venerated shades of Mount Vernon, which he had inherited from his immortal relative and namesake, merely that he should reside within the territorial limits of his judicial circuit.

But, sir, I am asked by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HUNTINGTON,] if it be possible that any consideration of office could operate in the aversion to the proposed change. The gentle and inoffensive manner in which the inquiry is made, induces me, as far as I am concerned, to answer most frankly and sincerely, no. I will not retort the question, whether with that Senator any consideration of office connected with this subject weighs with him or any of his friends in this sudden and hurried attempt to strike Virginia from her old and natural position. If I was to ask it, I hope I should receive the same prompt and frank answer in the negative.

Mr. President, it only remains for me to say, that if this amendment is adopted, as I believe it will be, Virginia will part with great reluctance from her old and long associated sister North Carolina, between whom and her there is a peculiar identity of interests, habits, manners, and feeling, growing out of their common birth and kind neighborhood. I also say that she will be ready to extend the paternal embrace to her highly respected Northern neighbor, Maryland, in the fullest confidence that they will get along most harmoniously together, and enjoy an able and impartial administration of law and justice. But, Mr. President, without any the slightest disrespect whatever to Maryland or any other State, for I love them all, I cannot forbear to express a feeling that I have. It is, that if this thing is to be done, if the public good demands, and Congress wills that Virginia shall be pushed out of her old place, that she may be shoved on the South, or towards her "beloved West," beyond the Alleghenies, now as easily crossed as the Potomac, and daily becoming more accessible to her.

Mr. SEVIER sent to the Secretary's desk, to be read, a letter which he had received from Judge Craton on the subject, and in favor of this arrangement.

The Secretary having read the letter,

Mr. MANGUM asked if he were to understand that Virginia and North Carolina were to be separated.

The PRESIDENT replied in the affirmative.

Mr. MANGUM said he had not so understood it.

Mr. HUNTINGTON arose amidst a cry of "question," and he gave way to

Mr. ROANE, who called for the ayes and noes on the amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM inquired whether the proposed change would occasion any conflict in the times of holding the courts.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said no conflict could arise, as the judges had the arrangement and regulation of their own circuits, and as in this measure the judges had concurred.

Mr. BENTON was opposed to the amendment, and he would state some of his reasons. Some years ago, when the judicial circuits were increased, he showed his anxiety to have an equalization of the circuits for the West; that desire had increased, and continued to increase, and could not be prevented increasing by any action on this bill. They had two Territories in the Northwest almost ready to be admitted into the Union; they might expect to hear their taps at the door of the Senate Chamber very soon, demanding admission; the South, too, had a Territory almost ready for admission into the Union; and if there was to be any change now, he should desire to see two new circuits for the West. He was in favor of increasing the number of judges in the Union; he to see as many as there were in Great Britain. He desired to see at least as many judges to take cognizance over 1,500 miles square, to take cognizance over the laws and the Constitution of the United States, and the laws and the Constitutions of the several States, as there were in England to take cognizance over a territory in extent not more than equal to one of our large States. He was in favor of seeing twelve judges of the Supreme Court. But the condition of the dockets he looked upon as accidental, and the quantum of business, he was of opinion, should not be taken exclusively as the rule to govern them. He looked upon the circuit judges—for all were circuit judges—in a two fold character; they had power to act as judges of their circuits, consisting of one, two, or three States, and as judges here of the whole Union; and therefore he should be opposed to sinking Virginia and North Carolina from the judicial map of the country. He was in favor of the different sections of this Union being represented on the bench of the Supreme Court for the highest function were the duties they were called upon to discharge here: they had to pass judgment on the laws of the Union, and of the States of the Union, and whatever was their decision, no matter who were the parties—and one case was now depending—the case of the Africans—of great interest to this country—the decision became binding and obligatory all over the Union. And by whom were these cases decided? Not by the district judges, but by all the judges of the Union, at the metropolis of the Union; and he was not willing to strike Virginia out of the judicial map of the country. He now spoke as a citizen of the Union, interested in the construction of the Constitution of the Union, of the laws of Congress, and of the State laws, the whole of which came before the judges of the Supreme Court: he felt desirous that to determine these weighty matters, there should be an ample number, and that they should be brought from every great section of the country. Could they dismiss such States as North Carolina and Virginia, great as they were in extent and Revolutionary in their character, and belonging as they did to the original thirteen? Could they have the different sections of the Union represented on the bench of the Supreme Court when two such States were struck from the map. And if it were done, how long did they think it would last? He would answer the question himself—from the 4th of March to the 17th of May, which he understood was the day fixed upon for the meeting of the extra session. He was opposed then to this amendment, on important grounds, leaving entirely out of view the quantum of business the judges might at one time or another perform. The West needs more circuits—the bench of the Supreme Court needs twelve judges, and so far as his judgment went, they ought not to be put off with nine. He should therefore join the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROANE] who had spoken against the proposition, Western man as he was.

Mr. BUCHANAN said: As he intended to vote in favor of this amendment, proposed by his friend from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] he should briefly state the reasons which had brought his mind to this conclusion. So far from intending any hostility to the "Old Dominion," he felt great pleasure in declaring that she had always justly enjoyed a very high and elevated character in the Confederacy, and that character, in his estimation, had never stood higher than at the present moment. He would much rather add to her laurels than pluck a single feather from her proud plume. His support of the present amendment must not, therefore, be construed into hostility to Virginia. He had never, in his life, felt more strongly convinced of the propriety of any vote which he intended to give, than upon the present occasion. The question was within a very narrow compass. It was simply this: Shall we prolong the existence of a judicial circuit east of the mountains which is not at all required to transact the judicial business of the country; or shall we abolish it, and in its stead establish a new circuit in the Southwestern portion of the Union, where it is so much wanted that it is now physically impossible for the circuit Judge there to transact one-half the business, or even personally to attend all the courts appointed by law to be held. This was most certainly the true state of the case; and under such circumstances, he did not believe that the people of Virginia, merely for the sake of obtaining the appointment of an unnecessary judge, would deprive their fellow-citizens of the Southwestern States of a court which was absolutely indispensable to their best interests.

The present number of Judges on the bench of the Supreme Court was already greater than he could have desired. Nine was too large a number if it could have been avoided. He would not go into the general question at the present moment, but he believed he was fortified in this opinion by all experience. It might become absolutely necessary to increase this number; and in that event, but in no other, should he ever give his consent to it. The question, then, with him, would be, did the transaction of the necessary business of the courts absolutely require an increase of the number of the judicial circuits? If it did, he might then feel himself constrained to add to the number of the judges. Fortunately, no such necessity at present existed, nor would it, he believed, for many years to come, in case the present amendment should prevail. The fifteen States east of the Alleghany Mountains had now six of the nine judges, whilst the eleven Western and Southwestern States had only three. The business in the three Southern Atlantic circuits was notoriously inadequate for the employment of the judges. Maryland and Delaware constituted the present circuit of the Chief Justice; and he had expressed his entire willingness to hold the circuit courts in Virginia, should this be required by Congress. He would experience no difficulty whatever in transacting the circuit court business of these three States; and even with this addition, a great portion of his time would be unemployed. The same might be said of Judge Wayne, whose present circuit consisted of South Carolina and Georgia. He was willing to hold the circuit courts in North Carolina, and could do it without inconvenience. Indeed, there was comparatively but very little circuit court business in any of the Atlantic States south of Maryland. The judges of the Supreme Court themselves were convinced of the propriety of abolishing the Virginia and North Carolina circuit, and giving the new judge to the West; and, in contemplation of this change, they had made the arrangement proposed by the present amendment, which would enable nine judges conveniently to transact all the judicial business of the country.

What utility, then, was there in continuing the Virginia circuit? The public interest did not demand it—the public good did not require it. Nothing could be said in its favor, unless it might be the question which had been asked by his friend from Virginia, [Mr. ROANE,] Would you blot out of existence the ancient circuit of Virginia and North Carolina? I answer, yes, if time and experience had shown its existence to be unnecessary, and even prejudicial to the public welfare, by preventing another portion of the Union from obtaining a judge, where such a judge was imperatively required. It ought not surely to wound the feelings of the people of the Old Dominion, to be united to Maryland and Delaware for judicial purposes, when such an union was necessary to promote the public welfare. This was not a question of pride, but of principle. He might say the same of North Carolina.

Placed in similar circumstances, he might probably have acted as his friend from Virginia [Mr. ROANE] had done. Our feelings were naturally very strong for our respective States, and these feelings were highly honorable. It was, however, his duty to decide this question impartially, and he had never felt less hesitation in deciding any question than the present.

The inscrutable decree of an all-wise Providence had created a vacancy on the bench of the Supreme Court, by the death of a judge whose loss we all deplored. This enabled us to abolish a circuit wholly unnecessary in this portion of the Union, and create a circuit in the Southwest, where a new circuit was indispensable, without increasing the number of the Supreme Court judges. He thought it wise to embrace this opportunity. If you once appointed a judge for the Virginia circuit the case was hopeless. You could not then break up his circuit and ask him to transfer his residence to the far West. No judge would ever be transferred by Congress, against his will, from the East to the West. Who would have thought of making such an attempt in regard to Chief Justice Marshall or Judge Barbour, although the business in their circuit was comparatively so trifling? It would have been cruel as well as unjust. The present, therefore, was the propitious moment when such an arrangement could be made, and when the public might be accommodated without doing injustice to any human being.

He need scarcely repeat, that in the vote which he proposed to give, he intended no disparagement to Virginia or North Carolina. The whole country ought to feel grateful to Virginia for the distinguished luminaries which she had furnished to the bench of the Supreme Court; but as five circuits on our Eastern maritime frontier were, in his opinion, abundantly sufficient to transact all the judicial business, he would not prolong the existence of the sixth, merely for the purpose of enabling Virginia to furnish another judge to the Union.

He was sorry to entertain but a feeble hope of the passage of the bill. Its friends ought to have first tried it in the other House, and if it had passed there, he presumed there would have been but little difficulty here. If we should pass it, of which he entertained no doubt, he feared it never would be touched by the other House.

Mr. BUCHANAN said as he intended to vote for the bill, he would very briefly express the reasons which actuated him. So far from having any desire to act in opposition to the "Old Dominion," he thought that State very justly occupied a very high and elevated character in this Confederacy; and she always should enjoy it, as she deserved to do so. He would not take a feather from her plume, nor depreciate her character and her standing; and therefore his support of this amendment must not be construed into hostility to that State. He believed that nine judges of the Supreme Court constituted as great a number as could conveniently discharge the judicial business of the country; but when the necessity arose, he should not be unwilling to increase the number. They knew that for years past six circuits had been wholly unnecessary to despatch the business of twelve or thirteen States. Why not, then, amend the system? The reason hitherto was palpable. Who would have ventured to interfere with the venerable judge lately deceased? Who would have proposed to send him to the West? for while the judge was in existence, he would always have sympathizing friends. But a mysterious Providence had enabled them to make such alterations as were necessary here, and to add judicial aid to the Southwest. They could well spare a judge from the East; and who could imagine that Pennsylvania and Delaware constituted a sufficient circuit to give the judges of the United States adequate employment? The business had ever been very small; yet who would ever have thought, during the lifetime of Judge Marshall, of extending his duties. But now the difficulties in the way of this proposed change were removed, and he could see in it nothing but what was correct and proper. Let the circuit be abolished, and add a circuit judge to the Southwest, and he believed it would be many years to come before it would be necessary to increase the number of the judges of the Supreme Court. In the vote he proposed to give, he intended no disparagement of Virginia or North Carolina. The country ought to be grateful to Virginia for the distinguished luminaries she had sent to the bench; but five circuits on the maritime frontier of the country were amply sufficient to do all the business. These had been his impressions for years past; yet he had little idea that the bill would pass. He thought its friends had done wrong in not introducing it into the other House; and if it passed there, it might pass here. However, it should have his vote.

Mr. WALKER spoke in favor of the bill, contending that to refuse to pass it was virtually denying to the Southwest her full participation in the blessings of the judicial system, observing at the same time that he conceived it peculiarly due to the State of Mississippi.

Mr. RIVES said that he should vote for the bill. He felt himself safe in following the lead of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN,] whose former position as a member of the Judiciary Committee justly gave his opinion great weight on this subject. He had therefore made up his mind to vote for the proposition before the Senate. It seemed just, and right, and proper; and he did not see how the rights of the State of Virginia were to be considered as involved in the matter. He wished to act in a national spirit; and he thought this was an occasion which ought to be improved in reference to the West and Southwest, without any inconvenient increase of the judges.

Mr. BENTON said, since he had last addressed the Senate, a few moments ago, he had been informed that the number of judges in England was greater than he had stated. They had been twelve in number for several centuries, but within the last few years they had been increased to fifteen.

The vote was then taken on the amendment, which was adopted—ayes 34, noes 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bates, Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dixon, Fulton, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, Knight, Linn, Mangum, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholson, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Rugles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, and Williams—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Graham, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Pierce, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, and Wright—13.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana then submitted another amendment, which was also adopted.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendments adopted as in committee of the whole, were concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a joint resolution authorizing the Postmaster General to make contracts for carrying the mail coastwise between Mobile and New Orleans; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate will, on this and each succeeding day of the present session, take a recess from half past two o'clock to four o'clock, p. m.

The adoption of the resolution was advocated by Messrs. WRIGHT and WILLIAMS; and, the question on its passage being taken, it was decided in the negative—ayes 21, noes 26.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the House bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1841, reported the same with sundry amendments; which were read.

Messrs. ANDERSON, TAPPAN, KNIGHT, and HENDERSON, severally gave notice of amendments which they intended to propose when the bill came up for consideration; which amendments, with those of the committee, were ordered to be printed.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill for creating a new land district in the State of Missouri, and for changing the boundaries of the southwestern and western land districts in said State;

The bill for the relief of Jesse Carpenter; and

The bill to amend the act entitled "An act to amend the act approved May 13, 1800, entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States,'" were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill to declare the rights of the children of the citizens of the United States born abroad, was, on motion by Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, laid on the table.

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and in about an hour the doors were again opened.

The joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William J. Parham, and others, for attending as witnesses to establish the claims of the stone cutters under the resolution of 21st July, 1840, was considered as in committee of the whole, and on the question of engrossment, it was decided in the negative. So the resolution was lost.

Mr. HUBBARD moved that when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet at 7 o'clock this evening.

This motion was strongly urged by Messrs. HUBBARD and WRIGHT, but before the question was taken, a motion was made for adjournment, which was carried—ayes 17, noes 15.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, February 27, 1841.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the rules in relation to the order of business were suspended, and the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the

NAVAL SERVICE FOR THE YEAR 1841.

The question recurred on the appeal of Mr. EVANS from the decision of the CHAIR, which was pending yesterday when the House adjourned.

Mr. EVANS withdrew his appeal; and moved to amend the bill by striking from the 13th line thereof the words, one million four hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "two million dollars; four hundred thousand dollars of which sum shall be expended in building and equipping war steamers of medium size."

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 94, nays 80.

The bill was read a third time;

And the question being stated on its passage,

Mr. WELLER moved the previous question; which was seconded, put, and carried, and the bill was passed, and is as follows:

On motion of Mr. JONES, of Virginia, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CUSHING in the chair,) and took up the bill making appropriations for the SUPPORT OF THE ARMY FOR THE YEAR 1841.

The bill was read; when

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana offered the following amendment, to come in after the 91st line, viz:

"For the continuance of the Cumberland road through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, $300,000, to be subjected to all the restrictions and limitations of former appropriations."

Mr. JONES of Virginia suggested that the amendment was not in order, being a subject different from that under debate.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana said, that if the gentleman from Virginia would waive his point of order, he would be satisfied to have the vote taken upon the amendment without debate.

The CHAIR decided that the amendment was in order.

Mr. MONTGOMERY appealed from the decision; and

On the question being taken, Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House? It was decided in the affirmative—ayes 85, nays 54.

The question on the amendment was then taken, by tellers, and rejected—ayes 77, noes 84.

Mr. HUNT moved to amend by inserting $100,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river, the money to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The amendment being ruled out of order by the CHAIR,

Mr. HUNT took an appeal, but the decision of the CHAIR was sustained.

Mr. MOORE moved to amend, by inserting after the 49th line, an appropriation of $40,000 for removing obstructions in Red River; which amendment was likewise decided by the CHAIR to be out of order.

Mr. GRINNELL moved to amend, by inserting $7,500 for the purchase or manufacture of repeating fire arms, under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON moved further to amend by substituting $20,000, and inserting the word "Colt's" before the word "repeating."

After some discussion between Messrs. WADDY THOMPSON and SMITH of Maine, the former modified his amendment by striking out the word "Colt's."

After some debate of rather a discursive character on a point of order, the question was taken on the amendment of Mr. THOMPSON to the amendment, and it was rejected.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. GRINNELL, and it was also rejected.

Mr. JONES of Virginia then moved the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means, to come in after the end of the bill:

"For preventing and suppressing hostilities in Florida, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, conformably to the acts of Congress of the 19th of March, 1836, and the acts therein referred to, viz: for forage, for freight or transportation of military supplies of every description, from the places of purchase to Florida; for the purchase of wagons and harness, of boats and lighters, and other vessels; of horses, mules, and oxen, to keep up the trains; of tools, leather, and other materials for repairs; for transportation within Florida, including the line of steamboats and other vessels for service in the rivers, and on the coasts, and the expenses of maintaining the several steamboats and transport schooners connected with the operations of the army; for hire of mechanics, mule drivers, teamsters, and other assistants, including their subsistence; for miscellaneous and contingent charges, and for arrearages in 1840, one million sixty-one thousand eight hundred and sixteen dollars."

Mr. EVANS moved to strike out the sum in the amendment, and to insert $1,666,906 30.

Mr. JONES made some remarks in explanation, after which

Mr. MASON gave his views.

The hour of two and a half o'clock having arrived, the House took its usual recess.

[EVENING SESSION.]

After the recess, the question being on the amendment of Mr. EVANS,

Mr. DOWNING addressed the committee at some length on the subject of the military operations in Florida.

Mr. DAWSON then suggested to Mr. EVANS the propriety of increasing the sum, by adding $250,000 due to Georgia.

Mr. CRABB made a similar suggestion on the part of Alabama.

After some explanations from Messrs. DOWNING, EVANS, JONES, MORGAN, GRAVES, and DAWSON,

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. EVANS, and it was rejected—ayes 73, noes 76.

The question then recurring on the section proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, it was agreed to.

Mr. CRABB then referred to the services of the Alabama militia. The State had paid them $130,000, and presented her claim here; but as it still remained before the Committee of Claims, he desired to submit an amendment to this bill.

The CHAIR inquired whether there was a standing law for these expenditures.

Mr. CRABB said there had been, but there was some irregularity in the vouchers, and therefore he wished the claim settled on principles of equity and justice.

Mr. JONES inquired for the law.

Mr. CRABB said there was a general law for the payment of militia, when called into the service of the United States, at $8 a month.

Mr. LINCOLN said there was no other law than that under which the militia of Massachusetts and other States had been paid.

Mr. TILLINGHAST objected to the amendment as being for past services, while the appropriations in the bill were future.

The CHAIR pronounced the amendment out of order.

Mr. CRABB thereupon withdrew it.

The committee then rose, and the bill was reported to the House.

And the question being on concurring in the amendments reported to the bill—

Mr. CHAPMAN moved the previous question.

The call was sustained—ayes 93, noes 85.

The previous question was then put and carried, and the main question being on the amendment, (viz: the new section for the Florida war,) it was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to its third reading. It was read a third time; when

Mr. HUBBARD moved the previous question.

Which was seconded, put, and carried, and the bill was passed.

The whole amount appropriated in the bill is $5,275,919.

Mr. JONES moved to suspend the rules to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a view to take up the General Indian Appropriation Bill, but at the suggestion of Mr. BELL he suspended the motion till Mr. B. had reported the followed bills from the Committee on Indian Affairs, viz:

A bill to defray the expense of delegations of Seminole Indians west of the Mississippi to Florida, and for other purposes.

A bill making appropriations for the temporary support of certain destitute Kickapoo Indians, and to defray the expenses of removing and subsisting for a limited time the Swan creek and Black river Indians of Michigan.

These bills were read and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

THE INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES then renewed his motion, which was agreed to, and the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DROMGOOLE in the chair,) and took up the Indian appropriation bill, which was read throughout by the Clerk for information.

The bill was taken up by items.

Mr. SALTONSTALL moved the following amendment:

"For presents for Indians under the same act, $5,000."

After some remarks for Mr. S. in support of his amendment,

Mr. JONES opposed the amendment, on the ground that the whole amount of presents to the Indians was limited to $5,000. Though this item has been introduced into previous bills, from year to year, it had been inadvertently done. The law, when rigidly examined, would be found not to warrant the annual appropriation.

Mr. RARIDEN explained: the withholding of the money would not injure the Indians, as the money ultimately fell into the hands of agents and sub-agents; and the Indians were more injured than benefited by the practice.

Mr. EVERETT considered the act as distributing $5,000 annually. It was so intended at the time, and had been so understood ever since. The bill made permanent provision for the Indian Department.

Mr. PROFFIT inquired whether any law allowed part of the annuities to be paid to the Indians in goods?

Mr. JONES said this was according to each treaty; the payments were variously made.

Mr. PROFFIT said the law was daily violated; he had conducted Indians under one of the treaties, and knew that more than half the annuity of the Pottawatomies was forced on them in goods, although the treaty specified that they should be paid in gold and silver. Mr. P. made other statements in which he contended that the Department had not acted up to the treaties.

Mr. JONES asked Mr. PROFFIT to specify a particular treaty.

Mr. PROFFIT said that, in 1837, the treaty with the Pottawatomies promised gold and silver, and was paid, by force, in goods, charged at enormous prices.

Mr. JONES said at the proper time he would convince Mr. P. that he was mistaken. He denied that the law for presents was intended to operate annually.

Mr. EVERETT insisted on an opposite construction.

Mr. SALTONSTALL confirmed the view of Mr. EVERETT, intimating that the provisions of that law were permanent.

Mr. JONES would not yield, and the amendment was negatived.

Mr. DODGE, Delegate from Iowa, moved to insert an item of $800 for the hire of a clerk for the Superintendent of Indian Affairs north of the Missouri river.

Mr. JONES objected on the ground that there was no law for it.

Mr. DODGE mentioned the need of the appropriation, but it was rejected.

Mr. JONES moved to reduce the items for the Choctaws from $50,950 to $44,950; which was agreed to: to reduce the item for the Omahas from $2,440 to $1,140: to increase the item for the Otoes and Missourias from $3,140 to $5,640; all of which were agreed to.

The bill having been gone through with, was laid aside to be reported to the House, and the committee took up the bill to defray the expenses of the delegation of the Seminole Indians west of the Mississippi.

No amendments being offered to the bill, the committee next took up the bill for the relief of certain Kickapoo Indians and Black River Indians of Missouri; which was in like manner laid aside.

Mr. UNDERWOOD made an effort to get the Senate bill for removing the raft in Red river taken up, but without success.

Mr. JONES moved that the committee rise; which prevailing,

The committee rose accordingly, and the bills considered in committee were reported to the House, the amendments concurred in, the bills read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate.

Mr. RUSSELL made an effort to get the hour of meeting changed to 10 o'clock, and to set apart two hours on Monday and Tuesday for private bills. The motion requiring two-thirds of the House, tellers were called, and the vote stood—ayes 91, noes 34. The rules were suspended to receive the motion. It was received and read.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to amend it by striking out the clause respecting private bills; on which motion tellers were called, and the vote stood—ayes 36, noes 92.

So the amendment was negatived.

The question being then put on the resolution, no quorum voted; when

Mr. WISE moved to adjourn; which prevailing,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, March 1, 1841.

Mr. BATES presented the credentials of the Hon. RUFUS CHOATE, elected by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts a Senator from that State for the unexpired term occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER.

Mr. CHOATE appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted a communication from the Secretary of the Navy in reply to a resolution of the Senate of the 28th ult. to which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN presented the memorial of the municipal authorities of St. Louis, praying an appropriation for the improvement of their harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. NORVELL presented two memorials of citizens of Michigan, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which were laid upon the table.

Mr. HUBBARD said he had some days since mentioned that no memorials had been presented from New Hampshire on the subject of a general bankrupt law. Since the adjournment of the Senate on Saturday, he had received a memorial from the county of Coos on the subject. It appeared that a circular, printed in New York, had been received at Lancaster, in that county, and requesting the postmaster at that place to use his exertions to procure signatures to it. Instead of this, a remonstrance had been drawn up against the passage of any bankrupt law, which was signed by many respectable citizens. Mr. H. then presented the memorial; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of citizens of Chataque county, New York, remonstrating against the passage of a bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

On motion by Mr. FULTON, the papers of of William J. Parham were permitted to be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of citizens of East Florida, remonstrating against the cession of any portion of their Territory to the Seminole Indians, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD said the only subject undisposed of by that committee was a bill which had been referred to it for the relief of William R. Davis, which he was instructed to report without amendment.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred memorials remonstrating against the execution of the treaty with the Seneca Indians, said as no appropriation would be asked at the present session to carry the treaty into effect, he had been instructed by the committee to ask to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

RELATIONS WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he was instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to move to be discharged from the consideration of the resolution which had been referred to that committee, "requesting the President to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, any correspondence which may have taken place between this Government and that of Great Britain relative to the Northeastern boundary, not heretofore communicated to the Senate."

He would state, with as much brevity as possible, the reasons which had induced the committee to believe that it would be inexpedient, at the present moment, to publish the correspondence to which the resolution referred.

It would be recollected by Senators who had directed their attention to this subject, that in consequence of the correspondence already published between the two Governments, and to which he need not particularly refer, it became the duty of Great Britain to submit to our Government the project of a convention for the settlement of this long disputed boundary question. This duty had been performed by the British Government in the month of May, 1839. The President did not approve of this proposed convention, chiefly because it contained no ultimate provision which must inevitably and finally determine the controversy between the two countries. Indeed, from its character, it was quite probable that, had it been adopted, it would not have produced this result so much to be desired. And the President was firmly convinced, considering the long delay—the high state of mutual irritation existing along the border, and the imminent danger of actual collision, that the interest of both parties imperatively demanded the adoption of such treaty stipulations as must necessarily make an end of the question. The British Government had since unequivocally coincided with the President in these sentiments, and the two Governments had already agreed upon the essential points of a convention based upon these principles, and alike advantageous and honorable to both. There were still some provisions of this convention, of comparatively minor importance, and involving detail rather than principle, which had not yet been agreed upon; but if it were the sincere desire of both parties, as he believed it was, to arrive at an amicable conclusion, the negotiation must soon be successfully terminated. Under these peculiar circumstances, the committee believed that it could do no good to either party, whilst it might be embarrassing to both Governments, to publish to the world the correspondence and the different projects and counter projects of treaties which had passed between them.

Mr. B. said that his official position in the Senate had afforded him free access to all this correspondence. He had examined it with care, and would now frankly state the impression which it had made on his mind. Although he would not pretend to say that there were no omens of war in the conduct of the British Government on our Northern frontier, yet this he should assert, with much confidence; that in the negotiation itself relative to our Northeastern boundary, nothing had occurred inconsistent with the sincere and anxious desire which had always been professed by that Government to preserve the peace which now so happily subsisted between the two countries, and to bring the question to a final and satisfactory conclusion. Probably this expression might be too strong, and he ought to have qualified the general terms he had used, by excepting the delays we had experienced from the tardy movements of the British Government at every stage in the progress of the negotiation. Still he felt himself justified in using, at the present moment, the language of the President in his message at the commencement of the session; that, "from the character of the points still in difference, and the undoubted disposition of both parties to bring the matter to an early conclusion, I look with entire confidence to a prompt and satisfactory termination of the negotiation." He had reason to believe that such were still the anticipations of the President in regard to the Northeastern boundary question.

Mr. B. said that on the present occasion he should purposely refrain from the expression of any opinion in regard to the case of the steamboat Caroline. This was rendered unnecessary by the fact that all the correspondence in relation to this subject, of any general importance, had already been published, and each Senator had the same means of forming an opinion which he himself enjoyed. There was no truth whatever in the rumor now so current, that there had been an angry correspondence between the British Minister and the Secretary of State since the date of the last correspondence between them, now before the public. There was no foundation for this rumor. It was true that, since that time, a single note, bearing upon this subject, had been addressed by Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth, which the latter had answered; but this note and answer were of so little importance, that he, Mr. B. did not deem it necessary to call for their publication, and their tone was far from being of an angry character.

Mr. CLAY of Ky. said, the most important point related to the adjustment of the Northeastern boundary, and in order to produce a definite settlement of that question, there had been proposals made for its reference to arbitration, as had been stated by the chairman, and the principles which should regulate a matter of that nature had been agreed to, with the exception of some comparatively unimportant point. With respect to the case of the Caroline, there had been some delay; and the Government had not received any satisfactory answer as to the fact whether that capture within our jurisdiction was by order of the Government of Great Britain. As to the case of McLeod, he was not very well informed about it. Whether there had been any communication between the Executive and the Governor of New York, he knew not; but his opinion was, that there ought to have been a request from the Secretary of State to the Government of New York, if they persevered in trying this man, that he be brought to a place where he can have a fair and impartial trial; and whatever should be the result of that trial, that his personal safety should be put beyond all question. But without any such request, a sense of propriety would prompt the Government of New York to take that course without suggestion from any quarter. He [Mr. CLAY] was in hopes the man would have a fair trial; and he hoped, as he always did, that the result of the evidence of that trial would be such as would satisfy the jury of the country of the innocence of the man, and that he would be acquitted. With respect to the captures on the coast of Africa, he took it that satisfactory explanations could be made, for the Government of Great Britain should understand that this country will not submit to the right of search, which was the cause of the last war. But the general character of our relations was such that, and from what he had heard and seen out of doors rather than from what had occurred in this and the other branch of Congress, his opinion was that they would not require any special mission whatever. The ordinary minister accredited to Great Britain, would be quite competent to the discharge of all the special duties that would devolve upon him. He would add further that in reference to the state of the relations between this country and Great Britain, he had not begun to think of the possibility of any immediate war with Great Britain. But while he said this, he hoped he would not be understood as saying that he hoped to avoid any preparation which might be necessary in the event of the assertion of our rights, or any pretensions, whatever quarter they might come from abroad. No; he looked upon the condition of our navy and the want of steam batteries, and the absence of all those floating means of defence, as matters of just and deep concernment; and he did hope they would have a very early and constant attention, that the country might be prepared for any possible emergency. He would close by repeating the expression of his hope, that there would be no immediate cause of war; and he believed both Governments were animated by a desire to preserve peace, which was so essential to the happiness of both.

The question was then taken on discharging the committee from the further consideration of the subject, and it was agreed to.

Mr. CUTHBERT rose and stated his purpose to be to place before the Senate the proofs in relation to the sentiments of Mr. WEBSTER in regard to the constitutional power of the Government over the transportation of slaves from one State to another.

Mr. PHELPS interposed a point of order, which was subsequently withdrawn, and a debate arose in which Messrs. CUTHBERT, PHELPS, KING, PRESTON, CLAY of Kentucky, RIVES, BUCHANAN, WALKER, and WRIGHT, participated; at the conclusion of which,

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate adjourned to meet again 5 o'clock this evening.

[EVENING SESSION.]

THE APPROPRIATION BILL.

On the motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate took up, as in committee of the whole, the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1841.

Mr. WRIGHT said the first question in order would be on the amendments proposed by the committee, and he hoped they would be acted on in their order. He then briefly explained the first amendment, which proposed to limit the fees of certain officers of the United States courts.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana opposed the introduction of fee bills into an appropriation bill: it was a subject, he thought, which required more deliberation than they were then able to bestow upon it.

Mr. PHELPS also advocated the passage of the usual appropriation bill, and the postponement of this question to a future occasion. He was of opinion many officers were too highly compensated; but then, within forty-eight hours of the close of the session, they could not give the subject the consideration it required.

Mr. BENTON was in favor of the limitation proposed to be placed on these fees and salaries. He was opposed to the whole idea of making fortunes out of the public service. He was willing to allow to every person employed by the Government a fair compensation for his service; he was willing to give the person employed by the year, as well as the day laborer, a fair and liberal remuneration for his time and service; but he scouted the whole idea of making fortunes out of offices. It is not for that purpose, said he, that offices were created. They were created for the public good, and not for individual emolument; and those who wanted fortunes should look for them elsewhere—should look for them in their own exertions, and in the pursuits of trade and business. No good had resulted to the public from these great salaries; on the contrary, the greatest defalcations had happened where the fees and salaries were greatest. The idea of getting rich suddenly too often led to speculations and adventures, which ended in the application of the public moneys to private uses; fair and reasonable compensation was all that ought to be allowed. Besides the inherent objection to extravagant salaries, and their tendency to lead officers into speculations and the use of the public money, there was another objection to them, arising from their tendency to increase the thirst for office, and to bring improper characters to apply for them. When a fortune is to follow office, the desire for it is increased. The most avaricious become the most clamorous. They devote themselves to its acquisition. They enter the field for the candidate from whom they expect reward. They spare no means, fair or foul, to elect him. If they succeed in the election, they go and demand a reward, as if they had been working for wages, and become dissatisfied if they do not get it. There is enough in the honors of office, and in the attractions of a reasonable salary, to bring sufficient heat and strife into our elections. There is no necessity for adding to these inducements by setting up fortunes to reward the exertions of political adventurers. There is no necessity to whet the appetites, or to stimulate the passions, or to increase the exertions of the office seeking corps. They are numerous enough, ardent enough, zealous enough in elections, and importunate enough after elections are over, without requiring the prize of a fortune to be added to the honors and ordinary emoluments of office. Such fees and salaries as those mentioned—twenty—forty—sixty—eighty thousand dollars—ought to be curtailed. They excite cupidity for office, lead to extravagance, are contrary to the frugal character of our Government, and tend to beget a sordid and mercenary spirit in our elections. The land office emoluments had all been limited in the new States; the custom-house, marshals, and others should be limited in the old States.

Mr. B. said the present was a suitable occasion to fulfil a promise which he had made a few days ago, in replying to some very disinterested and patriotic sentiments delivered by the Senator from South Carolina, on the opposite side of the chamber [Mr. Preston.] That Senator had then delivered very excellent sentiments in relation to removals from office—had denounced the spoils doctrine—had declared that proscription was itself to be proscribed—that henceforth there were to be no removals for opinion's sake—no faithful officer turned out to make room for a political friend—no changes except for misconduct—and that the new Administration, in all this, would the reverse of the present and the last passed. I took occasion upon the instant, (said Mr. B.) to correct that Senator, so far as the State of Missouri was concerned; and to let him know that proscription for opinion's sake had never been practised by the passed or present Administration in that State—that no removals had been made there except for cause—that many political opponents had been re-appointed to the offices which they had filled—that the spoils doctrine had never been practised upon there—that this was known to every body in Missouri, and should be known to every body here; and that he would take a suitable occasion to verify this statement by a reference to established facts. That occasion has now arrived, and I proceed to the fulfilment of my promise.

Premising that all the appointments made in Missouri during Mr. Adams's administration were from the ranks of his own political friends, and that most of those previously in office were of the same political character, I proceed to show, by facts, what was the conduct of the Jackson and Van Buren administrations with respect to them. I begin with the Indian Department—a large subject of Federal Executive patronage in that State. At the head of that department was General William Clark. He was the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, stationed at St. Louis, strong in the Opposition, and almost the last act of his life was to vote the whole Opposition ticket. He was not only not removed by General Jackson, but at the reorganization of the Indian Department in 1834, when he was legislated out of office, he was re-appointed by General Jackson, and remained in office till his death, about two years ago. After his death, the vacancy was filled by a gentleman of our politics, (Major Pilcher,) not for political services in the elections, but for pre-eminent fitness for the station. He had had nothing to do with the great political contest which terminated in General Jackson's election. He happened to be, during that period, some thousands of miles beyond the verge of civilization, engaged in the arduous pursuits of the fur trade; and the first news he received of General Jackson's election was about a year after the event, and through London newspapers, which had reached the head of the Columbia river, where he then was, by the way of Hudson's bay. He has held the place two years, and is better fitted for it than any man in America. I have known him for thirty years, and know what I say to be true. He is fitted for the station in every way—in judgment—in experience—in knowledge of the Indians and of the traders—in their confidence in him—in his quiet and firm temperament—in his age and habits—in his punctual attention to every duty—in his faithful application, and accounting for every dollar that goes to his hand.

Mr. John Dougherty, Indian agent on the Missouri, salary $1,800. He was a native of Kentucky, appointed by Mr. Adams, thoroughly in opposition, and complaint made against him for improper interference in an election, and was on the point of being dismissed by the Secretary at War, (Mr. Eaton) when, at my instance, the order was suspended until the complaint could be examined, and was ascertained to be unfounded. He served until 1834, when he was legislated out of office at the reorganization of the agencies. He was then re-appointed by President Jackson, served out the term of four years, was then re-appointed by President Van Buren, and resigned in 1839. He is now a member of the General Assembly of Missouri, and is as decidedly opposed to our party as any man in the State.

Major Taliaferro, Indian agent on the Upper Mississippi, salary $1,300 per annum. Not only was he not removed, but when legislated out of office in 1834, with other agents, he was re-appointed by General Jackson, at an increased salary, served his term of four years, was re-appointed by Mr. Van Buren, and held the place till he chose to resign. He was entirely opposed to us in politics.

Mr. P. L. Chouteau; he was appointed agent to the Osages by General Jackson, though of opposition politics, remained in office till 1834, when, at the reorganization of the agencies, his place was reduced to a sub-agency, and he declined to hold it any longer.

Mr. J. V. Hamilton; he was appointed successor to Major Dougherty in 1839, in the recess of Congress, and without the knowledge of the Missouri delegation. They would have objected to it if they had known it, but the appointment began made, they left it to run its course. He is now in office, and in opposition to us.

These, sir, are the principal appointments of the Indian Department in Missouri, and from this statement it is seen that, so far from being proscribed for opinion's sake, the Opposition nearly monopolized the Indian offices during the administrations of General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren.

I now proceed to the Land Offices, another considerable subject of Federal patronage in Missouri. In this branch of the public service, the head of the business, and one who had much patronage, was appointed by General Jackson, and served out a term of four years. This was Mr. Elias Langham, Surveyor General. He was not re-appointed, and that for good cause.

Major Christy, Register of the Land Office at St. Louis; he was twice re-appointed by General Jackson, and died in his office in the year 1837.

General Praitte, Receiver of Public Moneys at St. Louis, served out his term of four years, and was then succeeded by a gentleman of different politics.

Mr. John Hays, Receiver of Public Moneys at Cape Girardeau, was re-appointed by General Jackson, and saved from removal upon my interposition, at one time when he was deficient temporarily in making a deposit of public money.

Mr. Guild, a gentleman of opposition politics, was appointed successor to Mr. Hays, and served out four years.

In the Post Office Department, in Missouri, no removals have been made that I know of, except for cause. A majority of the post offices are now held by the Opposition, while they are themselves a minority of the State. The post office at St. Louis, the best office in the gift of the President in Missouri, was held eleven years and a half, under the Jackson and Van Buren administrations, by Mr. Wilson P. Hunt, a gentleman decidedly opposed to us in politics. He held the office near twenty years in all, of which more than half the time was under the Administrations to which he was opposed. He was not only not removed, but was re-appointed by General Jackson in 1836, when legislated out of office by the new post office law. He served out the four years term under this appointment, and was succeeded in July last by Mr. Thomas Watson, a gentleman of our political party. Of the twelve years which this important appointment was in our gift, eleven and a half of it saw it occupied by a gentleman opposed to us in politics, and only half a year has it been occupied by one of our own party. The present incumbent (Mr. Watson) was for twenty-five years postmaster at the most considerable town in North Carolina, (Newbern); he understands his duties, and performs them correctly. No man can impeach his conduct, public or private, or attribute to him aught that is wrong in word or deed. He has been a consistent Democrat forty years; a quiet, courteous, inoffensive man, of whom every one will speak well, except those who want his office.

Thus, sir, stands the account of proscription in Missouri, many of the best offices in the State being in the hands of the Opposition during their own pleasure, or until the expiration of their terms, and some of them ten and eleven years out of twelve. Certainly there were some removals; but they were few in number, fell nearly equally upon both parties, and were always for cause. Of three land officers removed, two were on our own side; of two marshals removed, one was on our own side; of two district attorneys either removed or not re-appointed, it was one and on each political party. In no case that I knew of, was there an instance of removal for the purpose of making room for a political friend, but for the purpose of getting rid of an improper officer. For myself, my uniform answer to all those who applied to have others removed, was that they must show misconduct. When that was not done, I refused to recommend the removal; and this is known to the whole State of Missouri.

Mr. B. said he could give other instances of political opponents retained in office in Missouri, but he had mentioned enough to comply with his promise, and to show, by facts, that proscription for opinion's sake had never been practised in that State—that it was a practice unknown there—and must originate with the new Administration, if it gets there at all. During the twelve years which the Democracy have borne sway, no appointments, or removals, have been made in Missouri, except for the public service; and he was proud to be able to say that they had been good appointments, and had promoted the public service. He looked with pride and satisfaction upon the conduct of the public officers in that State for twelve years past. It was an example to the whole Union. Great was the amount of public money collected and disbursed there—greater, perhaps, than at any point in the Union, except New York. The receipts of many land offices centred there; a great number of disbursing officers and agents received their supplies of money there; vast sums had been transferred from that point to New York; it was probable that twenty or thirty millions had been collected and distributed from that point in the last twelve years; and nothing had been lost to the Government. He believed there were no losses in all that time. All was well there; and if the new Administration practises on the professions which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Preston] has made, they will have no removals to make in that State. They can make none without violating those professions, and without commencing and introducing that system of proscription which we have avoided, and which they have denounced.

Mr. B. said that he felt himself at liberty to speak freely and disinterestedly on this subject. He had no relations in office to dread the removing power. During the twenty years that he had been in Congress, no relation of his had been appointed to office. He had uniformly discouraged and discountenanced applications for office, on the part of his relations. He had suffered no one of them to be appointed. Friends he had, in office, there, who are worthy of their places, and who cannot be removed without a violation of the principles which the Senator from South Carolina has proclaimed. If these principles are violated in the person of any of these friends, or in the person of any individual in Missouri, the party doing it must expect to hear of it, and to see their conduct confronted with their professions as well as with the examples of the Jackson and Van Buren administrations.

After a few words from Messrs. PHELPS, WALKER, and HENDERSON, the amendment of the committee was adopted.

And the amendment to the same clause, limiting the remuneration, by fees, of district attorneys, marshals, and clerks, after being debated by Messrs. WALKER, SEVIER, and WRIGHT, was also agreed to.

The next in order, was an amendment of the committee to the clause limiting the receipts of postmasters to $5,000 per annum, in the following terms: "Including salary, commissions, boxes, and all fees, perquisites, and emoluments, of any name."

or character whatsoever, and for any service whatsoever."

Mr. SOUTHARD objected to any interference with the arrangements of postmasters to accommodate individuals with boxes; by the use of boxes, individuals received their letters without detention; and so long as the postmasters afforded this accommodation, at a small remuneration for the extra trouble undertaken, and the expense of the boxes, he was opposed to any interference by the Government with such arrangement.

Mr. WRIGHT explained to the Senator from New Jersey the clause under discussion. The clause provided that three thousand dollars per annum should be paid to the postmaster for the accommodation of the public with boxes, which, added to the salary of $2,000, made the total of $5,000 per annum, which, he conceived, was a sufficient remuneration for any postmaster.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the question was whether $5,000 was not a sufficient remuneration for a postmaster. That point being settled, he proceeded to show that the use of boxes was advantageous, and a saving of trouble to the postmasters; and if the clause were adopted, he doubted not the number of boxes would be increased, and the sum paid for them reduced, for he never expected any surplus from this source to come to the public Treasury, and hence a larger number of business men would be benefited.

Mr. TALLMADGE opposed the clause at some length; and in the course of his remarks, he intimated that the subject was not understood by honorable Senators.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said when they gave the postmaster of New York $5,000 per annum, they gave him as much as they gave the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, whose qualifications must necessarily be of a much higher order. Why, they only gave $6,000 per annum to the heads of Departments here. He thought he understood this matter perfectly, and he trusted the Senate understood it, and that they would give the gentlemen who had been preaching "retrenchment" and "reform" so long, a proper start.

The debate was continued by Messrs. WHITE, PRESTON, LINN, and others.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, with a resolution for the suspension of the 16th joint rule, by which no bill could be received by one branch of Congress from the other during the last three days of the session, to which the assent of the Senate was asked.

On the motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the Senate concurred, and the navy appropriation and other bills were received and referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the President elect, informing the Senate that he will be ready to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution previously to entering on a discharge of his official duties, and at such place as the Senate may think proper to designate; which was read.

On motion by Mr. PRESTON the VICE PRESIDENT was directed to appoint a committee of three Senators to make the necessary arrangements for the reception and inauguration of the President elect, and to apprise him of the same; and Mr. PRESTON, Mr. BAYARD, and Mr. WHITE, were appointed the committee.

The Senate adjourned a few minutes past nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 1, 1841.

Mr. RUSSELL modified the resolution offered by him on Saturday, as follows:

Resolved, That hereafter the daily hour of meeting of this House shall be ten o'clock, a. m. and to-morrow, the time, from ten to twelve o'clock at noon, shall be devoted to the consideration of private bills from the Senate, in their regular order, in Committee of the Whole House; and on Wednesday next, the time from ten o'clock to twelve at noon, shall be devoted to the consideration of private bills from the Senate on the Speaker's table, if such length of time shall be required for that purpose.

The question being taken on the adoption of the resolution, it passed in the affirmative—ayes 111, noes 38.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. TILLINGHAST asked the unanimous consent of the House to present certain resolutions from the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, and that they be printed.

Objection being made,

Mr. TILLINGHAST moved a suspension of the rules in relation to the order of business: but the motion did not prevail.

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved that the House now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER stated that there was a special order for to-day—(the steamboat bills.)

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the special order was postponed until to-morrow.

The House then, on the motion of Mr. J. resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Dawson in the chair) and took up the bill making appropriations for certain FORTIFICATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES FOR THE YEAR 1841.

The bill having been read,

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina moved to strike out the words "thirty-five thousand" for repairs of Fort Independence, and insert in lieu thereof $90,000.

After some remarks from Mr. T. in support of his amendment, in which he contended that it was our imperative duty to provide for a more effectual defence,

Mr. JONES resisted the amendment. The bill submitted was intended to appropriate for the old works of the country which needed repair, and for the continuance of works now in progress. There was another large class of works which could not come into this bill. He admitted the importance of a work at the outlet at Lake Champlain; but as there was no law for it, it could not, under the rules of the House, be appropriated for. It was not in order to graft the provisions of other bills upon the general appropriation bill for fortifications. There were now unexpended appropriations to the amount of nearly a million of dollars. The amount at last session was $712,897; at the present session $439,500; making in all $1,152,397, of which $926,000 remained unexpended.

Mr. THOMPSON appealed to Mr. J. to take up the bill from the Committee on Military Affairs, which covered the entire ground of the present bill, and added other works necessary.

Mr. JONES said that the bill appropriated $1,700,000 to fortifications; could it be expected such a bill should get through without protracted debate? It must cut off all other business. To the present bill no serious objection would be made. Let this pass, and then let the gentleman bring up his bill. The appropriations in this bill were sufficient to keep the works going till the middle of the following year; it had not reduced the estimates of the Department one dollar.

Mr. J. inquired if this amendment, being an item contained in another bill before the House, was in order?

The CHAIR decided that it was; it did not propose to engraft another bill on this bill.

Mr. HUNT made some remarks in favor of laying aside the present bill, and taking up that from the Military Committee.

After some remarks from Mr. FILLMORE,

Mr. THOMPSON withdrew the amendment.

Mr. CROSS moved to amend by inserting an appropriation of $50,000 for Fort Wayne, but the CHAIR decided that it would not be then in order.

Mr. SMITH of Maine moved to amend the bill by inserting $6,600 for Forts Preble and Scammel, in Portland harbor. Mr. S. referred to the report from the Department, showing that these works were going to ruin for want of a small appropriation, and he appealed to the justice of the House in favor of his amendment. The Committee of Ways and Means had taken good care of Boston harbor and the Gulf of Mexico, but seemed to have forgotten that the whole coast of Maine was exposed, while Halifax, the only northern depot of the British navy, was within a day's sail of every part of it.

Our fishermen were continually insulted. Here he yielded the floor at the request of Mr. THOMPSON, who said he would state a fact that would supersede the gentleman's speech. This sum had been appropriated at the last session, and remained unexpended.

Mr. SMITH said that that statement would apply to many items of the bill as well as the item for Portland harbor.

Mr. JONES explained. The application of this money had only been suspended. The appropriation was still binding, as much so as if now passed over again.

Mr. SMITH warmly urged the defenceless state of the coast of Maine, on which, though two hundred and fifty miles in length, not a single gun was mounted. The State last year cleared 140,000 tons of shipping from those undefended ports of hers. Her commerce employed 6,000 men. Portland alone owned 46,000 tons of shipping, and her imports were $192,000. True, there was a small appropriation made last year, but he was opposed to leaving its expenditure to the mere discretion of the President. The chairman said this bill was for old works. Well, if so, there were few works in the country older than those of Portland harbor.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON said, he was not opposed to defence by fortification, but it was utterly useless to erect new ones, and then leave them unarmed. Scarce one was at this moment fully equipped with ordnance. If gentlemen would incorporate a provision for arming the forts, Mr. J. would go as far as he that went furthest in supporting such a measure. Here were $400,000 asked to repair forts already built. He would glance for a moment at the present supply of ordnance in the country. He here went into a statement showing that, for forts already completed, 1,178 cannon were needed, while those under construction would need 2,578; all these were absolutely requisite to render the present bill of the least possible utility. 782 more would be needed for forts building and repairing, and 3,506 for works projected by the Board of Engineers; besides 5,283 to complete the defences of our coast. He made these statements on the authority of the War Department. How many cannon did we now possess? The fact would astonish every man. We had but 30 battering cannon, 42 pounders; 60 in depot, 42 pounders; 38 more under contract. Of other pieces, we had but 144. He then adverted to the improvements in gunnery in the throwing of hollow shot, and the adoption and perfection of this improvement by foreign nations. As to shells and balls, we stood in immediate need of 3,020,941 more than we now possessed. By the use of these hollow shot, fortifications had been in a few hours blown up and destroyed which had defied whole navies for centuries. Mr. J. urged the propriety and necessity of placing our entire coast in a state of defence. He was the last man to desire a state of war; but he held that the best way to avoid collision with England was to be prepared to meet her; and so with all foreign powers. He would urge this necessity even were the peace of the world the most profound; how much more pressing was it under circumstances like the present. It was due to the national honor to sustain the Executive in negotiations under our intricate relations, with a foreign power.

Mr. J. concluded by moving to lay aside the bill now before the committee, to take up the bill from the Committee on Military Affairs, with a view to move an amendment to it empowering the President of the United States to purchase a site for a foundry, and to enter into contracts for the requisite ordnance.

Mr. PICKENS rose for the purpose of disabusing the minds of the committee in relation to a rumor which he was astonished to find was in existence, in relation to the case of McLeod. When he came into the hall, to his great astonishment he found that a rumor was in circulation, and had been alluded to in debate, that an angry correspondence had taken place between Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Fox, in relation to the imprisonment of McLeod. It was with pleasure, therefore, he stated that he received information from the most authentic source, that there was no foundation for such a rumor. There had been no correspondence calculated in any way to produce any more difficulty than previously existed. It was true that correspondence had taken place, but it was so unimportant as not to be deemed necessary to communicate it to either branch of Congress. He conceived it highly important that this explanation should be received, as he hoped the committee would not legislate under a false impression. No correspondence had taken place which was calculated to vary the position of the parties since the correspondence which had last been presented to the House. These false rumors had been alluded to from several quarters of the House, and were calculated to produce unsound legislation.

Mr. P. then proceeded to say that he hoped the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means would be adopted speedily.

The general system of fortification demanded by gentlemen, required a practical knowledge before all its bearings could be known; and he would take occasion to say, that when the next Administration came into power, let them propose a general system as a whole—a system of defence for all the points of the country; and if it should be a system that his judgment could approve, he would pledge himself that he would not stop to ask what was the miserable amount of revenue that might be derived from a tax on wines or silks, but he would cheerfully vote an amount equal to the whole proceeds of wines and silks imported, if the next Administration should deem it requisite and proper for the defence of the country by any new contingency.

Mr. P. went on to contend that no system of land fortification could possibly answer, unless it should be connected at various points with the navy. It would be utterly impossible to protect our extensive coast, unless a proper connection was had with a naval force. Take central and leading points, which can protect and sustain your naval defences, suited to our extensive coast of 2,000 miles. It is steam batteries and steamships that can give you defence suited to the improvements of the age.

Mr. P. contended that our present system of fortifications was utterly unsuitable for the present wants of the country. The system had been partially brought from France in 1816, and, since the introduction of steam power, was to a great extent inapplicable to our extensive territory and sparse population.

In answer to a question from Mr. MONROE, as to what was the system brought from France,

Mr. PICKENS explained its nature, and said it was principally carried through by General Bernard, distinguished in France and in this country; and again urged that it was a system, now, since the introduction of steam power, as totally inapplicable for the defence of a country with such an extensive coast as ours. Mr. P. then said how he would connect the land fortifications with the naval force. He would, he said, establish points at the following places, where the forts could co-operate with the navy; he would take a central point between the St. Croix and Cape Cod; and then New York and the mouth of the Chesapeake between Cape Cod and Cape Hatteras; and then between Hatteras and Cape Florida, he would fortify Charleston and the mouth of the Savannah river; and then between Cape Florida and the Sabine he would fortify Pensacola and the mouths of the Mississippi; he would have all these points well fortified to protect and sustain an efficient system of naval defences suited to your extensive sea-coast and commerce. As to the interior points of fortification, and those of smaller grades, he would discard them—he looked upon them as behind the age.

But, said Mr. P. any other system of fortification confined exclusively to land, will prove a miserable failure.

In answer to another interrogatory, Mr. P. observed that it would be folly to think that England would ever think of invading us again from the Canadas. England could have no object in attempting a permanent invasion on that frontier. The case now and at the last war in 1812, was widely different. In 1812 that portion of the country on the lake frontier was thinly populated, and had but little connection with the Atlantic cities. Owing to its defenceless position, the consequence was that the British formed their plan of invasion of the lake coast, with a view to connect a military cordon through the interior to New Orleans, and cut off the Valley of the Mississippi from the Atlantic States. They had some prospects of succeeding at that period—hence the invasion was there. But now the case was widely different. That part of the country was now densely populated, and with a population, too, decidedly warlike and spirited to the highest degree, so that now it would be madness on the part of Great Britain to attempt an invasion in that quarter. She could gain nothing by it; but the danger would be the reverse, and the invasion would be from this country upon Canada if a rupture should take place, which he trusted would not occur; and he believed it would not. What I mean to say, continued Mr. P. is, let the next Administration, when it comes into power, propose a proper system of fortification—a system embracing the improvements of the age, and calculated to meet the wants of the country—and I will go with them to the utmost. I will not only go for a tax on wines and silks, but I will most cordially, when the proper time shall arrive, give them my support, if any serious difficulty should arise to call for it. I will, then, at a proper time, vote for all they may want. But I hold that this is not the proper time, and I protest against this system, of legislating by piecemeal, and without proper information, and unconnected with a system as a whole, suited to the wants of the country. If any serious difficulty should arise between us and a foreign power, (which he hoped would not be the case,) let the Administration call Congress together, and we will meet the issues as a free people ought. Let those who are to execute laws, and conduct negotiations in the future, take that course that patriotism may dictate, and there can be no difficulty.

After some remarks from Messrs. TILLINGHAST and CUSHING,

Mr. ANDERSON said he proposed to offer an amendment to the amendment of his colleague in the following words: For the repair of forts at Wiscasset, Damariscotti, Castine, and Eastport, the sum of three thousand dollars each, unless his colleague would accept this amendment as a modification of his own, providing an appropriation for the repair of Forts Preble and Scammel.

Mr. SMITH having so modified his proposition as to include the first named works,

Mr. ANDERSON remarked that he went with pleasure for the amendment as it now stood, and only regretted that he was prevented by the rules of the House from including in his amendment an appropriation for the commencement of a fortification greatly more important than any he had named, and one which had received the most favorable recommendation from the Corps of Engineers and the Department of War; he alluded to a fortification at the mouth of Penobscot river, opposite Bucksport. Mr. A. said he had now in his drawer an amendment appropriating fifty thousand dollars for the commencement of this important work, which he intended to offer should the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, to lay aside the present bill and take up that reported by him, prevail; and in reference to that bill, Mr. A. could not refrain from expressing his surprise, that this necessary work should have been omitted. Mr. A. read from the report of the War Department, upon the national defences, communicated at the last session, showing the importance of this work, and an estimate of its cost from the corps of engineers; and in the table appended to that report, Mr. A. showed that it was not only in the table of works to be first commenced, but the very first in that class, and he was astonished that the committee, who professed to be governed by the recommendation and estimates of the Department, should have wholly omitted this work. Mr. A. went into some particulars, showing the great importance of this fortification, as affording a refuge in time of war for the extension and growing commerce of Penobscot Bay and River, a commerce increasing with rapid strides, and which promises to surpass that of any other section of the State.

The bill reported by the Military Committee is singular in other respects, and anxious as he was to provide for the national defences, he should feel compelled, by a sense of duty to the State he had the honor in part to represent, to vote against it, unless considerably amended. Nearly three hundred thousand dollars are appropriated in that bill for the harbor of Boston, and the pitiful sum of twenty-five thousand dollars for the whole State of Maine—a State having three hundred miles of sea coast, and which is now utterly defenceless. His colleague had well and truly described the defenceless condition of our maritime and interior frontier, and he hoped that when the fortification bill, reported by the Military Committee, should come up, the amendment he should offer would receive the favorable consideration of the House. Mr. A. said he went in opposition to many of his friends, for the proposed increase to the naval appropriation, and he did so the more willingly, as it contained a provision for the building of steam vessels of a medium size, which, in case of war, may, in some small degree, supply the want of land fortifications, of which his own State was so totally destitute, and he was desirous to support any reasonable and equal proposition for a general system of frontier and maritime defences.

Mr. A. desired to say more in relation to this subject—a subject in which his own constituents, and the whole State, were deeply interested, but would not at this late period of the session further detain the committee.

Mr. VANDERPOEL opposed the idea of laying aside the regular bill from the committee, under the sanction of the Departments, and taking up another from a different committee, proposing larger, much larger, appropriations for a magnificent system of fortification. He was as much awake to the necessity for defence as any man; but other considerations were to be looked at. Here doctors disagreed: some held that the immense sums we had spent on these forts were thrown away; that, in spite of all the millions appropriated, the country was defenceless, and a single frigate might capture the city of New York! Instead of a new system for forts, his plan was entirely different. Every few days we had a war humbug to authorize the picking of the people's pockets. This very morning he had heard about a most angry correspondence between Mr. Fox and Mr. Forsyth.

His plan was to appropriate only for forts already begun, and then to appoint a commission to report on the point whether these forts were or were not worthy of being relied on.

Mr. THOMPSON replied that this very thing had been done. In May, 1840, a most luminous report had been rendered by some of the ablest military men in this country or in any other, going to show that the new inventions in gunnery and steam navigation rendered works like those now proposed by the Military Committee more needed than ever. He trusted he should hear no more of these wild and unfounded assertions by men unacquainted with military science.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he was a man of peace, and professed not to "speak of war in the presence of Hannibal." But he must object to a magnificent bill at a time when gentlemen were proclaiming that the country was exhausted, and on the brink of ruin. Mr. V. here went back to the history of the distribution bill, when gentlemen, instead of applying our surplus to the defence of the country, divided it among the States. But now, when they saw the country was fainting, and almost dying, gentlemen's patriotism was vivid as the lightning. He was glad, however, to find that the fears of war were disclaimed on every side. Why, then, tax a people ground down by the mal-administration of these dreadful Locos? He protested against it, and washed his hands of it.

Mr. FILLMORE, in the course of his remarks, asked the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [Mr. PICKENS] whether his declaration this morning, that there was no foundation for the rumor about an angry correspondence on the subject of McLeod, was not inconsistent with what the gentleman had told him a few minutes previous.

Mr. PICKENS explained that what he had first said in private conversation to the gentleman, was owing to the rumor prevailing when he (Mr. P.) came into the hall. But subsequently he despatched a messenger for information, and it was on that subsequent information that he had made the public statement to the House.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. FILLMORE, MONROE, and POPE, until half past two o'clock, when the House took its usual recess.

[EVENING SESSION.]

After the recess,

Mr. POPE resumed and concluded his remarks.

Mr. HAND followed, and at some length spoke in favor of substituting the bill from the Military Committee for that from the Committee of Ways and Means. A full report of his remarks will be given hereafter.

After some remarks from Mr. JAMESON,

Mr. STARKWEATHER took the floor, and in some sarcastic remarks, which convulsed the hall with laughter, denounced the idea of any fear of a war, now that an "eternal hero" was coming into power. The Reporter took full notes, which will be written out as early as practicable.

After inserting additional items of appropriation, the committee rose and reported it to the House, with three small amendments, which were agreed to, and the bill was forthwith passed under the operation of the previous question.

An effort was then made to take up the bill from the Senate to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia; pending which

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, March 2, 1841.

Mr. WALL presented the credentials of the Hon. JACOB W. MILLER, elected by the Legislature of New Jersey a Senator from that State for six years from the 4th of March next; which were read, and ordered on file.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, the Committee on Naval Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of all subjects heretofore referred to them and unacted on.

Similar motions were made by Mr. WALKER, of the Committee on Public Lands; by Mr. WRIGHT, of the Committee on Finance; by Mr. YOUNG, of the Committee on Roads and Canals; and by Mr. LUMPKIN, of the Committee on Manufactures; which were agreed to.

Mr. BENTON submitted a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Board of Ordnance Officers who have recently visited Europe for objects connected with their profession; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KNIGHT, from the Committee on Contingent Expenses, to which the subject had been referred, reported the resolution allowing additional compensation to the assistant doorkeeper, and to the messengers, pages, and laborers of the Senate, and of the office of the Secretary of the Senate, which he asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider at the present time.

Objection being made, the resolution lays over one day.

Mr. YOUNG moved that a document in relation to certain citizens of Illinois of the sect called Mormons, be printed, and made some remarks in explanation of his motion, and, after some remarks in reply by Mr. LINN, who denied the jurisdiction of Congress in this matter, and by Messrs. KING and WALKER on the impropriety of discussing this matter at all, on motion by the latter, the motion to print was laid on the table—ayes 22, noes 12.

Mr. WRIGHT then moved that the Senate go into the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and urged the necessity, from the little time left, to act upon it at once. The motion was withdrawn at the request of

Mr. BENTON, for the purpose of making a report from the Committee on Military Affairs, which he said would take but a few minutes.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the memorials on the subject of a fortification at Sillers Point Flats, made a report, which he asked might be printed.

In reply to a question of Mr. PRESTON, Mr. B. said the report concluded with a resolution requesting the views of the Administration about coming into power on the subject of a general plan of defence of the country. The resolution was precisely similar in its terms to those which had been formerly passed on the subject.

Mr. PRESTON wished to offer an amendment to the resolution, but was informed by the CHAIR that it was not in order, the report not now being before the Senate.

Mr. P. then said, that on the question of printing, he would take occasion to express some opinions on this subject, and then proceeded at considerable length, in the course of his remarks, alluding to the defenceless condition of the country, and charging the present and preceding Administrations with culpable neglect on this subject.

Mr. HUBBARD and Mr. BENTON rose simultaneously, but the PRESIDENT gave the floor to the Senator from New Hampshire, who moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. BENTON assured honorable gentlemen he was not going to lay the foundation for an extra session by talking out this day, and defeating the appropriation bills—by making speeches to the galleries, or to any body else—but as to the statements of the Senator on the other side [Mr. PRESTON] he gave them as peremptory a contradiction as the rules of parliamentary order would allow; and when the proper time came, he would furnish his proofs.

Mr. PRESTON, much excited, rose while Mr. BENTON was speaking, and called for the proofs of the Senator from Missouri; and said speeches addressed to the galleries came not exclusively from his side of the Senate Chamber.

Mr. BENTON reiterated his intention not to consume the day by addresses to the galleries, but he assured the Senator from South Carolina the proofs should be forthcoming at the proper time.

The Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Missouri, continued the reiteration of similar observations, and much excitement existed in the Senate Chamber, from every part of which were heard cries of "order, order." Ultimately the Senators resumed their seats, and the motion was laid on the table, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEVIER said he had nothing more to say on the subject just disposed of, than to inform the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] that when the army bill came before the Senate, he would give him an opportunity of acting out his opinions. He would not ask him for a speech on that occasion, but would be satisfied with his vote. Mr. S. said his object now was to report back, without amendment, the following bills from the House, which had been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, viz:

An act making an appropriation to defray the expenses of a delegate of the Seminole Indians west of the Mississippi river to Florida, and for other purposes.

An act making an appropriation for the temporary support of certain destitute Kickapoo Indians, and to defray the expense of subsisting and removing the Swan creek and Black river Indians of Michigan.

Mr. WRIGHT then inquired if it was in order to move to take up the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1841.

The VICE PRESIDENT answered in the affirmative.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then I make that motion, and I give notice that I will not withdraw it.

The bill above named was then taken up, and the question being on the amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance, they were concurred in without opposition.

Mr. HENDERSON then proposed an amendment relative to the compensation of officers in the federal courts, which was opposed by Mr. WRIGHT, and disagreed to—Ayes 5, noes 24.

The amendments next in order were those offered by Mr. ANDERSON, the first of which proposed to make it obligatory on every collector of customs, naval officer, and surveyor, to render a quarterly account of all sums of money received or collected for fines, penalties, forfeitures, or seizures of goods, or on account of suits instituted for frauds against the revenue laws, &c. &c. and to limit the remuneration of the collector to $6,000, the naval officer to $5,000, and the surveyor to $4,500.

Mr. PRENTISS spoke in favor of the amendment.

Mr. CALHOUN said he always heard the Senator from Vermont with the greatest attention, and he responded to every word that Senator had now uttered. He (Mr. CALHOUN) should be glad to see this Government brought back to its original simplicity; and he trusted the time had now come to bring these officers down. If they wished to allay the excitement of their Presidential contests, this was the time, and this the way to do it; for so long as these tempting prizes were put in the wheel, the excitement would continue. Gentlemen opposite had intimated a disposition to put the country in a posture of defence, in which he concurred, and he should be glad to see it done systematically; and he begged to call the attention of honorable gentlemen to the fact, that every dollar they saved from these officers would be so much added to their means to put the country in a state of defence. But, at the same time, he took occasion to say, he should not enter into any scheme of defence, unless some general principles were settled by eminent military and naval officers: when this was done, he was prepared, and should be on all occasions, to advance in a course of systematic policy, and to place this country where it ought to stand among the nations of the earth.

Mr. ANDERSON said, that he should be gratified, under proper circumstances, to enter into the discussion of the whole subject, but the time of the Senate was precious, and he would confine himself strictly to a very brief statement of the objects of the amendment. He had conferred with several of his friends in relation to that part of it which comprehended fines, penalties, and forfeitures, and, with a view to obviate any reasonable objection, he had struck it out altogether, although he believed that it would be proper to modify the existing laws even in that respect. The main object of the amendment was, to curtail the vast salaries now received by the collectors, naval officers, and surveyors, and to put into practical operation the law of 1822. This, he said, was but carrying out the purpose contemplated by that; and had been suggested by the recent developments in New York, in regard to the late collector of that port. There was but a single item in this which was not to be found, in truth, within the intention of the act of 1822. The terms of limitation used in that were designed to cover the whole salary of those officers, as then fixed; but it seems that there has been a material departure from the objects expressed in the law, and in conformity with the principle laid down in a recent decision of one of the circuit courts of the United States, the collector of New York claims a large sum of public money. This amendment, he said, gave the most ample salaries to the officers referred to, and provides against impositions, such as have been practised upon the Government heretofore. There was but a single item, as he had stated, that of storage, which was not comprehended by the act of 1822. The manner in which that had been made a source of large income, particularly in the city of New York, was highly reprehensible, and this amendment in that regard, is intended to remedy the evil by subjecting it to legal regulation. He said, he trusted that the amendments would meet with the general support of Senators as the means of reform.

In conclusion, he would ask for the ayes and noes on his amendment.

The amendment was then adopted—ayes 40, noes 0, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Choate, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dixon, Fulton, Graham, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Mangum, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholson, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—40.

Three other amendments, proposed by Mr. ANDERSON, were also adopted; the first providing that all stores hereafter rented by the collector, naval officer, or surveyor, shall be on public account; the second, that false swearing by either of the above mentioned officers, on taking the oath at the rendition of his accounts, shall be deemed perjury, and be prosecuted as such; and the last, that all laws inconsistent with the fifth, sixth, and seventh sections of this act, should be thereby repealed.

Mr. TAPPAN next submitted his amendment, providing that the Librarian of Congress should be authorized to employ an additional assistant at a yearly compensation of $1,150, commencing December 1, 1841, which was agreed to, and the amount here granted was deducted from the sum of $4,085, appropriated as contingent and other expenses of the library.

Mr. KNIGHT withdrew an amendment which he had offered; his object, he said, having been accomplished in an amendment of the Committee on Finance, which had been adopted.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in, and the bill as amended was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Commerce, reported the bill making appropriations for the improvement of the harbors on the Northern and Northwestern lakes, with various amendments: the report accompanying the bill was ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1841.

The amendments of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which augmented the appropriations for the several navy yards to the estimates of the Navy Department; which were agreed to.

Mr. WALL proposed as an amendment an appropriation of $10,000 to maintain, under the control of the Secretary of the Navy, two of Francis's lifeboats, to be stationed at Rockaway, N. Y. and Long Branch, N. J. which was agreed to—ayes 18, noes 17.

Mr. TALLMADGE proposed an amendment appropriating $3,000 for house-rent for the commandants of the navy yards at Philadelphia and Brooklyn; which was disagreed to.

Mr. PRESTON proposed an amendment appropriating a sum of money for defraying the expenses of transporting to Washington the objects of natural history collected by the Exploring Expedition.

After some remarks from Mr. SEVIER in opposition, and Messrs. WALKER and TAPPAN in favor of the amendment—

Mr. KING would go so far as to vote an appropriation to transmit these articles to this city if they were to be placed in the Patent Office, but he would go no further, if it were intended afterwards to appoint a committee to attend to them, or to erect a place in which they should be kept.

Mr. PRESTON said there was a large room in the Patent Office which that Department would not require for some years, and he therefore thought that would be the proper plan in which these things should be preserved until some arrangement could be made by which they could be made beneficial to the country.

Mr. CALHOUN said, in matters of this description, which were likely to involve other expenditures, great caution was necessary, and he should vote against the amendment.

Mr. LINN thought it was possible to exercise too much caution; he should desire to see an anatomy, as it were, of this great country, thus collected, and he believed the Patent Office was the proper place, which had been contemplated when that building was erected.

The amendment was then adopted—ayes 23, noes 16.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendments made as in committee of the whole were concurred in, except one offered by Mr. WALL making an appropriation of $10,000 for the estaishment of life boats at Rockaway, in the State of New York, and at Long Branch, in the State of New Jersey.

Mr. HENDERSON then moved an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, for the purpose of increasing the number of stations from 2 to 9, at various points of the extensive seaboard of this country, and the appropriation from $10,000 to $50,000.

Mr. NORVELL offered an additional amendment for the establishment of various similar establishments on the lakes.

Mr. SEVIER likewise submitted an amendment for the establishment of life-boat stations on numerous points of the Ohio river.

Mr. WALL said it was obvious these amendments were offered for the purpose of destroying the bill; and if the honorable Senator thought the lives of our sailors were worthy of the proposed appropriations for the trial of such an experiment, they would vote for the reconsideration of the amendment. He had offered the amendment in good faith; for he deemed the safety of the lives of our seamen required it.

Mr. BUCHANAN reminded the Senate that their sand was almost run, and that to-morrow, without a suspension of the rules, no appropriation bill could be sent to the President. They could not, by any possibility, do much more business; but if they passed much time in debate, they could not do that. When he was in Congress some years ago, it was understood that nothing should be introduced into an appropriation bill beyond that which was necessary to carry into effect existing systems, and that nothing new should be introduced. He hoped nothing would be added to this bill beyond that principle, and that the Senator from New Jersey would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WALL defended his amendment, and said he was influenced by no local feeling in offering it.

Mr. KING hoped the Senator from New Jersey would withdraw his amendment, that the Senate might proceed with its business.

Mr. HENDERSON consented to withdraw his amendment, but

Mr. WALL refused to withdraw the amendment which he had proposed; and he asked for the ayes and noes thereon.

The amendment was negatived—ayes 12, noes 26.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

On the motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the bill making appropriations for civil and diplomatic services of the year, was read a third time and passed.

The bill making appropriations for the support of certain Indians, after being considered as in committee of the whole, was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time, as was also the bill making appropriations to defray the expenses of a delegation of Seminole Indians from Arkansas to Florida in attempting to effect a pacification of the of the Florida Indians; and the bills were passed.

The bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1841, was taken up as in committee of the whole, and several amendments were made thereto, on the motion of Mr. BENTON—one for an additional appropriation of $25,000 for the purchase of a site, and the building of an arsenal at Charleston, S. C. and another adding $60,000 to the sum of $300,000 mentioned in the bill as the appropriation for armories. He said $360,000 was the usual appropriation, and $300,000 only had been inserted in the bill, on the mistaken supposition that there was a surplus of $60,000 in the Treasury.

Mr. SEVIER moved an appropriation to complete certain military roads, and he hoped he should have the support of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] who had manifested such a desire to put the country in a proper state of defence.

The amendment was debated by Messrs. SEVIER, CALHOUN, LINN, ANDERSON, FULTON, WRIGHT, LUMPKIN, and WALKER, and was then negatived—ayes 18, noes 22.

Another amendment, offered by Mr. SEVIER, making an appropriation of $25,000 for the removal of the raft on Red river, was adopted.

Mr. KING proposed an appropriation of $20,000 for a marine hospital at Mobile; which was not adopted.

Mr. PORTER proposed an appropriation of $6,000 to defray the expense of surveying and designating the boundary line between Michigan and Wisconsin; which was debated by Messrs. WRIGHT, LINN, KING, CLAY of Alabama, and PORTER, and was opposed on the ground on which some previous amendments had been rejected, that it was not a proper appendage to the army bill.

The bills considered in committee of the whole, were severally read a third time, and passed.

Mr. WRIGHT reported from the Committee on Finance, without amendment, an act making appropriations for certain fortifications, which was considered as in committee of the whole, read a third time, and passed; and

The Senate then took a recess until 5 o'clock.

IN SENATE,
TUESDAY, March 2, 1841.
[EVENING SESSION.]

On motion by Mr. ROBINSON, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, was discharged from the consideration of all subjects heretofore referred to them, and unacted on.

The bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1841, was then taken up, the question being on agreeing to an appropriation for running the boundary line between Michigan and Wisconsin; which was agreed to, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The motion of Mr. WALKER to reconsider the vote by which the bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the year 1841 was ordered to be engrossed, was then taken up.

This proposition gave rise to an animated debate; the contested point being the provision to set apart the country west of the 19th degree of longitude in perpetuity for Indian settlement, Mr. SEVIER, Mr. CLAY of Alabama, and Mr. KING, in the affirmative, on the ground of the impropriety of confining the location of these Indians to the frontier of Arkansas and Missouri, and Mr. WALKER, Mr. TAPPAN, Mr. WHITE, Mr. ALLEN, Mr. BENTON, Mr. YOUNG, and Mr. WRIGHT, in the negative. The reconsideration was carried—ayes 31, noes 12, and the provision was stricken out.

Mr. SEVIER then moved to reconsider the appropriations for Indian treaties. In his opinion, there was no propriety of making treaties for the removal of the Indians, when you had not a foot of soil to put them on when you had removed them.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. WHITE moved to amend by adding $5,000 for the expenses of the Miami treaty in November last, which was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Register of the Treasury, in relation to the annual statement of commerce and navigation; which was laid on the table, and two thousand extra copies of the annual statement ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a comparative statement of the condition of the public defences by land and water, and of all the preparations and means of defence, on the first day of January, 1829, and on the first day of January, 1841; together with a comparative statement of the actual and authorized strength of the army of the United States on the same days.

Mr. PRESTON objected to its consideration, and it lies over.

The bill making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Indian tribes, for the year 1841, was read a third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT then rose, and addressed the Senate as follows:

Yesterday I intimated to the Senate that I should, some time during the session of this day, feel it my duty to retire from my seat, for the purpose of giving the Senate an opportunity of selecting a presiding officer, for the convenience of organization on the 4th of March; and I have selected this moment for that purpose, and to separate the official ties which have existed between myself and the members of this body for the last four years. I have much doubted the propriety of making any remarks on this occasion. What I say, therefore, shall be very brief, because the time would not permit, nor would it be proper for me to give utterance to all that my feelings suggest.

In taking my leave of the members of this body, language is inadequate to express the feelings which agitate my bosom. I have been associated with a very great majority of the members of the Senate, not only here during the last four years, but for many years, in the councils of our common country; and it has been my great happiness, during that period, whatever diversity of opinion or sentiment has existed between me and my political friends on minor points, or between me and those from whom I differ on points of greater magnitude, to know that my personal relations with them have ever been kind and tender. I was elected to the place I occupy by an equal vote of the Electoral College, and by a majority of the votes of the Senate, after having served my country for the term of thirty-two years—two years in my native State as a member of its Legislature, and thirty years in the Congress of the United States, either as a member of the House of Representatives or as a member of the Senate; and in the discharge of the labors and toils which devolved upon me in this chair—humble as was the attempt to discharge them faithfully—my station has been rendered pleasant and agreeable; and I must not omit to say that whatever momentary agitation or excitement in debate may have interrupted the harmony and quiet and order of the body, I can declare, with truth and with candor, that such has been the generous, the magnanimous course of the individual members of the body, and particularly such has been their indulgence towards me, who never studied the rules of order technically, that my station here has been rendered pleasant and agreeable. And if, in the discharge of my official duties, I have ever failed to gain your approbation or to meet your acquiescence in the course I have pursued, it has always arisen, not from any want of inclination, but from a want of ability on my part to have formed them better. It has been my constant endeavor to act with perfect impartiality towards the members of this body. I viewed each Senator as the representative of a sovereign and independent State, and as entitled to equal consideration from me. The place from which I am about to retire, will be occupied by a distinguished citizen of Virginia, who has been called by the voice of the people to this station; and I should not do justice to myself if I did not say that I retire from it without the least dissatisfaction; for, humble as have been my services to my country, I have been devoted to the great radical and fundamental principle of submission to the voice of the people when constitutionally expressed.

I now return to you, one and all, my grateful acknowledgments for the kindness and friendship which have always been extended towards me, and wish you all well, whatever destiny may attend you. And when I am far distant from you—as time must separate us all even here, not to speak of hereafter—as long as I shall have my recollection to remember the associations which I have had with this body, I shall always be animated by the sentiment of kindness and friendship with which I take my final leave of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT having retired, and the chair being occupied by Mr. HUBBARD, Mr. MANGUM submitted the following resolution for the consideration of the Senate:

Resolved unanimously, That the thanks of the Senate are due and are hereby tendered to RICHARD M. JOHNSON, the President of the Senate, for the dignity and impartiality with which he has presided over its deliberations.

The resolution having been read by the Secretary,

Mr. MANGUM said: I do not know, sir, that it will be out of place in me to rise in this Senate, on this occasion, to notice the conduct of our presiding officer, for I have had the honor of a personal acquaintance with that gentleman for many years past; and though it has been my misfortune, during a great portion of that time, to take different views on great political questions, I apprehend that I, in common with the great portion of the body of the people of the United States, can entertain but one sentiment respecting the kindness and excellence of his personal character; for his kindness, his generosity, his magnanimity, have placed him high in the estimation of every good man, without respect to political distinctions. I but give vent to my unaffected feelings of respect on this occasion, yet I should not have arisen and obtruded myself in advance of others, but for the consideration that it would proceed with a better grace from one who has taken different views, but whose private opinion of that distinguished man has never been impaired. I therefore move the unanimous adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said: I rise, sir, with peculiar satisfaction to second the motion of my friend near me. Perhaps that motion should have proceeded from myself, as one of the representatives of the State from which that gentleman comes. I should most undoubtedly have made such a motion, if it had not been made by the Senator from North Carolina; but I am happy that my friend has thought proper to offer this resolution. Sir, without meaning to refer at all to those great questions of national policy on which it is my misfortune to differ from the VICE PRESIDENT, who has just retired from the chair, I bear a willing testimony to his worth. He possesses that which I consider as one of the best qualities of our nature—an excellence of heart, and a kindness of disposition and of feeling towards all our common race. And in relation to the station he has filled, I can bear, as I do, with equal pleasure, this further testimony, that, on all occasions, he has evinced a perfect impartiality; and I have been able to judge, in the discharge of his duties, a quality amongst the first, if not the very first, to be possessed by the presiding officer of any deliberative body. Sir, he has been distinguished, both in the field and the cabinet of his country; and wherever he has been known, he has been esteemed and beloved for his patriotism, for his worth, and for his kindness of heart; and I hope, in the retirement which he is about to enter, he may continue to enjoy that felicity which should be ever felt and experienced by those who, whatever may have been their errors of judgment—and errors of judgment all must have made more or less—have the consciousness of having discharged, according to their best judgment, their duty to their country.

The resolution was then unanimously agreed to. The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business,

And, at about 12 o'clock, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 2, 1841.

Mr. DOTY of Wisconsin asked leave to introduce the following resolution; which was objected to:

Resolved, That the hours from twelve to half past two o'clock be set apart for the consideration of Territorial business.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, on leave, presented resolutions of the State of Rhode Island, on the subject of the public lands; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRAVES, also on leave, presented certain papers, (the nature of which could not be ascertained by the Reporter,) which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER stated that there was a motion pending for a call of the House.

On the question being taken, there were—ayes 47, noes 20.

So a call of the House was ordered.

The CLERK then called the roll, and one hundred and forty members having answered to their names, and a quorum being present,

All further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

The question now recurred on the motion made yesterday by Mr. W. C. JOHNSON, that the rules prescribing the order of business be suspended, to enable him to submit a motion that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to revive and continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia."

On that motion the yeas and nays were ordered, and resulted—yeas 74, nays 71.

There not being two-thirds, the rules were not suspended.

The House then, in pursuance of the resolution adopted yesterday, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BAIGES in the chair,) and took up the following

SENATE BILLS:

- An act granting a pension to Lemuel White;
- An act for the relief of William P. Rathbone;
- An act granting a pension to Hannah Leighton;
- An act for the relief of Jacob Seeley;
- An act for the relief of William Jones;
- An act for the relief of Charles M. Keller and Henry Stone;
- An act for the relief of Lieutenant John E. Bispham;
- An act for the relief of Avery, Saltmarsh, and Co.;
- An act for the relief of John Carter;
- An act for the relief of Joseph Bogey;
- An act for the relief of Jean Baptiste Comeau;
- An act for the relief of Francis H. Harrison; and
- An act for the relief of the heirs of Miguel Es-lava.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to strike out the enacting clause of the last named bill.

After some remarks by Messrs. C. JOHNSON, MOORE, RARIDEN, BRECKENRIDGE, LEAD-BETTER, DILLET, SMITH of Maine, POPE, WISE, DOWNING, and CRABB, the question was taken on striking out the enacting clause, and decided in the affirmative.

The committee then rose and reported the bills, with various amendments, to the House.

The act for the relief of the heirs of Miguel Es-lava, and the act for the relief of Francis A. Harrison, were laid aside till to-morrow, and the others were severally read a third time and passed.

After the bill for the relief of Avery, Saltmarsh and Co. had passed,

Mr. EVERETT moved that the vote on its passage be reconsidered.

No action was taken on the motion. It will come up to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. VANDERPOEL, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WISE in the chair,) and took up the bill providing for the support of the Military Academy for the year 1841.

After the bill had been read through, Mr. ANDREWS moved to strike out the enacting clause; which motion was rejected.

The bill was then read by clauses, and there being no amendment offered, it was laid aside to be reported.

Mr. EVANS moved that the committee take up the bill making appropriation for surveys, and other purposes; which motion was agreed to.

The bill was then taken up, and numerous amendments offered; pending the consideration of which, the hour having arrived, the House took its usual recess.

[EVENING SESSION.]

After the recess—

The House resumed its session in Committee of the Whole, and after some time spent therein, the committee rose and reported

The bill making appropriation for the support of the Military Academy at West Point for 1841, without amendment.

BY BLAIR & RIVES.

—WEEKLY—

PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

Also the bill making appropriation for surveys and other purposes, without coming to any resolution thereon.

The above bill making appropriation for the support of the Military Academy at West Point was then, after some debate, which will be noticed hereafter, read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, and considered the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for 1841.

FEES OF NEW YORK COLLECTOR.

The question being on agreeing to an amendment of the Senate to the general appropriation bill, restricting the allowances of the Collector of the Customs at New York,

Mr. WISE said that the Investigating Committee appointed some years since, discovered that the Collector of the port of New York received immense sums from storage, in addition to his regular salary; and, in consequence of a report made by that committee, the salary of the collector was restricted in 1839 to $4,000. That officer had then admitted that he made a profit of 7 per cent. on the protest money retained in his hands. He had been ordered by the Department to pay over these moneys to the Government, but he had positively refused to do so, replying to the Secretary of the Treasury that "he intended, when he should go out of office, to have his accounts settled according to Shrewsbury clock." This same collector had now resigned; but he was not a defaulter; oh no! there was now a more refined phrase in use—he "retained the fees," (which amounted to the moderate little sum of $140,000.) Yet every other charge he had made in the settlement of his account, had been allowed by the Department. What should have been done with such a man, when he refused to pay over moneys belonging either to the merchants of New York, or to the Government of the United States? He ought to have been "expunged." The Government ought to have clipped his official head off his shoulders, and said, "so much for Hoyt." Instead of this, the Government might cry, "so much for our $140,000."

Mr. VANDERPOEL observed, he was compelled to say a few words in reply; and what he said, should be on his responsibility as a member. A great many vague and erroneous rumors were in circulation about this affair of Mr. Hoyt, and he would now state it as he had understood it to be from the best authority. He would state, in the first place, that the balance retained in Mr. Hoyt's hands was only $40,000, and the greater part of this was for official fees received by him. It had formerly been thought that the bill fixing the salary of the collector, cut off all fees for entries, permits, etc.; and under this impression, the predecessors of Mr. Hoyt had paid over these fees to the department. But Mr. Hoyt, on further examination, had come to the conclusion that the law did not forbid him to receive these fees; and, in this opinion, he claimed to be supported by a decision of Judge Story, establishing a legal distinction between "emoluments" and "fees;" and as the law cut off only "emoluments," he insisted that "fees" did not come under its provisions. The Treasury resisted this interpretation of the collector, and sued Mr. Hoyt for the amount of fees in his hands. The matter had been submitted to the President, who, after a personal examination of the question, had decided against the collector, and ordered him to be sued; and his sureties had been prosecuted accordingly, and Mr. Hoyt had been ordered to deposit the balance in court, to abide the issue of the suit. On this the collector, seeing what was coming, resigned, and had not paid over the money as ordered. Mr. V. said he was personally acquainted with Mr. Hoyt's bail, and believed them to be worth more than five times as much as the amount claimed by the Government to be due from him. He believed and hoped, too, that Mr. Hoyt himself was able to pay it.

Mr. Hoyt had offered to discharge the duties of the office till a successor should be appointed, but the President had refused the offer, and nominated a successor, and the Senate had confirmed the nomination. Mr. Hoyt was the political and personal friend of the President; but the latter would not, it seems, treat him more leniently than he had treated others who retained money under circumstances somewhat similar.

He would add one word on the subject of fees. The collector had been in the habit of receiving, as was said by many, and believed, from $10,000 to $15,000, in the shape of storage, and nearly $15,000 more in the form of fees. The fees had been excluded by the amendment adopted in the Senate, but the storage had been always conceded, as a perquisite of the collector's office at New York; but the Senate's amendment proposed to cut that off also. There were no public stores in New York. The collector, therefore, hired buildings on his own account, and on all goods stored there he charged importers for storage. The section in the act of 1839, to which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] referred, as cutting off storage, had no more to do with that subject than a text from the Heidelberg Catechism. But the effect of the Senators' amendment, which would soon be read, was to cut off all fees; and leave the collector to his salary of $4,000, and his storage to the extent of $2,000 more, now put together in one sum of $6,000. In addition to this, the collector got one-sixth of all seizures, fines, and forfeitures; which seemed a necessary incentive to vigilance in preventing frauds and abuses.

Mr. MORGAN observed that his colleague had defended the New York collector.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he had not; he had merely stated the facts, and not by way of defence.

Mr. MORGAN gave it as his opinion that, instead of being a defaulter only to the amount of $40,000, it would turn out, when the facts were fully investigated, as they soon would be, that this man was a larger defaulter than Price. The claims of Mr. Hoyt were understood to be over $200,000, under the pretext of a guarantee for his responsibilities for seizures. Mr. M. suspected he would be found treading in the footsteps of his predecessor.

The committee having concurred in the amendments of the Senate, the bill, as amended, was reported to the House.

The amendments were then concurred in by the House, and the Clerk directed to apprise the Senate of that fact.

After the disposal of motions relative to private business, an account of which will be given hereafter,

At ten minutes before 10 o'clock,

On motion of Mr. BEATTY,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, March 3, 1841.

The Senate was called to order by the Secretary, and proceeded to ballot for a President pro tempore, and the votes being counted, the following was declared to be the result:

Whole number of votes	30
Mr. KING received	16
Mr. SOUTHARD	9
Scattering	5

Mr. KING, having received a majority of the whole number of votes, was declared to be duly elected; and having been conducted to the chair by Mr. BENTON and Mr. CALHOUN, in a short and pertinent address, expressed his grateful sense of the manifestation of the kindness and confidence of his brother Senators. It had been his fortune to preside over that body, as President pro tempore, for several years: how he had discharged the duties of that station was known to every Senator present. He had ever attempted to discharge those duties with faithfulness and with the utmost impartiality. During the short period that remained of the present session, he hoped to continue to give evidence to the body of the same desire to discharge faithfully the duties of the station to which they had called him.

He must be permitted to say that he had witnessed on several occasions at the close of the sessions of Congress, a degree of excitement which did not, in his opinion, comport with the grave duties of the Senate, and which was calculated to impair the weight of their deliberations, and was not calculated to facilitate the despatch of their business. He trusted that spirit would be banished for the residue of the session, and that they should be actuated by that spirit of kindness and courtesy, and of self as well as personal respect, which ought to characterize the deliberations of that body, consisting of the representatives of great, of sovereign, and of independent States. But if, unfortunately, there should be any departure from strict order, he should feel it his duty to check it instantly; it was an obligation which he felt rested upon him to do so, but at the same time, he should do it in no spirit of unkindness. He trusted, however, he should have no occasion to exercise the power with which they had invested him, and that they should part as they had met, with sentiments of good feeling and kind fellowship.

On motion by Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, the Committee on Revolutionary Claims was discharged from the further consideration of all the subjects heretofore referred to them, and unacted on.

Similar motions were made by Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, and Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of Major General Jesup, reported that, in the opinion of the committee, the prayer of the memorialist was reasonable, that it ought to be granted, and it would be accomplished by the printing of the memorial, which he accordingly moved, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. STURGEON, from the Committee on Patents, to which was referred the memorial of Hazard Knowles, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that the memorialist have leave to withdraw his papers; which was agreed to.

The following resolution submitted some days since by Mr. HENDERSON, was considered and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish the Senate, as soon as convenient, either at this or the next session of Congress, with the best information he may obtain of the practicability of establishing a foundry and manufactory of arms on the banks of the Mississippi river, between St. Louis, in Missouri, and Memphis, in Tennessee, giving his opinion as to the site most practicable, with his reason therefor, predicated on the advantage and stability of the river bank; its convenient supply of ore, fuel, healthfulness of the locality, and other considerations promotive of the objects of such an establishment.

The following resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. BENTON, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a comparative statement of the condition of the public defences by land and water, and of all the preparations and means of defence, on the first day of January, 1829, and on the first day of January, 1841; together with a comparative statement of the actual and authorized strength of the army of the United States on the same days.

The resolution submitted by Mr. KNIGHT, from the Committee on the Contingent Expenditures of the Senate, allowing additional compensation to the assistant doorkeeper, and to the messengers, pages, and laborers of the Senate, and of the office of the Secretary of the Senate, was taken up for consideration.

The resolution was opposed by Mr. HENDERSON, and advocated by Messrs. FULTON, NORVELL, PORTER, and CLAY of Alabama, and was agreed to—ayes 29, noes 6.

The bill to provide for the support of the Military Academy for the year 1841, was taken up.

Mr. WALKER proposed an amendment appropriating $20,000 for the continuation of the military and geographical surveys west of the Mississippi; which was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Patents, to which was referred the bill for promoting the progress of useful arts by securing the right of invention and copy-right to proprietors of new designs for manufactures for a limited time, reported the same without amendment, and it was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, the House bill concerning navy pensions and half pay was taken up, and the amendments of the Committee on Naval Affairs having been concurred in,

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the bill so as to provide for the widows of those who have died or may die in the service; which was rejected, and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The bill to provide for the support of the Military Academy for the year 1841, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. PIERCE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the House bill to extend, for five years, the act approved July 7, 1838, granting half pay and pensions to certain widows.

Mr. P. proposed an amendment to the bill, which would embrace within its provisions those embraced in the law of 1836; which Mr. P. advocated at some length. He was followed in the debate, in which the policy of the pension system was discussed, and in which Messrs. WALKER, HUNTINGTON, SMITH of Connecticut, BENTON, PRESTON, CALHOUN, BATES, MERRICK, WRIGHT, and BUCHANAN, participated, and the bill was ordered to be laid on the table.

The bill concerning navy pensions and half pay coming up on its passage,

Mr. WALKER moved a reconsideration of the vote by which it was ordered to a third reading, for the purpose of proposing an amendment in relation to the widows of those who have died or may die in the service.

The motion to reconsider was lost—ayes 17, noes 23; and the bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, stating several provisions, which, in their opinion, should be incorporated in any bankrupt bill that might pass the Senate: the memorial was then laid on the table.

The Senate then took a recess until 5 o'clock.

[EVENING SESSION.]

Mr. TALLMADGE presented resolutions of the Legislature of New York in relation to the disposition of the public lands; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT said, as there was no business before the Senate, he would submit the following resolution which was considered and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate, having finished the legislative business before them, are ready to adjourn.

On motion by Mr. TAPPAN,

Ordered, That a joint committee be appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that, unless he have other communications to make to the two Houses of Congress, they are ready to adjourn.

Mr. TAPPAN and Mr. WRIGHT were appointed said committee on the part of the Senate.

The bill making compensation to the State of Maine for the services of her militia, came back from the House with an amendment, appropriating $208,000 to the State of Georgia, for expenses incurred on account of militia called out to protect her inhabitants against Indian aggression.

The bill was taken up, and the question being on concurring in the amendment of the House,

Mr. CLAY of Alabama moved to amend the amendment, authorizing the auditing and settlement of the claim of Alabama for expenditures incurred in calling out her militia for similar purposes.

Mr. C. urged with much earnestness the justice of this claim, and the propriety of providing for its auditing and settlement. He was followed by Messrs. SOUTHARD, MANGUM, PRESTON, LINN, BAYARD, SEVIER, MERRICK, WRIGHT, and PIERCE, when

Mr. MANGUM moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays, and the motion was withdrawn.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, and decided in the negative—ayes 14, noes 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Mangum, Merrick, Nicholson, Norvell, Pierce, Surgeon, Tallmadge, Walker—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Choate, Henderson, Huntington, Porter, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tappan, Wall, White, Williams, Wright—14.

Mr. PIERCE then proposed an amendment appropriating $6,000 in payment of the claim of New Hampshire for services of her militia; which was negatived—ayes 14, noes 16.

The question then coming up on agreeing to the amendment of the House in relation to the claim of Georgia, Mr. CUTHBERT addressed the Senate in support of the motion, and submitted a letter from the Secretary of War in favor of the claim, and the amendment was concurred in—yeas 27, noes 3. The bill was then passed.

Mr. TAPPAN having obtained the floor, said that the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress were ready to close the present session by adjournment, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them, that the President informed them he had no further communication to make, and expressed his warm wishes for the welfare and happiness of the members, and their safe return to their families.

Mr. TAPPAN then moved that the Senate adjourn.

Previous to putting the question, the PRESIDENT pro tem. in a few brief and pertinent remarks, took leave of the Senate, and the motion being carried in the affirmative,

The Senate adjourned sine die.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, March 3, 1841.

Mr. MITCHELL asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk be authorized to procure from the respective publishers, and furnish such members of the House of Representatives as have not received them under former orders, the following books, and pay for the same out of the contingent fund of the House, being such, in part, as have been supplied to members of the last and preceding Congresses, viz: the Congressional documents compiled by order of Congress, entitled State Papers, the Register of Debates, Elliot's Debates Contested Elections, and the Land Laws and opinions compiled by order of the Senate; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the reprinting of either of the above works.

Objection being made,

Mr. MITCHELL moved a suspension of the rules prescribing the order of business.

The question was taken by yeas and nays—yeas 72, nays 58—not two-thirds.

So the rules were not suspended.

The House then took up the Senate bill entitled "An act for the relief of Francis A. Harrison," which was laid aside on yesterday.

Mr. HOPKINS having explained briefly the principles involved in the bill,

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. BOYD said he hoped that the gentleman would not press his motion until an explanation could be made on the other side. It is true, Mr. Speaker, (remarked Mr. B.) as is stated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HOPKINS,] that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have reported against the passage of the bill on your table; but it is also true (and I state it as an offset to the committee's report,) that the bill has passed the Senate twice, and that, too, as I understand, without one dissenting voice.

Mr. Harrison, the Postmaster at Paducah, Kentucky, (said Mr. B.) swears that a certain amount of money in his possession, belonging to the Post Office Department, was consumed by fire, under circumstances which rendered it utterly impossible for him or any body else to save it. A number of respectable citizens of the town state, in a memorial accompanying the bill, that the post office was kept in an eligible place, and in a suitable house near the centre of a front row of buildings in said town; the whole of which row of buildings was, together with all the principal part of the town, and nearly every species of property contained therein, wholly consumed. The fire was at the dead hour of the night, and the destruction of property was immense.

The honesty and private worth of Mr. Harrison is also fully proved, but on this point, I myself can bear testimony. I have known that man ever since I was three feet high, and, sir, from that time up, I have never heard him charged with a dishonorable act. But, sir, nobody seems to doubt the truth of Mr. Harrison's statement. The committee do not assume that there is any reason to doubt on that point. But they reported against the bill because they were of opinion that there existed no precedent in our previous legislation, involving the principle assumed in the bill. Now, sir, on this point I beg leave to call the attention of gentlemen to a case directly in point. I allude to the case of J. D. Hay, in 1814. He was postmaster at Vincennes, Indiana, and lost about the same amount of post office money by fire which Mr. Harrison did. Mr. H. took an oath as to the circumstances and amount of the loss. His neighbors bore testimony, in like manner, to his good character, and Congress relieved him from the payment of the money. Now, sir, if it was right to relieve Mr. Hay then, I appeal to gentlemen to say if it is not also right to relieve Mr. Harrison now. There are other cases, said Mr. B. and a great number of them, which might be cited, having a strong bearing as precedents to justify the passage of this bill. But, sir, I will not detain the House to give them in detail. I know that, to ensure the destruction of a measure at this late period of the session, it is only necessary to make a long speech about it. That the ends of justice will be met by the adoption of this measure, there can be no doubt; and I do hope gentlemen will withdraw their opposition, and that the bill will be passed.

After some remarks by Mr. ADAMS in favor of, and by Mr. CONNOR in opposition to, the bill,

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. L. WILLIAMS, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 85, noes 62.

So the bill was laid upon the table.

The question now recurred on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Miguel Eslava."

After some remarks by Mr. RARIDEN, the House refused to concur in the amendment and the bill was then read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the House took up Senate bill entitled "An act respecting the heirs of Agnes Dundas;" also,

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, Senate bill to abolish the office of Surveyor of the Customs of Currituck Inlet, North Carolina; which bills were severally read a third time, and passed.

Mr. CRABE moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of taking up the bill to reorganize the judicial courts of the United States; but the motion did not prevail.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and considered the amendments of the Senate to the Naval Appropriation bill.

And the same having been concurred in, The amendment of the Senate to the bill making appropriation for the support of the Academy at West Point, was next considered, and also concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate to the Army bill were then considered, and concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriation for the destitute Kickapoo Indians, and for the removal of the Swan Creek and Black River Indians of Michigan, were adopted, with the exception of that in favor of Clements Bryan, and Co. On this amendment a debate arose, which had not terminated when the House took its usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess—

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the Committee rose and reported on the amendments of the Senate to the army, navy, and Indian appropriation bills, leaving to be considered hereafter the amendment relating to Clements, Bryan and Co.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Judiciary Committee, on leave, made the following report:

"The Committee on the Judiciary to whom was referred sundry memorials from citizens of New York, complaining of the official conduct of Alfred Conkling, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York, and also a letter from Judge Conkling to the Hon. Christopher Morgan, explanatory of his conduct in the particular complained of in the memorial, report:

"That, having duly considered the complaint and the explanation, they are of opinion that there is not ground for the interposition of the power of this House. In coming to this conclusion, they would not be understood to approve the conduct of Judge Conkling, nor even to acquit him of some impropriety in the instance complained of. In saying to the recognizers, after the verdict was given, (as he admits he did,) 'I extremely regret the small respect you have shown for your oaths,' he was making an imputation beyond the line of his duty, and inconsistent with the mutual regard by judges and jurors for each other's rights and feelings which is essential to the due administration of justice.

"But the committee do not believe that there was any corrupt motive on the part of the judge, and they think that a single instance of the undue influence of excitement, though it must be disapproved, ought not to be visited with undue severity. Repeated incidents of the same kind, should they occur, might be deemed characteristic, and as such to require a corresponding measure of correction, lest the effect might be to injure, if not to destroy, the administration of justice. The proper application of one such occurrence is to let it serve as an admonition to guard against the indulgence of temper, and especially to avoid the imputation of undue motives where they are not legitimate subjects of inquiry.

"The committee, therefore, offer the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject."

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Commerce, made an adverse report upon the petition of the Steam Navigation Companies, praying an alteration of the law of debentures so that drawback of duties may be allowed upon foreign coals exported from the United States, and consumed on board of steamships on the high seas; which was ordered to be printed.

The House then again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Mr. LINCOLN was called to the chair of the committee.

Mr. EVANS moved the consideration of the bill to provide for the payment of the militia claims of the State of Maine.

Mr. TURNEY called for the consideration of the unfinished business of the committee, to wit: the amendments of the Senate to the bill making an appropriation for the relief of destitute Kickapoo Indians, &c.

Mr. WISE insisted that these amendments was the business actually before the committee without a question.

The CHAIR assented.

Mr. GRAVES then claimed that the bill making appropriations for surveys and light-houses, which was before the committee yesterday, and remained unfinished, took precedence of any thing else.

Much confusion here arose as to precedence of business.

The House at length resumed the consideration of the amendment to the bill making appropriations for the relief of destitute Kickapoo Indians, and for the removal of Swan Creek and Black River Indians.

The question pending was on a proposition to make the amendment of the Senate providing for the claim of Bryan, Clements and Co. conform to a proposition submitted by the Committee of Claims of this House for the settlement of the same case.

Mr. STANLY opposed the amendment of the Senate unless the amendment of this House was adopted, in which case he would vote for it.

An animating and exciting debate took place on this claim, in which it was advocated by Messrs. CLARK, BROWN, of Mississippi, and GALBRAITH; and opposed by Messrs. TILLINGHAST, WISE, GRAHAM, GIDDINGS, and RUSSELL.

Mr. LEET said: Mr. Chairman, there is no time, at this late hour of the session, to make apologies for trespassing upon the attention of the committee; therefore, I offer none. It may be permitted to me, however, to say, that I would not have risen on this occasion, did I not consider and believe the proposition now pending to be fair, and such as ought to be adopted; and, furthermore, did I not think that it was the determination of those honorable gentlemen who are hostile to the measure, to defeat its passage by the use of arguments which in their estimation may induce honorable members to vote in the negative. Why, Mr. Chairman, what are we invoked to do? Is it to make a direct appropriation of any particular sum of money? No. The Senate amendment, now under discussion, creates a tribunal to which the claims of Clements, Bryan, and Co. shall be referred, and directs that the claim shall be determined according to principles of equity. Without intending now to go at any length into the merits of this claim, I desire merely to remark that, as I understand, the persons named in the amendment entered into a contract with the regularly constituted agents of this Government, in the year 1838, for furnishing provisions for the Cherokee Indians in their march to the west of the Mississippi; that in pursuance of that contract, a part of the provisions were actually furnished, on which a profit was made, and then the contract was abrogated by the Government agents; in consequence of which, the contractors sustained a heavy loss. The loss was the greater, because, in accordance with the terms of the contract, a large amount of provisions had been purchased.

Now, Mr. Chairman, does it not appear as clear as any thing can be, that the claim of these persons is predicated upon a breach of contract on the part of the agents of the Government?

Mr. WISE here said, with the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. LEET,] he would ask him a question. Does he know that there ever was such a contract as he speaks of? Did he ever see it himself?

Mr. LEET proceeded to say, that in reply to the honorable gentleman from Virginia, he would remark, that he had not seen the contract in question; but he had been informed by those in whom he could repose full confidence, that such a contract had been entered into; and he would further say, that from the information given him, he believed such a contract did exist. He believed it, as he would feel bound to believe any fact which his honorable friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE] might tell him of.

Mr. WISE then read from the report of the Committee on Private Claims of the House of Representatives, a clause stating, in substance, that the contract was subject to the approval of General Scott, and that bonds were required to be given.

Mr. LEET continued and said: Mr. Chairman, suppose, if you choose, that this contract was subject to the approval of General Scott, yet still it shows no reason wherefore this amendment should not prevail. Were not a part of the provisions furnished? Was not that an approval of the contract? Surely it was.

I am, said Mr. L. just now again assured, by a friend from Tennessee, that there was a contract, and that its requirements were complied with by Messrs. Clements, Bryan, and Co. Now, sir, this amendment, as I said before, does not directly appropriate money, but imposes upon the Secretary of War the duty of ascertaining and liquidating the damages sustained by the claimants, and authorizes that the sum ascertained shall be paid out of the Treasury. In Pennsylvania, which I have the honor in part, in my humble manner, to represent, we are accustomed, in cases of claims against the Government, growing out of contracts with individuals, and especially when accounts are to be carefully and patiently examined, to refer the matter to some tribunal who may have time for investigation. Loco Foco as I am, (as gentlemen of the Opposition are wont to call me and the party with whom I act,) I am entirely willing to confide the settlement and final adjustment of this business to the honorable gentleman [Mr. BELL] who will, in a day or so, be the Secretary of War. Such an arrangement would be fair as between individuals; and surely it can't be unfair as between the Government and an individual or individuals. But the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] says we are as competent as any tribunal that can be erected, to decide the amount, if any, due to the claimants; and therefore, we should not transfer this power. Doubtless the honorable members of this House individually are altogether capable of doing as the gentleman says, but can we, as a House, now do it? Can we hope now, in the midst of the confusion and noise of the last hours of the session, satisfactorily to ourselves and the country, settle and determine this matter? Why, sir, at this moment, upon the eve of our adjournment without day, anxious as every honorable member is to turn his face homeward, the apparently unavoidable confusion would seem to me to utterly forbid any attempt at a patient investigation of the amount due these claimants. Why, sir, a man can hardly hear himself, though he speaks with a stentorian voice.

Sufficient has been made manifest to prove, that these persons named in the amendments have an equitable claim against the Government. I cannot see why we should not provide for their getting an impartial and patient hearing. Shall we, sir, say to these men, who have been knocking at your door for a hearing, Go thy way, it is not now convenient to inquire into these accounts between you and the Government? Would that be fair? I think not.

As regards the technical objection taken by honorable gentlemen, I will not detain the committee in discussing. I look at the justice of the matter, and believing the claim to be fair, and that the Government cannot be prejudiced by the passage of the amendment, I shall therefore cast my vote for it.

The question was then put on the amendment of this House to the amendment of the Senate—Ayes 73, noes 91.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WISE inquired if any one could tell him who were the actual claimants in this case.

Mr. STANLY said it was useless to contend any longer; there were too many claimants within the bar, (laying much emphasis on the last words.)

Mr. WISE made further remarks as to who are the owners of the claim.

Mr. WATTERSON said there were no persons whatsoever concerned in the claim but those whose names appeared on the face of it—Clements, Bryan, & Co. the Co. was intended to cover Gen. Clements, the brother of the claimant now here.

Mr. WISE asked Mr. W. if he asserted this on own knowledge, or from information from others?

Mr. WATTERSON. On my own knowledge.

Mr. WISE then read a portion of the report of Committee of Claims, stating a suspicion of secret partners.

Mr. BROWN of Tennessee gave a full statement of the ownership of the claim.

Mr. CLARK thought it was a question the House had nothing to do with; the question to be decided was as to the justice and equity of the claim.

The question was then put to concur in the amendment of the Senate—ayes 95, noes 52.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. EVANS then called for the consideration of the bill to provide for the militia claims of the State of Maine.

The question being put on taking up the bill, there appeared—ayes 92, noes 33.

So the bill was taken into consideration by the committee.

Having been read—

Mr. DAWSON proposed to amend, by a provision appropriating $208,618 to pay the militia of Georgia for services rendered in the Indian war. The amendment was adopted.

Mr. PROFFIT inquired what amount of money was required to pay the militia of Maine; and he wished to know by what authority the militia were called out. He wished the sum to be paid to be limited in the bill.

Mr. EVANS answered that the accounts were not audited, and, consequently, the amount was not ascertained. That Maine had paid about $600,000, but did not expect to get, through this bill, over $200,000; leaving the State of Maine to pay out of her own Treasury about $400,000. The troops were called out by the Governor of Maine, and not by the United States, as the militia of Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, and other States, had been called out. Mr. E. then, with great earnestness, advocated the bill.

The bill was then, on motion of Mr. W. THOMPSON, amended by restricting the sum to $205,000.

Mr. ATHERTON then moved an amendment to cover the claims of New Hampshire for militia called out at Indian Stream.

Mr. SMITH of Maine objected to the amendment as out of order, for the reason that a bill was pending before the House for the same purpose.

The CHAIR said it was substantially the same.

Mr. ATHERTON referred to a note accompanying the rule.

Mr. SMITH asked if Mr. ATHERTON appealed?

Mr. ATHERTON appealed, and argued in support of the appeal.

The question was then taken, and stood: Ayes 50, noes 40. No quorum voting.

Mr. ATHERTON insisted that the question should be taken again.

Mr. THOMPSON argued in favor of the appeal.

Mr. VANDERPOEL took the same ground.

When the question being put, the decision of the CHAIR was sustained—ayes 72, noes 65.

Mr. LEWIS then moved an amendment to cover the claim of Alabama for services of militia in the late Creek war.

Mr. TRIPLETT inquired if the claim of Alabama had been presented and reported on by any committee.

Mr. LEWIS answered, the claim had not been presented or reported on; he had not had an opportunity to present the claim, but the memorial had been his possession many weeks. The claim he believed to stand upon the same footing as that of Georgia, which had just been voted in.

Mr. CRABB stated that the claim had been presented, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs many weeks ago, but not reported on.

The amendment was adopted—ayes 68, noes 53.

Mr. DODGE offered the following amendment, viz:

"For the payment of the Iowa militia, called into service upon an order from the Governor, in accordance with a requisition from the United States Marshal, $14,000."

Mr. DODGE said that, during the last summer, in conformity with a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives, the Secretary of War had appointed Lieut. D. Ruggles, of the United States army, to muster the Iowa militia, called into service upon a requisition from the United States marshal. That officer had performed the duty which was thus assigned him, in a most gentlemanly and correct manner, (which Mr. D. knew from his own personal knowledge,) and had made his report to the Secretary of War, by whom it was submitted to this House, and, on Mr. D.'s motion, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee had agreed upon a report, which they had not, as yet, had an opportunity of presenting to the House, but with which he (Mr. D.) had been furnished through the politeness of one of its members, [Mr. ALLEN,] and which he would send to the Chair, that it might be read for information, not doubting but that the appropriation would be willingly voted when members heard and fully understood the grounds upon which the claim was predicated.

The report having been read,

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina said that he had given his consent privately, that the report should be brought into the House; but, nevertheless, felt himself bound to oppose the amendment as setting a dangerous precedent in similar cases which might hereafter arise. Mr. T. concluded by expressing his opinion that no necessity had existed for calling out the militia of Iowa, and that the Governor, in doing so, had acted improperly.

Mr. WISE strenuously advocated the amendment, and said he would vote for it, because he considered the appropriation asked for to be just and proper, and the account presented by the gentleman from Iowa, made out in compliance with existing laws. He had always believed that the Governor and people of the Territory were right in the course which they had pursued in relation to her boundary, and conceived that every friend of State Rights was bound to stand up for Iowa.

Mr. W. remarked that Iowa had started fair in support of State Rights; and he could not see how the gentleman from South Carolina, thorough-going Nullifier as Mr. W. was in other days, could oppose the amendment; for, if what he had heard was true, that gentleman had even patted little children on the head because they were nullifiers. Now, although he (Mr. W.) was no nullifier, yet he patted little Iowa upon the head for resisting the incursions of the armed force of the State of Missouri.

Mr. DODGE said that, although he had no disposition to protract this debate, he felt himself bound to disabuse the minds of the committee, as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] had clearly intimated that the authorities in Iowa had acted prematurely in this matter, and had been the first to call out a military force. Such (said Mr. D.) was not the truth. Iowa made no display of military force until driven to it by an unjust and unholy attempt upon the part of Missouri to extend her jurisdiction beyond Sullivan's line—the line which Missouri had recognised, by the most solemn acts of legislation upon her own part, for upwards of twenty years, as her true northern boundary.

Mr. D. thanked God that Iowa had a Governor (Robert Lucas) and a people who would stand up for her rights when and wherever assailed. Even admitting, as the gentleman from South Carolina contended, that the call on the militia was illegal and improper—which he (Mr. D.) could never do—still it would be obligatory upon Congress to pay the militia of Iowa, because they had acted in obedience to the orders of the officers whom the Government had placed over the people of the Territory, and whom they, as law-abiding citizens, were bound to obey.

Sir, (said Mr. D.) this call was made upon us in the midst of winter, when the snow upon the ground was a foot in depth—to defend what? Why, sir, your territory, and maintain the boundaries which you, the Congress of the United States, had assigned to us in our organic act; and, sir, if our Governor and people had acted otherwise than they did act, it would have been a dereliction of duty upon their part, for which they would have deserved the reproach of every true-spirited American. A thousand militiamen of the State of Missouri were marched upon our line for the purpose of collecting taxes from us, and an attempt was even made to possess themselves of one of the counties of our Territory. And, sir, instead of being reproached by members of this body, the Governor and people of Iowa deserve the thanks of Congress for the prompt and manly manner in which they shouldered their muskets to repel an insolent and tyrannical invasion of their dearest rights and of the laws of the United States.

Mr. D. concluded by expressing his sincere hope that the House would make the appropriation, which, it seemed to him, was demanded by every principle of right and justice.

Mr. JAMESON rose to say that whenever the question of the boundary line between Missouri and Iowa should come up before the House, he would pledge himself to show to any disinterested person that the right of Missouri to the soil contended for was as clear as noon-day. He said he felt constrained to say this much, lest silence on his part might be construed into an acquiescence in the views of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. J. gave notice that if the amendment just proposed should be adopted, he would move one to pay the militia of Missouri for similar services.

After some remarks by Messrs. POPE, DAVIS of Kentucky, and ALLEN of Ohio, in favor of the amendment, and by Messrs. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, and UNDERWOOD in opposition to it,

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. DOWNING then proposed an amendment to cover claims for the services of militia of Florida.

Mr. JAMESON moved an amendment for the benefit of volunteers of Missouri who went to Florida some years ago.

The amendments were voted down.

Mr. EVANS moved that the committee rise and report the bills acted on.

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana insisted on moving an amendment to refund to Louisiana moneys paid by her for her militia serving in the Florida war several years ago.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill to refund the duties on the French ship Alexandre was then taken up, read, and ordered to be reported to the House.

The bill of this House concerning tonnage duties on Spanish vessels was then taken up, read, and ordered to be reported to the House.

The committee then rose and reported their proceedings.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for the support of destitute Kickapoo Indians, &c. to which the Committee of the Whole reported their agreement, were then again read, and all concurred in, except that for the relief of Clements, Bryan and Company: on this the yeas and nays were taken, and it was carried: yeas 99, nays 58.

So the bill was finally passed, with Clements, Bryan and Company included in it.

The bill to provide for the payment of the militia claims of the State of Maine then came up.

The previous question was then moved and carried.

And the question was put on the amendment making provision for the Georgia militia claims. It was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows: For the amendment 80, against it 69.

The question was then also put on the amendment making provision for the militia claims of Alabama. It was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows: For the amendment 41, against it 110.

A motion was made to lay the bill on the table; and the question being put, it was decided in the negative: ayes 60, noes 73.

The question on the third reading of the bill was then put and carried: ayes 92, noes 81.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

THANKS TO SPEAKER HUNTER.

Mr. BRIGGS said he respectfully asked the attention of the House for one moment. He rose to offer the usual tribute of respect to the presiding officer of this House. For that purpose he would end a resolution to the Chair, and he hoped it would receive the cordial and unanimous approbation of every gentleman present.

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be presented to the Hon ROBERT M. T. HUNTER for the able, impartial, and dignified manner in which he has discharged the duties of the Chair during the 26th Congress.

This resolution was read, and, on the question being put thereon, (by Mr. DROMGOOLE, who temporarily occupied the chair,) it was agreed to, unanimously.

The rules being suspended for the purpose, the usual resolutions of compensation for messengers, pages, and watchmen, were moved.

And the previous question being moved, Mr. BARNARD sent the following to the table, where it was read, as it might influence the vote on the previous question:

"Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to furnish to such members of the present House of Representatives as have not already received them, such books as were furnished to the members of the last House: provided that this resolution shall not be construed to authorize the reprinting of any of said books."

The resolution having been read, Mr. KEIM moved to amend, by including the workmen on the public grounds in the list of attendants for whom extra compensation was asked; but the amendment was ruled out of order.

The previous question was seconded, the main question was put, and the resolutions for compensation to attendants were adopted.

Mr. CHAPMAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on a bill to establish an additional land office in Alabama for the sale of Cherokee lands. The motion was refused.

Mr. REED called for the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill concerning navy pensions and half-pay.

Mr. CUSHING objected to the consideration of the said amendments, on the ground that the amendments and bills recently reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had not been definitely acted on, and until they were acted on and disposed of, nothing could be taken up by the House, unless on a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER decided in favor of Mr. REED's motion.

Mr. CUSHING appealed, and the Speaker's decision was affirmed.

And the question was put on Mr. REED's motion, and it was lost.

[NOTE.—These amendments were not afterwards considered or acted upon. The bills did not, therefore, finally pass—the amendments having remained unacted upon.]

FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WISE moved a suspension of the rule to offer a joint resolution to declare that the franking privilege of members of Congress who may not be re-elected shall not be cut off by an extra session of Congress, but shall extend to the first Monday of December after they shall cease to be members.

On the question to suspend there were, ayes 89, noes 54.

There not being two-thirds, the question was lost.

BANKS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GRAHAM said that he was desirous of doing an act of justice to the District of Columbia by taking up the bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia; with this view he moved to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and, being taken, resulted as follows: yeas 100, nays 59.

There not being two-thirds, the rules were not suspended, nor was the bank bill acted upon at all. The SPEAKER laid before the House sundry communications, viz.

Resolutions were here introduced fixing the pay of the keeper of the stables of the House, the superintendent of the folding room, and granting pay to the postmaster of the House for extra services; which, after some modifications and explanations, were agreed to.

Mr. EVANS asked leave to move the following resolution:

“Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to furnish to such members of the present House of Representatives as have not already received them, such books as were furnished to the members of the last House: Provided, That this resolution shall not be construed to authorize the reprinting of any of said books.”

The leave was objected to.
Mr. EVANS then moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to offer the same; and on suspending the rules there were, ayes 114, noes 33.

There being two-thirds in favor of the motion, the rules were suspended.

The resolution then came fully before the House, and the previous question was moved and seconded. And the main question, that is, That the resolution do pass, was put by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows: yeas 89, nays 50.

And so the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DROMGOOLE objected.

Mr. GRINNELL moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to offer the resolution. The motion was rejected.

Mr. LEONARD asked leave to move a resolution to authorize the members having petitions to present to hand them to the Clerk, with their names endorsed on the back; and directing the Clerk to enter such on the journal as were not excluded by any rule of the House; and if any were handed in which were excluded by the rules, to return them at the next session.

It was objected to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked that the resolution from the Senate in relation to water-rotted hemp be taken up.

Mr. STANLY said he had no objection, if the gentleman from Kentucky did not mean to insinuate that we should hereafter have more occasion for hemp than heretofore.

Mr. UNDERWOOD did not mean to make any such insinuation.

Mr. STANLY. Then I do not object.
The question was put to suspend the rules, in order to take up that subject, and negatived.

Mr. CALVARY MORRIS asked leave to present petitions, which was objected to.

Mr. LEET moved to suspend the rules in order to move a resolution similar, in all respects, to that which Mr. LEONARD a few minutes before asked leave to introduce, to authorize members to hand petitions to the Clerk.

The question was put, but the rules were not suspended.

Mr. UNDERWOOD obtained leave to move a resolution fixing the pay of Charles W. Steward for cleaning the Hall, attending upon the Speaker, &c.

The resolution was agreed to unanimously.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter:

March 3, 1841.
SIR: Last evening I received notice of my appointment as Judge of the United States for the District of New Jersey. Therefore I resign my seat as one of the Representatives from the State of New Jersey in the 26th Congress.

I am, sir, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
PH. DICKERSON.

Mr. PROFFIT objected to receiving the letter.
Some conversation took place between the SPEAKER and Mr. PROFFIT and other members, when the SPEAKER withdrew the letter from before the House.

THE PERMANENT PRE-EMPTION BILL.

Mr. CASEY moved that the rules be suspended to take up the bill from the Senate to establish a system of general permanent pre-emption rights in favor of occupants of the public lands.

Mr. EVERETT moved a call of the House.

Mr. WISE said there was no occasion to call the House, as there were more members present now than could be kept in order.

Mr. STANLY. Yes; and two hundred and forty members of this House find it impossible to keep one member, (Mr. WISE,) in order.

The ayes and nays were taken on call; and there appeared for the call 23, against it 114.

Mr. VANDERPOEL, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President, and inform him that, unless he may have further communication to make to Congress, the two Houses are about to close the present session by an adjournment, reported that the committee had discharged the duties imposed upon them; that the President answered that he had no further communication to make; and that he wished the members a safe return their homes and families.

And then, at 12 o'clock at night, a motion was made that the House adjourn.

And the question being put, it passed in the affirmative.

A motion to adjourn having been made, the Hon. R. M. T. HUNTER, Speaker, rose and addressed the House as follows:

GENTLEMEN: It is with the deepest sensibility that I rise to return you my grateful acknowledgments for all of your kindness, ere I perform the last official act which is to separate so many of us, perhaps forever. If it is no light thing, under any circumstances, to break up long standing associations, how much graver must be the emotions with which we part from those who met us in confidence, and take leave of us in kindness?

A consciousness of my own deficiencies forces me to attribute much of the high compliment which you have offered me, to that courtesy which relieves and softens our intercourse in the various relations of social and official life. But may I not, at the same time, ascribe it, in part, to your sense of the motives by which I have been governed in the discharge of the duties of my office? If I have not done all that an able man would have eftheir foundations. But while this body shall continue to be what by its framers it was designed to be—deliberative in its character, unbiassed in its course, and independent in its action—then may liberty be regarded as entrenched in safety behind the sacred ramparts of the Constitution.

While I occupy this chair, Senators, I shall have frequent occasion to invoke your indulgence for my defects, and your charity for my errors. I am but little skilled in parliamentary law, and have been unused to preside over deliberative assemblies. All that I can urge in excuse for my defects is, that I bring with me to this chair an earnest wish to discharge properly its duties, and a fixed determination to preside over your deliberations with entire impartiality.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented the credentials of the Hon. JAMES P. MOOREHEAD, elected by the Legislature of Kentucky a Senator from that State for six years from the 4th of March instant, which were read.

Mr. MOOREHEAD was then qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

On motion by Mr. KING, the names of the Senators whose credentials have been heretofore read, were called over for the purpose of being qualified, and Mr. BATES of Massachusetts, Mr. CLAYTON of Delaware, Mr. FULTON of Arkansas, Mr. BERRIEN of Georgia, Mr. MANGUM of North Carolina, Mr. MACROBERTS of Illinois, Mr. SIMMONS of Rhode Island, Mr. WOODBURY of New Hampshire, Mr. BARROW of Louisiana, Mr. CALHOUN of South Carolina, Mr. WALKER of Mississippi, Mr. MILLER of New Jersey, Mr. EVANS of Maine, and Mr. WOODBRIDGE of Michigan, severally took the oath prescribed by the Constitution of the United States.

General WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, President of the United States elect, then entered the Senate chamber with the Committee of Arrangements, and was conducted to the seat assigned for him, immediately in front of the Secretary's table.

At twelve o'clock, those assembled on the floor of the Senate proceeded to the eastern portico of the Capitol, in the following order:

- The Marshal of the District of Columbia;
- The Supreme Court of the United States;
- The Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate;
- The Committee of Arrangements;
- The President elect, the Vice President, and Secretary of the Senate;
- The Members of the Senate;
- The Diplomatic corps;
- The Mayors of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, and the other persons admitted to the floor of the Senate.

On reaching the portico, the President elect and Chief Justice Taney were conducted to seats in front of a large platform erected for the purpose, and those who followed in the procession having taken their seats, the President elect rose and delivered the following INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

Called from a retirement which I had supposed was to continue for the residue of my life, to fill the Chief Executive office of this great and free nation, I appear before you, fellow-citizens, to take the oaths which the Constitution prescribes, as a necessary qualification for the performance of its duties. And in obedience to a custom coeval with our Government, and what I believe to be your expectations, I proceed to present to you a summary of the principles which will govern me, in the discharge of the duties which I shall be called upon to perform.

It was the remark of a Roman Consul, in an early period of that celebrated Republic, that a most striking contrast was observable in the conduct of candidates for offices of power and trust, before and after obtaining them—they seldom carrying out in the latter case the pledges and promises made in the former. However much the world may have improved, in many respects, in the lapse of upwards of two thousand years since the remark was made by the virtuous and indignant Roman, I fear that a strict examination of the annals of some of the modern elective Governments, would develop similar instances of violated confidence.

Although the fiat of the people has gone forth, proclaiming me the Chief Magistrate of this glorious Union, nothing upon their part remaining to be done, it may be thought that a motive may exist to keep up the delusion under which they may be supposed to have acted in relation to my principles and opinions; and perhaps there may be some in this assembly who have come here either prepared to condemn those I shall now deliver, or, approving them, to doubt the sincerity with which they are uttered. But the lapse of a few months will confirm or dispel their fears. The outline of principles to govern, and measures to be adopted, by an Administration not yet begun, will soon be exchanged for immutable history; and I shall stand, either exonerated by my countrymen, or classed with the mass of those who promised that they might deceive, and flattered with the intention to betray.

However strong may be my present purpose to realize the expectations of a magnanimous and confiding people, I too well understand the infirmities of human nature, and the dangerous temptations to which I shall be exposed, from the magnitude of the power which it has been the pleasure of the people to commit to my hands, not to place my chief confidence upon the aid of that Almighty Power which has hitherto protected me, and enabled me to bring to favorable issues other important, but still greatly inferior trusts, heretofore confided to me by my country.

The broad foundation upon which our Constitutions rests, being the people—a breath of theirs having made, as a breath can unmake, change, or modify it—it can be assigned to none of the great divisions of Government but to that of Democracy. If such is its theory, those who are called upon to administer it must recognise, as its leading principle, the duty of shaping their measures so as to produce the greatest good to the greatest number. But, with these broad admissions, if we would compare the sovereignty acknowledged to exist in the mass of our people with the power claimed by other sovereignties, even by those which have been considered most purely Democratic, we shall find a most essential difference. All others lay claim to power limited only by their own will. The majority of our citizens, on the contrary, possess a sovereignty with an amount of power precisely equal to that which has been granted to them by the parties to the national compact, and nothing beyond. We admit of no Government by Divine right—believing that, so far as power is concerned, the beneficent Creator has made no distinction amongst men, that all are upon an equality, and that the only legitimate right to govern is an express grant of power from the governed. The Constitution of the United States is the instrument containing this grant of power to the several departments composing the Government. On an examination of that instrument, it will be found to contain declarations of power granted, and of power withheld. The latter is also susceptible of division, into power which the majority had the right to grant, but which they did not think proper to intrust to their agents, and that which they could not have granted, not being possessed by themselves. In other words, there are certain rights possessed by each individual American citizen, which, in his compact with the others, he has never surrendered. Some of them, indeed, he is unable to surrender, being, in the language of our system, unalienable.

The boasted privilege of a Roman citizen was to him a shield only against a petty provincial ruler, whilst the proud democrat of Athens could console himself under a sentence of death, for a supposed violation of the national faith, which no one understood, and which at times was the subject of the mockery of all, or of banishment from his home, his family, and his country, with or without an alleged cause; that it was the act, not of a single tyrant, or hated aristocracy, but of his assembled countrymen. Far different is the power of our sovereignty. It can interfere with no one's faith, prescribe forms of worship for no one's observance, inflict no punishment but after well ascertained guilt, the result of investigation under rules prescribed by the Constitution itself. These precious privileges, and those scarcely less important, of giving expression to his thoughts and opinions, either by writing or speaking, unrestrained but by the liability for injury to others, and that of a full participation in all the advantages which flow from the Government, the acknowledged property of all, the American citizen derives from no charter granted by his fellow man. He claims them because he is himself a man, fashioned by the same Almighty hand as the rest of his species, and entitled to a full share of the blessings with which he has endowed them.

Notwithstanding the limited sovereignty possessed by the people of the United States, and the restricted grant of power to the Government which they have adopted, enough has been given to accomplish all the objects for which it was created. It has been found powerful in war, and hitherto, justice has been administered, an intimate union effected, domestic tranquillity preserved, and personal liberty secured to the citizen. As was to be expected, however, from the defect of language, and the necessarily sententious manner in which the Constitution is written, disputes have arisen as to the amount of power which it has actually granted, or was intended to grant. This is more particularly the case in relation to that part of the instrument which treats of the legislative branch. And not only as regards the exercise of powers claimed under a general clause, giving that body the authority to pass all laws necessary to carry into effect the specified powers, but in relation to the latter also. It is, however, consolatory to reflect, that most of the instances of alleged departure from the letter or spirit of the Constitution, have ultimately received the sanction of a majority of the people. And the fact, that many of our statesmen, most distinguished for talent and patriotism, have been, at one time or other of their political career, on both sides of each of the most warmly disputed questions, forces upon us the inference that the errors, if errors there were, are attributable to the intrinsic difficulty, in many instances, of ascertaining the intentions of the framers of the Constitution, rather than the influence of any sinister or unpatriotic motive.

But the great danger to our institutions does not appear to me to be in a usurpation, by the Government, of power not granted by the people, but by the accumulation, in one of the departments, of that which was assigned to others. Limited as are the powers which have been granted, still enough have been granted to constitute a despotism, if concentrated in one of the departments. This danger is greatly heightened, as it has been always observable that men are less jealous of encroachments of one department upon another, than upon their own reserved rights.

When the Constitution of the United States first came from the hands of the Convention which formed it, many of the sternest republicans of the day were alarmed at the extent of the power which had been granted to the Federal Government, and more particularly of that portion which had been assigned to the Executive branch. There were in it features which appeared not to be in harmony with their ideas of a simple representative Democracy, or Republic. And knowing the tendency of power to increase itself, particularly when exercised by a single individual, predictions were made that, at no very remote period, the Government would terminate in virtual monarchy. It would not become me to say that the fears of these patriots have been already realized. But, as I sincerely believe, that the tendency of measures, and of men's opinions, for some years past, has been in that direction, it is, I conceive, strictly proper that I should take this occasion to repeat the assurances I have heretofore given of my determination to arrest the progress of that tendency, if it really exists, and restore the Government to its pristine health and vigor, as far as this can be effected by any legitimate exercise of the power placed in my hands.

I proceed to state, in as summary a manner as I can, my opinion of the sources of the evils which have been so extensively complained of, and the correctives which may be applied. Some of the former are unquestionably to be found in the defects of the Constitution; others, in my judgment, are attributable to a misconstruction of some of its provisions. Of the former is the eligibility of the same individual to a second term of the Presidency. The sagacious mind of Mr. Jefferson early saw and lamented this error, and attempts have been made, hitherto without success, to apply the amendatory power of the States to its correction.

As, however, one mode of correction is in the power of every President, and consequently in mine, it would be useless, and perhaps invidious, to enumerate the evils of which, in the opinion of our fellow-citizens, this error of the sages who framed the Constitution may have been the source, and the bitter fruits which we are still to gather from it, if it continues to disfigure our system. It may be observed, however, as a general remark, that Republics can commit no greater error than to adopt or continue any feature in their systems of government which may be calculated to create or increase the love of power, in the bosoms of those to whom necessity obliges them to commit the management of their affairs. And, surely, nothing is more likely to produce such a state of mind than the long continuance of an office of high trust. Nothing can be more corrupting, nothing more destructive of all those noble feelings which belong to the character of a devoted republican patriot. When this corrupting passion once takes possession of the human mind, like the love of gold, it becomes insatiable. It is the never-dying worm in his bosom, grows with his growth, and strengthens with the declining years of its victim. If this is true, it is the part of wisdom for a republic to limit the service of that officer, at least, to whom she has intrusted the management of her foreign relations, the execution of her laws, and the command of her armies and navies, to a period so short as to prevent his forgetting that he is the accountable agent, not the principal—the servant, not the master. Until an amendment of the Constitution can be effected, public opinion may secure the desired object. I give my aid to it, by renewing the pledge heretofore given, that, under no circumstances, will I consent to serve a second term.

But if there is danger to public liberty from the acknowledged defects of the Constitution, in the want of limit to the continuance of the Executive power in the same hands, there is, I apprehend, not much less from a misconstruction of that instrument, as it regards the powers actually given. I cannot conceive that, by a fair construction, any or either of its provisions would be found to constitute the President a part of the legislative power. It cannot be claimed from the power to recommend, since, although enjoined as a duty upon him, it is a privilege which he holds in common with every other citizen. And although there may be something more of confidence in the propriety of the measures recommended in the one case than in the other, in the obligations of ultimate decision there can be no difference. In the language of the Constitution, "all the legislative powers" which it grants "are vested in the Congress of the United States." It would be a solecism in language to say that any portion of these is not included in the whole.

It may be said, indeed, that the Constitution has given to the Executive the power to annul the acts of the legislative body, by refusing to them his assent. So a similar power has necessarily resulted from that instrument to the Judiciary; and yet the Judiciary forms no part of the Legislature. There is, it is true, this difference between these grants of power. The Executive can put his negative upon the acts of the Legislature for other cause than that of want of conformity to the Constitution, whilst the Judiciary can only declare void those which violate that instrument. But the decision of the Judiciary is final in such a case, whereas, in every instance where the veto of the Executive is applied, it may be overcome by a vote of two thirds of both Houses of Congress. The negative upon the acts of the Legislative by the Executive authority, and that in the hands of one individual, would seem to be an incongruity in our system. Like some others of a similar character, however, it appears to be highly expedient; and if used only with the forbearance, and in the spirit which was intended by its authors, it may be productive of great good, and be found one of the best safeguards to the Union. At the period of the formation of the Constitution, the principle does not appear to have enjoyed much favor in the State Governments. It existed but in two; and in one of these there was a plural Executive. If we would search for the motives which operated upon the purely patriotic and enlightened assembly which framed the Constitution, for the adoption of a provision so apparently repugnant to the leading Democratic principle that the majority should govern, we must reject the idea that they anticipated from it any benefit to the ordinary course of legislation. They knew too well the high degree of intelligence which existed among the people, and the enlightened character of the State Legislatures, not to have the fullest confidence that the two bodies elected by them would be worthy representatives of such constituents, and, of course, that they would require no aid in conceiving and maturing the measures which the circumstances of the country might require; and it is preposterous to suppose that a thought could for a moment have been entertained that the President, placed at the capital, in the centre of the country, could better understand the wants and wishes of the people than their own immediate representatives, who spend a part of every year among them, living with them, often laboring with them, and bound to them by the triple tie of interest, duty, and affection. To assist or control Congress, then, in its ordinary legislation, could not, I conceive, have been the motive for conferring the veto power on the President. This argument acquires additional force from the fact of its never having been thus used by the first six Presidents; and two of them were members of the convention, one presiding over its deliberations, and the other having a larger share in consummating the labors of that august body than any other person. But if bills were never returned to Congress by either of the Presidents above referred to, upon the ground of their being inexpedient, or not as well adapted as they might be to the wants of the people, the veto was applied upon that of want of conformity to the Constitution, or because errors had been committed from a too hasty enactment.

There is another ground for the adoption of the veto principle, which had probably more influence in recommending it to the Convention than any other. I refer to the security which it gives to the just and equitable action of the Legislature upon all parts of the Union. It could not but have occurred to the Convention that, in a country so extensive, embracing so great a variety of soil and climate, and, consequently, of products, and which, from the same causes, must ever exhibit a great difference in the amount of the population of its various sections, calling for a great diversity in the employments of the people, that the legislation of the majority might not always justly regard the rights and interests of the minority—and that acts of this character might be passed, under an express grant by the words of the Constitution, and, therefore, not within the competency of the judiciary to declare void; that, however enlightened and patriotic they might suppose, from past experience, the members of Congress might be, and however largely partaking in the general of the liberal feelings of the people, it was impossible to expect that bodies so constituted should not sometimes be controlled by local interests and sectional feelings. It was proper, therefore, to provide some umpire, from whose situation and mode of appointment more independence and freedom from such influences might be expected. Such a one was afforded by the Executive Department, constituted by the Constitution. A person elected to that high office, having his constituents in every section, State, and subdivision of the Union, must consider himself bound by the most solemn sanctions to guard, protect, and defend the rights of all, and of every portion, great or small, from the injustice and oppression of the rest. I consider the veto power, therefore, given by the Constitution to the Executive of the United States solely as a conservative power, to be used only, 1st, to protect the Constitution from violation; 2dly, the people from the effects of hasty legislation, where their will has been probably disregarded or not well understood; and, 3dly, to prevent the effects of combinations violative of the right of minorities. In reference to the second of these objects, I may observe, that I consider it the right and privilege of the people to decide disputed points of the Constitution, arising from the general grant of power to Congress to carry into effect the powers expressly given. And I believe, with Mr. Madison, "that repeated recognitions, under varied circumstances, in acts of the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial branches of the Government, accompanied by indications in different modes of the concurrence of the general will of the nation, as affording to the President sufficient authority for his considering such disputed points as settled."

Upwards of half a century has elapsed since the adoption of our present form of Government. It would be an object more highly desirable than the gratification of the curiosity of speculative statesmen, if its precise situation could be ascertained, a fair exhibit made of the operations of each of its Departments, of the powers which they respectively claim and exercise, of the collisions which have occurred between them, or between the whole Government and those of the States, or either of them. We could then compare our actual condition, after fifty years' trial of our system, with what it was in the commencement of its operations, and ascertain whether the predictions of the patriots who opposed its adoption, or the confident hopes of its advocates, have been best realized. The great dread of the former seems to have been, that the reserved powers of the States would be absorbed by those of the Federal Government, and a consolidated power established, leaving to the States the shadow, only, of that independent action for which they had so zealously contended, and on the preservation of which they relied as the last hope of liberty. Without denying that the result to which they looked with so much apprehension is in the way of being realized, it is obvious that they did not clearly see the mode of its accomplishment. The General Government has seized upon none of the reserved rights of the States. As far as any open warfare may have gone, the State authorities have amply maintained their rights. To a casual observer, our system presents no appearance of discord between the different members which compose it. Even the addition of many new ones has produced no jarring. They move in their respective orbits in perfect harmony with the central head, and with each other. But there is still an under current at work, by which, if not seasonably checked, the worst apprehensions of our anti-federal patriots will be realized. And not only will the State authorities be overshadowed by the great increase of power in the Executive Department of the General Government, but the character of that Government, if not its designation, be essentially and radically changed. This state of things has been in part effected by causes inherent in the Constitution, and in part by the never-failing tendency of political power to increase itself. By making the President the sole distributor of all the patronage of the Government, the framers of the Constitution do not appear to have anticipated at how short a period it would become a formidable instrument to control the free operations of the State Governments. Of trifling importance at first, it had, early in Mr. Jefferson's administration, become so powerful as to create great alarm in the mind of that patriot, from the potent influence it might exert in controlling the freedom of the elective franchise. If such could have then been the effects of its influence, how much greater must be the danger at this time, quadrupled in amount, as it certainly is, and more completely under the control of the Executive will, than their construction of their powers allowed, or the forbearing characters of all the early Presidents permitted them to make? But it is not by the extent of its patronage alone that the Executive Department has become dangerous, but by the use which it appears may be made of the appointing power, to bring under its control the whole revenue of the country. The Constitution has declared it to be the duty of the President to see that the laws are executed, and it makes him the Commander-in-Chief of the armies and navy of the United States. If the opinion of the most approved writers upon that species of mixed Government, which, in modern Europe, is termed monarchy, in contradistinction to despotism, is correct, there was wanting no other addition to the powers of our Chief Magistrate to stamp a monarchical character on our Government, but the control of the public finances. And to me it appears strange, indeed, that any one should doubt that the entire control which the President possesses over the officers who have the custody of the public money, by the power of removal with or without cause, does, for all mischievous purposes at least, virtually subject the treasure also to his disposal. The first Roman Emperor, in his attempt to seize the sacred treasure, silenced the opposition of the officer to whose charge it had been committed, by a significant allusion to his sword. By a selection of political instruments for the care of the public money, a reference to their commissions by a President, would be quite as effectual an argument as that of Cæsar to the Roman knight. I am not insensible of the great difficulty that exists in devising a proper plan for the safe keeping and disbursement of the public revenues, and I know the importance which has been attached by men of great abilities and patriotism to the divorce, as it is called, of the Treasury from the banking institutions. It is not the divorce which is complained of, but the unhallowed union of the Treasury with the Executive Department which has created such extensive alarm. To this danger to our Republican institutions, and that created by the influence given to the Executive through the instrumentality of the Federal officers, I propose to apply all the remedies which may be at my command. It was certainly a great error in the framers of the Constitution, not to have made the officer at the head of the Treasury Department entirely independent of the Executive. He should at least have been removable only upon the demand of the popular branch of the Legislature. I have determined never to remove a Secretary of the Treasury without communicating all the circumstances attending such removal to both Houses of Congress. The influence of the Executive in controlling the freedom of the elective franchise through the medium of the public officers can be effectually checked by renewing the prohibition published by Mr. Jefferson, forbidding their interference in elections further than giving their own votes; and their own independence secured by an assurance of perfect immunity, in exercising this sacred privilege of freemen under the dictates of their own unbiased judgments. Never, with my consent, shall an officer of the people, compensated for his services out of their pockets, become the pliant instrument of Executive will.

There is no part of the means placed in the hands of the Executive which might be used with greater effect, for unhallowed purposes, than the control of the public press. The maxim which our ancestors derived from the mother country, that "the freedom of the press is the great bulwark of civil and religious liberty," is one of the most precious legacies which they have left us. We have learned, too, from our own as well as the experience of other countries, that golden shackles, by whomsoever or by whatever pretence imposed, are as fatal to it as the iron bonds of despotism. The presses in the necessary employment of the Government should never be used "to clear the guilty, or to varnish crimes." A decent and manly examination of the acts of the Government should be not only tolerated but encouraged.

Upon another occasion I have given my opinion, at some length, upon the impropriety of Executive interference in the legislation of Congress. That the article in the Constitution making it the duty of the President to communicate information, and authorizing him to recommend measures, was not intended to make him the source of legislation, and, in particular, that he should never be looked to for schemes of finance. It would be very strange, indeed, that the Constitution should have strictly forbidden one branch of the Legislature from interfering in the origination of such bills, and that it should be considered proper that an altogether different department of the Government should be permitted to do so. Some of our best political maxims and opinions have been drawn from our parent Isle. There are others, however, which cannot be introduced in our system without singular incongruity, and the production of much mischief. And this I conceive to be one. No matter in which of the Houses of Parliament a bill may originate, nor by whom introduced, a minister, or a member of the opposition, by the fiction of law, or rather of constitutional principle, the sovereign is supposed to have prepared it agreeably to his will, and then submitted it to Parliament for their advice and consent. Now, the very reverse is the case here, not only with regard to the principle, but the forms prescribed by the Constitution. The principle certainly assigns to the only body constituted by the Constitution (the legislative body,) the power to make laws, and the forms even direct that the enactment should be ascribed to them. The Senate, in relation to revenue bills, have the right to propose amendments; and so has the Executive, by the power given him to return them to the House of Representatives, with his objections. It is in his power, also, to propose amendments to the existing revenue laws, suggested by his observations upon their defective or injurious operation. But the delicate duty of devising schemes of revenue should be left where the Constitution has placed it—with the immediate representatives of the people. For similar reasons, the mode of keeping the public treasure should be prescribed by them; and the farther removed it may be from the control of the Executive, the more wholesome the arrangement, and the more in accordance with Republican principle.

Connected with this subject is the character of the currency: The idea of making it exclusively metallic, however well intended, appears to me to be fraught with more fatal consequences than any other scheme, having no relation to the personal rights of the citizen, that has ever been devised. If any single scheme could produce the effect of arresting, at once, that mutation of condition by which thousands of our most indigent fellow-citizens, by their industry and enterprise, are raised to the possession of wealth, that is the one. If there is one measure better calculated than another to produce that state of things so much deprecated by all true republicans, by which the rich are daily adding to their hoards, and the poor sinking deeper into penury, it is an exclusive metallic currency. Or if there is a process by which the character of the country for generosity and nobleness of feeling may be destroyed by the great increase and necessary toleration of usury, it is an exclusive metallic currency.

Amongst the other duties of a delicate character which the President is called upon to perform, is the supervision of the government of the Territories of the United States. Those of them which are destined to become members of our great political family, are compensated by their rapid progress from infancy to manhood, for the partial and temporary deprivation of their political rights. It is in this District, only, where American citizens are to be found, who, under a settled system of policy, are deprived of many important political privileges, without any inspiring hope as to the future. Their only consolation, under circumstances of such deprivation, is that of the devoted exterior guards of a camp—that their sufferings secure tranquility and safety within. Are there any of their countrymen who would subject them to greater sacrifices, to any other humiliations than those essentially necessary to the security of the object for which they were thus separated from their fellow-citizens? Are their rights alone not to be guaranteed by the application of those great principles, upon which all our Constitutions are founded? We are told by the greatest of British orators and statesmen, that, at the commencement of the war of the Revolution, the most stupid men in England spoke of "their American subjects." Are there, indeed, citizens of any of our States who have dreamed of their subjects in the District of Columbia? Such dreams can never be realized by any agency of mine.

The people of the District of Columbia are not the subjects of the people of the States, but free American citizens. Being in the latter condition when the Constitution was formed, no words used in that instrument could have been intended to deprive them of that character. If there is anything in the great principles of unalienable rights, so emphatically insisted upon in our Declaration of Independence, they could neither make, nor the United States accept, a surrender of their liberties, and become the subjects, in other words, the slaves, of their former fellow-citizens. If this be true, and it will scarcely be denied by any one who has a correct idea of his own rights as an American citizen, the grant to Congress of exclusive jurisdiction in the District of Columbia, can be interpreted, so far as respects the aggregate people of the United States, as meaning nothing more than to allow to Congress the controlling power necessary to afford a free and safe exercise of the functions assigned to the General Government by the Constitution. In all other respects, the legislation of Congress should be adapted to their peculiar position and wants, and be conformable with their deliberate opinions of their own interests.

I have spoken of the necessity of keeping the respective Departments of the Government, as well as all the other authorities of our country, within their appropriate orbits. This is a matter of difficulty in some cases, as the powers which they respectively claim are often not defined by very distinct lines. Mischievous, however, in their tendencies, as collisions of this kind may be, those which arise between the respective communities, which for certain purposes compose one nation, are much more so; for no such nation can long exist without the careful culture of those feelings of confidence and affection which are the effective bonds of union between free and confederated States. Strong as is the tie of interest, it has been often found ineffectual. Men, blinded by their passions, have been known to adopt measures for their country in direct opposition to all the suggestions of policy. The alternative, then, is, to destroy or keep down a bad passion by creating and fostering a good one; and this seems to be the corner stone upon which our American political architects have reared the fabric of our Government. The cement which was to bind it, and perpetuate its existence, was the affectionate attachment between all its members. To insure the continuance of this feeling, produced at first by a community of dangers, of sufferings and of interests, the advantages of each were made accessible to all. No participation in any good, possessed by any member of an extensive confederacy, except in domestic government, was withheld from the citizen of any other member. By a process attended with no difficulty, no delay, no expense but that of removal, the citizen of one might become the citizen of any other, and successively of the whole. The lines, too, separating powers to be exercised by the citizens of one State from those of another, seem to be so distinctly drawn as to leave no room for misunderstanding. The citizens of each State unite in their persons all the privileges which that character confers, and all that they may claim as citizens of the United States; but in no case can the same person, at the same time, act as the citizen of two separate States, and he is therefore positively precluded from any interference with the reserved powers of any State but that of which he is, for the time being, a citizen. He may indeed offer to the citizens of other States his advice as to their management, and the form in which it is tendered is left to his own discretion and sense of propriety.

It may be observed, however, that organized associations of citizens, requiring compliance with their wishes, too much resemble the recommendations of Athens to her allies—supported by an armed and powerful fleet. It was, indeed, to the ambition of the leading States of Greece to control the domestic concerns of the others, that the destruction of that celebrated confederacy, and subsequently of all its members, is mainly to be attributed. And it is owing to the absence of that spirit that the Helvetic confederacy has for so many years been preserved. Never has there been seen in the institutions of the separate members of any confederacy more elements of discord. In the principles and forms of government and religion, as well as in the circumstances of the several cantons, so marked a discrepancy was observable, as to promise any thing but harmony in their intercourse or permanency in their alliance. And yet, for ages, neither has been interrupted. Content with the positive benefits which their union produced, with the independence and safety from foreign aggression which it secured, these sagacious people respected the institutions of each other, however repugnant to their own principles and prejudices.

Our Confederacy, fellow-citizens, can only be preserved by the same forbearance. Our citizens must be content with the exercise of the powers with which the Constitution clothes them. The attempt of those of one State to control the domestic institutions of another, can only result in feelings of distrust and jealousy, the certain harbingers of disunion, violence, civil war, and the ultimate destruction of our free institutions. Our Confederacy is perfectly illustrated by the terms and principles governing a common copartnership. There a fund of power is to be exercised under the direction of the joint councils of the allied members, but that which has been reserved by the individual members is intangible to the common Government or the individual members composing it. To attempt it finds no support in the principles of our Constitution. It should be our constant and earnest endeavor mutually to cultivate a spirit of concord and harmony among the various parts of our Confederacy. Experience has abundantly taught us that the agitation by citizens of one part of the Union of a subject not confided to the General Government, but exclusively under the guardianship of the local authorities, is productive of no other consequences than bitterness, alienation, discord, and injury to the very cause which is intended to be advanced. Of all the great interests which appertain to our country, that of union, cordial, confiding, fraternal union, is by far the most important, since it is the only true and sure guarantee of all others.

In consequence of the embarrassed state of business and the currency, some of the States may meet with difficulty in their financial concerns. However deeply we may regret any thing imprudent or excessive in the engagements into which States have entered for purposes of their own, it does not become us to disparage the State Governments, nor to discourage them from making proper efforts for their own relief; on the contrary, it is our duty to encourage them, to the extent of our constitutional authority, to apply their best means, and cheerfully to make all necessary sacrifices, and submit to all necessary burdens to fulfil their engagements and maintain their credit; for the character and credit of the several States form part of the character and credit of the whole country. The resources of the country are abundant, the enterprise and activity of our people proverbial; and we may well hope that wise legislation and prudent administration, by the respective Governments, each acting within its own sphere, will restore former prosperity.

Uplasant and even dangerous as collisions may sometimes be, between the constituted authorities or the citizens of our country, in relation to the lines which separate their respective jurisdictions, the results can be of no vital injury to our institutions, if that ardent patriotism, that devoted attachment to liberty, that spirit of moderation and forbearance, for which our countrymen were once distinguished, continue to be cherished. If this continues to be the ruling passion of our souls, the weaker feelings of the mistaken enthusiast will be corrected, the Eutopian dreams of the scheming politician dissipated, and the complicated intrigues of the demagogue rendered harmless. The spirit of liberty is the sovereign balm for every injury which our institutions may receive. On the contrary, no care that can be used in the construction of our Government, no division of powers, no distribution of checks in its several departments, will prove effectual to keep us a free people, if this spirit is suffered to decay—and decay it will, without constant nurture. To the neglect of this duty, the best historians agree in attributing the ruin of all the Republics with whose existence and fall their writings have made us acquainted. The same causes will ever produce the same effects; and as long as the love of power is a dominant passion of the human bosom, and as long as the understandings of men can be warped and their affections changed by operations upon their passions and prejudices, so long will the liberty of a people depend on their own constant attention to its preservation. The danger to all well established free Governments arises from the unwillingness of the people to believe in its existence, or from the influence of designing men, diverting their attention from the quarter whence it approaches, to a source from which it can never come. This is the old trick of those who would usurp the Government of their country. In the name of Democracy they speak, warning the people against the influence of wealth and the danger of aristocracy. History, ancient and modern, is full of such examples. Cæsar became the master of the Roman people and the Senate under the pretence of supporting the Democratic claims of the former against the aristocracy of the latter; Cromwell, in the character of protector of the liberties of the people, became the dictator of England; and Bolivar possessed himself of unlimited power, with the title of his country's Liberator. There is, on the contrary, no single instance on record of an extensive and well established Republic being changed into an aristocracy. The tendencies of all such Governments in their decline is to monarchy; and the antagonist principle to liberty there is the spirit of faction—a spirit which assumes the character, and, in times of great excitement, imposes itself upon the people as the genuine spirit of freedom, and like the false Christs whose coming was foretold by the Saviour, seeks to, and were it possible would, impose upon the true and most faithful disciples of liberty. It is in periods like this that it behoves the people to be most watchful of those to whom they have intrusted power. And although there is at times much difficulty in distinguishing the false from the true spirit, a calm and dispassionate investigation will detect the counterfeit as well by the character of its operations, as the results that are produced. The true spirit of liberty, although devoted, persevering, bold, and uncompromising in principle, that secured, is mild and tolerant and scrupulous as to the means it employs; whilst the spirit of party, assuming to be that of liberty, is harsh, vindictive, and intolerant, and totally reckless as to the character of the allies which it brings to the aid of its cause. When the genuine spirit of liberty animates the body of a people to a thorough examination of their affairs, it leads to the excision of every excrescence which may have fastened itself upon any of the Departments of the Government, and restores the system to its pristine health and beauty. But the reign of an intolerant spirit of party amongst a free people, seldom fails to result in a dangerous accession to the Executive power introduced and established amidst unusual professions of devotion to Democracy.

The foregoing remarks relate almost exclusively to matters connected with our domestic concerns. It may be proper, however, that I should give some indications to my fellow-citizens of my proposed course of conduct in the management of our foreign relations. I assure them, therefore, that it is my intention to use every means in my power to preserve the friendly intercourse which now so happily subsists with every foreign nation; and that, although, of course, not well informed as to the state of any pending negotiations with any of them, I see in the personal characters of the Sovereigns, as well as in the mutual interest of our own and of the Governments with which our relations are most intimate, a pleasing guarantee that the harmony so important to the interests of their subjects, as well as our citizens, will not be interrupted by the advancement of any claim, or pretension upon their part to which our honor would not permit us to yield. Long the defender of my country's rights in the field, I trust that my fellow-citizens will not see in my earnest desire to preserve peace with foreign powers any indication that their rights will ever be sacrificed, or the honor of the nation tarnished, by any admission on the part of their Chief Magistrate unworthy of their former glory.

In our intercourse with our Aboriginal neighbors the same liberality and justice, which marked the course prescribed to me by two of my illustrious predecessors when acting under their direction in the discharge of the duties of Superintendent and Commissioner, shall be strictly observed. I can conceive of no more sublime spectacle—none more likely to propitiate an impartial and common Creator, than a rigid adherence to the principles of justice on the part of a powerful nation in its transactions with a weaker and uncivilized people, whom circumstances have placed at its disposal.

Before concluding, fellow citizens, I must say something to you on the subject of the parties at this time existing in our country. To me it appears perfectly clear, that the interest of that country requires that the violence of the spirit by which those parties are at this time governed, must be greatly mitigated, if not entirely extinguished, or consequences will ensue which are appalling to be thought of. If parties in a Republic are necessary to secure a degree of vigilance sufficient to keep the public functionaries within the bounds of law and duty, at that point their usefulness ends. Beyond that, they become destructive of public virtue, the parents of a spirit antagonist to that of liberty, and, eventually, its inevitable conqueror. We have examples of Republics, where the love of country and of liberty, at one time, were the dominant passions of the whole mass of citizens. And yet, with the continuance of the name and forms of free Government, not a vestige of these qualities remaining in the bosom of any one its citizens. It was the beautiful remark of a distinguished English writer that "in the Roman Senate, Octavius had a party, and Antony a party, but the Commonwealth had none." Yet the Senate continued to meet in the Temple of Liberty, to talk of the sacredness and beauty of the Commonwealth, and gaze at the statues of the elder Brutus and of the Curtii and Decii. And the people assembled in the forum, not as in the days of Camillus and the Scipios, to cast their free votes for annual magistrates or pass upon the acts of the Senate, but to receive from the hands of the leaders of the respective parties their share of the spoils, and to shout for one or the other as those collected in Gaul or Egypt and the Lesser Asia, would furnish the larger dividend. The spirit of liberty had fled, and, avoiding the abodes of civilized man, had sought protection in the wilds of Scythia or Scandinavia; and so, under the operation of the same causes and influences, it will fly from our Capitol and our forums. A calamity so awful, not only to our country but to the world, must be deprecated by every patriot; and every tendency to a state of things likely to produce it immediately checked. Such a tendency has existed—does exist. Always the friend of my countrymen, never their flatterer, it becomes my duty to say to them from this high place to which their partiality has exalted me, that there exists in the land a spirit hostile to their best interests—hostile to liberty itself. It is a spirit contracted in its views, selfish in its object. It looks to the aggrandisement of a few, even to the destruction of the interest of the whole. The entire remedy is with the people. Something, however, may be effected by the means which they have placed in my hands. It is union that we want, not of a party for the sake of that party, but a union of the whole country for the sake of the whole country—for the defence of its interests and its honor against foreign aggression, for the defence of those principles for which our ancestors so gloriously contended. As far as it depends upon me, it shall be accomplished. All the influence that I possess, shall be exerted to prevent the formation at least of an Executive party in the halls of the legislative body. I wish for the support of no member of that body to any measure of mine that does not satisfy his judgment and his sense of duty to those from whom he holds his appointment; nor any confidence in advance from the people, but that asked for by Mr. Jefferson, "to give firmness and effect to the legal administration of their affairs."

I deem the present occasion sufficiently important and solemn to justify me in expressing to my fellow-citizens a profound reverence for the Christian religion, and a thorough conviction that sound morals, religious liberty, and a just sense of religious responsibility, are essentially connected with all true and lasting happiness; and to that good Being who has blessed us by the gifts of civil and religious freedom, who watched over and prospered the labors of our fathers, and has hitherto presented to us institutions for exceeding in excellence those of any other people, let us unite in fervently commending every interest of our beloved country in all future time.

The oath of office was then administered to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES by Chief Justice TANEY, and the President concluded his inaugural address as follows:

Fellow-citizens: Being fully invested with that high office to which the partiality of my countrymen has called me, I now take an affectionate leave of you. You will bear with you to your homes the remembrance of the pledge I have this day given to discharge all the high duties of my exalted station, according to the best of my ability; and I shall enter upon their performance with entire confidence in the support of a just generous people.

On the conclusion of the address, the members of the Senate, preceded by the Vice President, Secretary, and Sergeant-at-arms, returned to the Senate chamber.

Mr. BAYARD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate be presented to the Hon. WILLIAM R. KING, for the ability and impartiality with which he has discharged the duties of President pro tem. of the Senate.

The resolution was considered and agreed to, unanimously.

Mr. MANGUM submitted the following resolution for the consideration of the Senate; which lays over one day.

Resolved, That Blair and Rives be dismissed as Printers of the Senate for the 27th Congress.

The Senate then adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, March 5, 1841.

Mr. MANGUM moved that the following resolution, which he offered yesterday, be now taken up:

Resolved, That Blair and Rives be dismissed as Printers of the Senate for the 27th Congress.

Mr. ALLEN said, before that motion was put, it appeared to him there was a preliminary question, on which it became the duty of the Senate to pass; that is, whether it was in order to entertain that resolution at this time, the Senate being in its Executive and not in its legislative capacity here. That resolution had for its object the undoing of that which the Senate did in its legislative character; and he therefore desired that the preliminary question should be first settled, whether it was competent for the Senate, in its character of an Executive Council to the President, (for that was then its character, and that alone,) to undo an act which it did in its legislative character, as part of the law-making power. He desired to take the pleasure of the Senate on the question, whether it is in order now to entertain the motion to call this resolution up.

The PRESIDENT said the point of order was involved in the motion to take up, and would be decided by the Senate in the vote on that question.

Mr. ALLEN then called for the ayes and noes on the motion to take up the resolution.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky. Agreed.

The ayes and noes were then ordered.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky wished to say a single word on this question of order. The Senate was there organized with its President at its head, and it might, therefore, do any thing which a Senate can do. The resolution proposed to be rescinded related to an officer elected by the Senate, and it could no more be asserted that he was elected in their legislative than in their Executive capacity. He was elected as was their Doorkeeper, or their Sergeant-at-Arms, or any body else. The Senate was there, agreeably to the Constitution of the country, and it might do any thing which it was competent for a Senate to do, and it might appoint those officers whose agency was necessary to the discharge of the duties of the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN said, it was difficult to say whether the election of an officer was Executive or legislative in its character: properly speaking, it was neither. But here was an act done by the Senate whilst acting in its character of a branch of the legislative body. The proof of that fact was, that this body was required, when sitting on Executive business, to sit with closed doors; and the election of this Printer took place with open doors. The election of this officer took place under circumstances, and under a joint rule of the two Houses of Congress, which made it the duty of the Senate of the United States to communicate the fact to the House of Representatives, then in session, that it had elected A B, or C D, to be the Public Printer for the body; and now when this body, as a branch of the National Legislature, acting under a joint rule of the two branches of the Government, has elected a public officer, whose duties are connected with both Houses of Congress—when they had done that with open doors, not in their Executive but in their legislative character—and, furthermore, when they had informed the House of Representatives of this, could they now, when the House was disbanded, annul this act, and bring the House here next year, totally ignorant of the fact who is the Printer to the Senate? If it were an Executive election, why was it not done with closed doors, when the rule, under which this body acts, requires that all Executive business shall be transacted with closed doors? He repeated that, in itself, the act was neither Executive nor legislative; and it derived its character of an Executive or legislative act, from the position the Senate assumed at the time the act was done; and that was either as to the publicity or secrecy with which the Senate sat. This was done as a legislative act, and, as such, they informed the other branch of Congress of the fact. They had so acted, and it seemed to him they might, with equal propriety, rescind every resolution which they had passed in their character of a legislative body. And as to the assertion that this was a new Senate, he denied the fact. The argument so much relied on in this discussion, and on which so much logic and reasoning had been wasted in opposition to the election of these Printers, was untrue. There was no such thing as a new Senate known to the Constitution of this Republic. They might as well speak of a new Supreme Court as of a new Senate. There was a new House of Representatives, because the entire House expired at the expiration of the second year, and because the 4th of March terminated the life of that body. But not so the Senate. The Constitution replenishes that body every two years, by the election of a class of Senators, and thereby gives eternity to the duration of the body. There was no new, nor was there any old, Senate. The same Senate, therefore, which elected Blair and Rives, now, without charge or allegation, proposes to rescind the act; but he would not go into that. He again said the action of the Senate, on this election, was not with closed doors; their rules required all Executive action should be had with closed doors. This was not so had; and the circumstances of the act, which in itself was neither necessarily Executive nor legislative, compelled them to look to the character they assumed at the time they did the act, in order to decide on the character of the act itself. He had now done with this for the present.

Mr. WRIGHT, before the question was taken, wished to know whether he had correctly understood the Senator from Kentucky to say that the Senate, with its President at its head, was competent to do any act which a Senate of the United States can do?

Mr. CLAY. Separate from the House.

Mr. WRIGHT. That was a very important qualification; and it remained then for the Senate to inquire whether the Senate legislatively can do any act when there is no House of Representatives organized and sitting; and when there is none in existence. It seemed to him, then, they must come to the conclusion that their powers there, whatever they might be, were those which pertain to the Executive action of the Senate as a council of the President in matters of appointment. Though he had not had time to examine this question, he asked Senators on all sides what had been the uniform practice of the Senate on questions of this sort; for every four years since the commencement of the Government there had been a special session like the present. Had the Senate ever, at any session of that character, attempted to appoint even its Sergeant-at-arms or its Doorkeeper? Since he had been a member of the body he did not believe they ever had; and, within his experience, he knew that, although the new Senate, if gentlemen were pleased to call it so, had had these special sessions, there never had been a question that those offices were vacant, and to be filled at the commencement of a legislative session. What were properly their powers, acting as an Executive council, under the Constitution? Could they originate any thing? Could they do any thing but to advise and consent, or dissent, on subjects laid before them by the President of the United States—to wit, nominations or treaties? And had the Senate ever attempted to do any thing else, whether with open or with closed doors? for that, he apprehended, was a mere matter of rule of the Senate. Well, what were their rules, then? He had never heard it pretended that the rules of the Senate are not perpetual from Congress to Congress, unless they were changed by the body. The rules were not now changed; and what then were they doing? Why, they were debating this matter in violation of their rules, and by their action were assuming to exercise legislative powers. He had expected, from the necessity of the case, that the very first motion this morning, after the Senate was constitutionally organized, would be to communicate to the President that a quorum was present, and that they were ready to receive any communication from him that he might have to make; that they would then assume their Executive form, and, if their doors were thrown open, that it would be by order of the Senate, without assuming any other than an Executive form. These were the honest impressions of his mind.

Mr. CLAYTON admitted, with the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] that the Senate then assembled there could do no legislative act; they were not sitting as the Congress of the United States, but on the summons of the President of the United States; but, having come there, they could perform any act which was necessary to organize that body—they could do any act which a Senate can do, which did not require the action of the other House. For instance, if their President should be taken ill, nobody doubted that they could elect a President pro tem.; and if their Secretary should be sick, was there any doubt that they had the power to appoint another Secretary at their pleasure? These offices, beyond all question, were held at the pleasure of the Senate, and the officers might be removed at the pleasure of the Senate. It did not require the concurrence of the other House. It was an act simply of the Senate for its organization. Now they found it necessary to go into the election of a Printer; but they were told the office was filled. With that he did not agree. He believed the act performed was a nullity, and not consistent with the powers given them by the Constitution to appoint their own officers; and therefore they could remove these Printers, and go into the election of other Printers.

He confessed, however, he did not like the form in which it was presented, and he should have liked it better, if it had come in another shape; but he would not now discuss that. There they were, organized under the summons of the President of the United States. This was not a legislative act which required the concurrence of the House of Representatives; it was a mere act of this body, and to deny that they had the power to do this act, was to deny that they were sitting as the Senate of the United States.

Mr. TAPPAN requested that the bond given by Messrs. Blair and Rives might be read.

The Secretary accordingly read the bond.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he was scarcely in a condition to articulate, and he should economise words as much as possible. But as to the character of this bond, what was it? It was a bond to do the duties of the office; but if the Printers went out the bond was vacated by the fact. The question was not, then, on the propriety of the dismissal of these Printers; that question would come up when the resolution came up; but it was a question of order raised on the other side of the Senate, (by Mr. ALLEN,) and re-echoed on this side (by Mr. WRIGHT) but not with a perfect coincidence. It was contended on one side that the Senate was a continuous, never-dying body, and on the other side it was said there was no House of Representatives. But in the true contemplation of the Constitution, the Senate, and the House too, were supposed to be in existence; for if the States had discharged their duties by the election of members, they were ready to form a House. The Senate and the House were, in the contemplation of the Constitution, continuous bodies; they were not identical in the members that composed them, but he hoped that, though theoretically always in existence, the acts and measures of the Senate would depend on the component members that constitute the body. By the Constitution the Senate had power, exclusively of the House, or the President, or any other authority, to elect its own officers. They said that their Printer was an officer; but he should not go over the arguments which had been urged with so much ability by his friend from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] and which stood unanswered to that day, that these Printers were officers, and were, in fact, performing the duties of clerks, using types instead of pens—that they were a part of the machinery of the Senate which was requisite to the transaction of the duties of the Senate. Suppose the Printers were to die, or some other contingency should happen which should prevent the execution of their work, could not the Senate fill that office? Could they not fill the office of Sergeant-at-Arms, which was then vacant? The case was too clear for argument. The Senate then in session could do whatever it was competent for a Senate to do. But the argument of the gentleman on the other side [Mr. ALLEN] was this; it is not a legislative function to elect a Printer, nor was it Executive. Then what was it? Was it a judicial function? It was certainly much less a judicial than an Executive or a legislative function. Well, if it was neither legislative, Executive, nor judicial, he thought the argument of the gentleman on the other side demonstrated that it was not competent in the Senate to elect at all. But this hair-splitting, this division and subdivision of the capacities of the Senate, was not the question. They were a Senate, with all the powers of the Senate; they could not act, it was true, in their legislative character, but they were competent to perform what a Senate could do without the co-operation of the other House.

Now let us see what was done at a somewhat analogous period of their history. The Senator from New York thought they ought to meet in conclave, and not in the presence of those who had done them the honor to attend their debates. Why, they had always met in open session, and, if they went into secret session, it was on a special motion. But he would call their attention to what was done on the 9th of March, 1829. He then read from the journal of March 9, 1829, when the Senate were in Executive session, a resolution submitted by Mr. BENTON to purchase Gales and Seaton's Register of Debates. On the next day the resolution was, on motion of Mr. WOODBURY, laid on the table.

On arriving at the name of Mr. WOODBURY in the extract, he said he was happy to see that honorable Senator here, and he hoped, by his vote, he would recognise the validity of the proceedings. On the next day it was again taken up, and then laid on the table—ayes 25, noes 15.

There were a variety of other proceedings, running from day to day, recognising their power to transact the business of the Senate. And could they not identify and examine into the character of the of individuals to compose that body? He could rights refer to numerous instances in which it had been done to ascertain the right by which any man was sitting there as a Senator. Unquestionably, it was the first, the primary duty of any deliberative assembly. Whatever related to their functions, whatever related to their composition, whatever related to the discharge of their duties, and whatever was necessary to enable them to fulfil them, it was competent for them to determine; and whatever officers were necessary and important, with all deference for the opinion of the Senator opposite, it was competent for the body to proceed to elect. He would detain the Senate no longer, for the reason he had before given—that he had not the power of utterance.

Mr. ALLEN said the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] thought he had placed him (Mr. ALLEN) in an awkward dilemma. He (Mr. ALLEN) had said that the election of Printer was not, properly speaking, either an Executive or a legislative act; and the Senator from Kentucky had inquired if that was the case, as it was not a judicial act, where the Senate would find power to elect a Printer at all? He (Mr. ALLEN) would answer that question. The Senate acted in its legislative character, in virtue of certain express powers in the Constitution; and in its Executive character, in virtue of certain other express powers in the Constitution; and it acted in its judicial character, as in cases of impeachment, in virtue of certain other powers. But was it in virtue of either of those powers they elected a Printer? It was not in their legislative character that they acted, or why did the Constitution superadd that the Senate should choose its own officers?

Now, as to the question of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] if there should be a vacancy in the chair by the death of their President—which he hoped there never would be—would not the Senate, in that case, proceed to elect a President pro tem. of the body? And he had put the same question in regard to their Clerk. Yes, they would elect a President pro tem. by virtue of the power conferred by the necessity of the case, and justified by that necessity. But, let the Senator reverse the proposition, and see how it would apply. Because the Senate can fill a vacancy created by death—and fill that vacancy temporarily—it can remove an officer elected permanently, and thus create the necessity for a new appointment! Why, the Senate then might remove its President for the purpose of filling his place. And they could remove their Secretary—not because he had violated his trust, but for the sole reason that the Senate might thereby derive, from the necessity created by themselves, the power to fill the vacancy by a pro tem. appointment. If the proposition were good on one side it was good on the other. If they could fill a vacancy created by death, said the Senator, could they not turn out a man? If they could, in consequence of a vacancy created by death, appoint a temporary officer, could they not create a vacancy and appoint a permanent officer to fill the place? No: they could do no such thing. The proposition would authorize the Senate to displace the Vice-President and to make a vacancy, in order that they might make a necessity for a new presiding officer, and on that to found the right to create that officer. And so in regard to every other. Now, he took it he had extricated himself from the two dilemmas in which the Senator from Kentucky thought he had placed him.

Mr. WRIGHT was ready to admit that any suggestions of his might be crude, for the question was very new to him; but still he was not able to see, by the arguments of the gentlemen to his right, [Mr. CLAY and Mr. CLAYTON,] that the difficulties in his mind had been removed; nor did he see that those Senators had imposed any great difficulties against his position. The honorable Senator from Kentucky had appealed to them with some force, and he had put questions which he would answer, Yankee like, by putting another question: Was this a legislative or an Executive session, for the honorable Senator contended that it was one or the other?

Mr. CLAY said the session was "Senatorial."

Mr. WRIGHT thought all their sessions were Senatorial. He had understood the honorable Senator to contend that this was not strictly legislative, that it was not strictly Executive, nor was it judicial; ergo, they could not do this act at all.

Mr. CLAY explained. He said they were there as a Senate, and were competent to perform any act which, as a Senate, irrespective of the other branch of Congress, they could, at any time, perform. It was "Senatorial."

Mr. WRIGHT admitted that this was to him a new classification of their powers, and it was one which he would not then discuss; but he hoped all they did would be "Senatorial," whether as a legislative, or as an Executive council. The powers, he apprehended, which were granted to them, were of one of two branches; and from the arguments which he had heard, it seemed to him they had then no legislative powers, and yet they were acting on this subject in a legislative form. He had before referred to the rules of the Senate, and he had stated what, he supposed, would not be controverted; that those rules were as perfectly binding on that body, as they were on the body which occupied those seats a week ago. Now, one of those rules was, that, "When acting on confidential or Executive business, the Senate shall be cleared of all persons, except the Secretary, the Principal or the Executive Clerk, the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, and the Assistant Doorkeeper. Well, then, under their rules, they must assume to be acting legislatively, a position which he undertook to show they did not occupy after their organization for Executive purposes. That disposed, as a matter of course, of the question who of right were members of the body; for that was a question which the Senate must always admit. The Senator from Delaware said, whether in an Executive or legislative capacity, they were always subject to the necessity of exercising their powers for self-protection; and hence, if the sickness or death of their Secretary happened while the Senate was exclusively Executive, it was competent to appoint a Secretary pro tem. for that Executive session, that that would go on the Executive journal, which had no connection with the legislative journal, for it was a journal of their own, which had no connection with the House of Representatives; and that it was published, or was forever sealed, as the Senate, acting as an Executive body, should decide; and the Senate, acting as a legislative body, was not permitted to make any order on the subject. Now, he [Mr. WRIGHT] took it, that if such a necessity were to arise, or if the Secretary should so misbehave as to require it, the Executive Senate might pro hac vice appoint a person to discharge the duties until the time allowed to make a permanent appointment. Those were the suggestions of his mind. Now, his impression was, that if the Senate, in its Executive capacity, should pass a resolution and order the printing of the Executive session to be done by others, the persons here named would not cease to be the Printers in, the operation of the law, to Congress. However, he did not now desire to detain the Senate with his reflections, which were necessarily crude.

Mr. PRENTISS, who spoke in a very low tone of voice, was understood to argue that the Senate now sitting could exercise any separate powers given to it by the Constitution, and that they had the power and the right to act upon this resolution, and to dismiss their Printers.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama conceived the whole question turned on one point which had not yet been regarded; and honorable gentlemen who proposed to act on this resolution, it appeared to him, were about to act on a misapprehension of the true nature of the question. On a former occasion, but a few days ago, he (Mr. CLAY) had contended that the Printer was not, in the constitutional sense of the term, an officer of the Senate at all; or, at all events, he could only be considered as a quasi officer. He did not deny that the Clerk or the Secretary was liable to be dismissed; but, even as a matter of right, or of sound discretion, he did not suppose any officer would be dismissed, unless he had committed some offence, or had been guilty of some deep moral dereliction. In what position did they then stand? He maintained that they stood in the attitude of one of two contracting parties. The Printers, who were the other parties to the contract, did not perform ministerial, but mechanical duties, and those duties were not performed within the walls of this Capitol, but elsewhere. The resolution of 1819, to which he would ask the attention of the Senate, was in the following terms:

RESOLUTION directing the manner in which the Printing of Congress shall be executed, fixing the prices thereof, and providing for the appointment of a printer or printers.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the printing of Congress, unless when otherwise specially ordered, shall be done in the following form and manner, viz:

Bills, as heretofore, with English type, on foolscap paper. Rule or table work, in royal octavo size, where it can be brought into that size by any type not smaller than brevier; and where it cannot, in such form, as to fold conveniently into the volume. All other printing with a small pica type, on royal paper, in pages of the same size as those of the last edition of the laws of the United States, including the marginal notes.

And the following prices shall be allowed and paid for the above described work: For the composition of every page of bills, one dollar; of every page of small pica, plain work, one dollar; of every page of small pica, rule work, two dollars; of every page of brevier rule work, three dollars and fifty cents; and for a larger form of brevier rule work, in proportion.

For the press work of bills, including paper, folding, and stitching, for fifty copies, 25 cents per page; for 400 copies, $1 25 per page; for the press work of tables, other than those in the regular octavo form, for 600 copies, including as above, $5 50 per form; for the press work of the journals, of 900 copies, including as above, one dollar per page; for all other printing, in the octavo form, of 600 copies, including as above, 87 cents per page; and for a larger or smaller number in proportion.

That as soon as this resolution shall have been approved by the President of the United States, each House shall proceed to ballot for a Printer, to execute its work during the next Congress; and the person having the greatest number of votes shall be considered duly elected; and shall give bond, with sureties, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives respectively, for the prompt, accurate, and neat execution of the work; and in case any inconvenient delay should be, at any time, experienced by either House, in the delivery of its work, the Secretary and Clerk, respectively, may be authorized to employ another Printer to execute any portion of the work of the Senate or House, and charge the excess, in the account of such Printer, for executing such work above what is herein allowed, to the Printer guilty of such negligence and delay: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall preclude the choice of the same Printer by the Senate and by the House of Representatives.

H. CLAY,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

JAMES BARBOUR,

President of the Senate pro tempore.

APPROVED, March 3, 1841.

JAMES MONROE.

This resolution directs the manner and form in which the printing shall be done, and the price or rate of remuneration. It goes on to provide that, where it shall appear that the Printer failed in the discharge of his duty, the Senate might employ some other individual. Well, then, in what point of view were they to consider this resolution? The Senate stood as one of two contracting parties; and what was the character of all contracts? It required two parties to make a contract; and he submitted to the Senate whether it did not equally require the consent of both parties to rescind a contract. To say, after entering into a solemn contract, that, without the failure to perform, or consent of one, the other party could rescind the contract, would be as new in law as in morals. To test the accuracy of this position, suppose Blair and Rives should refuse to perform the duties which, by their bond, they had covenanted to perform, and wished to be relieved from their obligations—could they resign or be relieved without the consent of the Senate, or without being liable to the damages specified in their bond? By no means. Nor could this be controverted. And if they could not be relieved without the consent of the Senate, could the Senate, on the other hand, release itself from its part of the obligation? He denied that it could; and he regretted that the proposition had been made. He regretted it, as an indication of other things, which might be expected to follow, on which he should not now dwell. Here they had a law in all its forms; it had the approval of the Executive; and that law had been revised and reconsidered ten years after its adoption, and Congress passing another, which was a simple provision as to the time of the election of Printer, and fixing it within thirty days of the termination of the Congress. He would not detain the Senate by reading it, for it was sufficiently familiar.

They had, then, the resolution of 1819, providing for the election of Printer—specifying the manner in which the printing should be done, the kind of type, the size of the page, and the rate of compensation. It had only been changed so far, by the joint resolution of 1829, as to fix the time of election, as he had before stated, to take place within thirty days of the close of each Congressional term. Now this law had been acted upon ever since the passage of the resolution of 1819, with perfect uniformity. There had been a Printer to the Senate elected under it eleven times, notwithstanding the changes of parties, and the consequent changes of power. Yet it had never before entered into the head of any one that they were thereby violating the Constitution.

The fact of an election being required by the law, did not change the character of the transaction, nor necessarily make the person chosen Printer an officer, in the constitutional sense, as seemed to be supposed. It was a mere circumstance in the manner of making the contract. The proposer might be stated thus: the resolution of 1819 might be considered, as it was in effect, the proposals of the Senate for a contract for its printing, setting forth the manner in which the work should be done, and the prices to be paid for performing it. As might be supposed, a number of individuals applied for the work, and the election was held merely to ascertain and designate the individual who should be received as contractor. The person so designated, afterwards, pursuant to the terms specified in our proposals, executes his bond for the faithful performance of his contract, under a suitable penalty. Is it not, then, to all intents and purposes, a contract, in good faith, and in law as inviolable as any other? It is, most incontestably. Blair and Rives could not discharge themselves, as all officers may, by resigning. They could only be released from their liability by a full and faithful performance of their undertaking, or by our consent, as the other contracting party. Viewing it, then, as a contract, if, as must be admitted by all, Blair and Rives could not discharge themselves, by any act of theirs, without our concurrence, can we discharge ourselves, without their consent? This, sir, is the simple question; and any man who has learned the first principle which governs and determines the nature and obligations of a contract, must respond in the negative.

He should not occupy the time of the Senate longer on this point. He had merely risen to show the true character of the transaction; and to say that, unless it was intended by the party now in power to trample under foot the law of the land, and utterly to disregard that moral principle which lays at the foundation of all contracts, whether public or private—he repeated, unless the dominant party were resolved to trample down every principle heretofore sacred in law and morals, the Senate could not adopt the resolution dismissing Blair and Rives, and setting aside a contract which had been made and concluded in the most solemn form.

Mr. CALHOUN rose to say, that, in giving his vote on this occasion, he did not give it on the question of order. He agreed with the Chair that it was not now fairly before the Senate, and he should vote against taking up the resolution, because he thought it highly inexpedient to do so. But if he were overruled, and the Senate should decide the question of order, and determine to take up the resolution, then he should take occasion to express his opinion thereon.

Mr. YOUNG asked the Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] whether he intended to convey the impression that the Secretary of the Senate was only there by courtesy, and that he might be removed at any moment?

Mr. CLAYTON wished to be understood to say that every officer was appointed to office during pleasure, and could be removed at any moment when the Senate was in session.

Mr. YOUNG wished to call the attention of the honorable Senator from Delaware to their forty-ninth rule, which was in these words:

"The Secretary of the Senate, the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, and the Assistant Door-keeper, shall be chosen on the second Monday of the first session of the twenty-first Congress, and on the same day of the first session of every succeeding Congress."

Mr. CLAYTON observed that those officers were elected on a certain day for the convenience of the body, but they might be removed or displaced at any time the Senate was in session.

After a few words between Messrs. YOUNG and CLAYTON, the question was taken, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 29, noes 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Barrien, Choate, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—22.

So the resolution was taken up for consideration.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business, and afterwards adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, March 3, 1841.

Mr. MANGUM rose on the question coming up on the adoption of the resolution to dismiss Blair and Rives as the Printers to the Senate for the 27th Congress, and said this subject was so fully discussed some weeks past, that he did not think it necessary to say a single word on the subject; nor did he perceive any necessity on the part of his friends. He hoped, therefore, the question would be taken on the resolution.

Mr. BENTON called for the reading of the bond of Messrs. Blair and Rives.

The bond of Messrs. Blair and Rives was read. It bore date the 27th February, 1841, and, after reciting the various laws in relation to the printing of Congress, provided sureties, in the penalty of forty thousand dollars, for the prompt, accurate, and neat execution of the work, and was approved by the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he did not rise to oppose this resolution in the slightest hope that he should prove successful. He had no doubt execution was to be done, and that speedily, on Blair and Rives. The decree, the irreversible decree, had gone forth, and it must and would be executed. He had a few words to say, not with any expectation of arresting the judgment, because he knew this would be vain; but for the purpose of directing the attention of the Senate and the country to this extraordinary proceeding. He firmly believed that a principle would be established by the adoption of this resolution long to be remembered, and long to be deprecated.

In the Inaugural Address, which was delivered but a few days ago, he found the following sentiment:

"It was the remark of a Roman Consul, in an early period of that celebrated Republic, that a most striking contrast was observable in the conduct of candidates for offices of power and trust, before and after obtaining them—they seldom carry out, in the latter case, the pledges and promises made in the former. However much the world may have improved, in many respects, in the lapse of upwards of two thousand years since the remark was made by the virtuous and indignant Roman, I fear that a strict examination of the annals of some of the modern elective governments would develop similar instances of violated confidence."

What was the aspect of the case now before them? Did it not illustrate, in the most striking manner, the position maintained by the distinguished man, now the President of the United States. Hereafter he would have no occasion to travel back two thousand years, for the purpose of citing the authority of a Roman consul to prove that professions before an election, and practices after it, were two very different matters. His own friends in the Senate were about to establish a modern precedent on this subject, which would cast antiquity into the shade.

This was not merely the case of removing an officer, or "quasi" officer of the Senate, for political offences—no such thing. If this had been all, although it would have violated that primary canon of the Whig faith, that "proscription must be proscribed," he should not have been, in the slightest degree, astonished. Indeed, it would then have been nothing more than he had anticipated. But the present case was far different. It was an attempt on the part of the Senate to violate as binding a contract as could be entered into by human language. It would present the spectacle before the American people of this body disregarding its plighted faith, and, in the face of the world, trampling under foot the vested rights which two American citizens had acquired under their contract. He would not be afraid to leave the decision of this question to any judicial tribunal in the land, upon a mere statement of the facts, against all the arguments which ingenuity could adduce on the other side.

From the character of the resolution offered by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM,] it might be easily inferred that a military chieftain was at the head of the Government. His resolution was in true military style, and its language was precise, striking, and much to the point—without ambiguity, and without a single unnecessary word. The following was a copy of it:

Resolved, That Blair and Rives be dismissed as Printers to the Senate for the 27th Congress.

Short, pointed, and directly to the purpose, it was in the true style of Richard the Third: "Off with his head! So much for Buckingham." "If reasons were as thick as blackberries," he supposed their friends on this side of the House would not give us one "upon compulsion;" still less would they do so, when they had no reasons to give. The resolution, therefore, was an act of mere naked power, without any cause being assigned on its face for its adoption. There was but one legitimate cause which could, by possibility, have been assigned; and that had no existence in this case. If Blair and Rives had violated any essential stipulation of their contract, it might probably have justified the Senate in annulling it altogether, and employing other Printers to perform the work. This was not, this could not, be pretended. It had never even been insinuated that Blair and Rives had not heretofore faithfully performed their duty as Printers to the Senate; and this was the best pledge which could be given that they would do so hereafter. Why, then, were they to be dismissed in this military style? Why was our own solemn contract with them to be forfeited? Was it not simply because they were the editors of a political newspaper, and dared to publish articles in opposition to the party now in power? This had been openly avowed as the reason.

"Off with his head!" What sin had poor Mr. Rives ever committed, that he should be executed with Mr. Blair? It was true that Mr. Rives was a partner in the firm, and in this capacity had entered into the contract; but it was equally certain that the duties which he performed were of a mere business and mechanical character, and he had never given cause of complaint to any person. Why, then, should the political offences of Mr. Blair be visited on the head of his unoffending partner, and the whole Globe be prostrated for the purpose of reaching a single sinner?

This was, however, no subject to jest about; but a question—and he said so with the utmost sincerity and solemnity—involving a principle of greater importance to the people of this country than any which had been before the Senate of the United States since he had been a member of the body. Should Blair and Rives be dismissed from their contract, it would be recorded as a precedent, and would prove to be the fruitful foundation of many evils in our future history.

He would state the facts of the case with as much clearness and precision as he could.

Previous to the year 1819, the printing of Congress had been executed under contracts entered into with the lowest bidders, by the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, respectively. After long experience, it was found to be necessary, for reasons which he should not then enumerate, to change this practice, and fix the mode of employing Printers by positive law.

Accordingly, on the 3d March, 1819, a joint resolution was adopted by Congress, and approved by the President of the United States, declaring that each House, previous to the termination of every Congress, should elect a suitable person to execute its own printing "during the next Congress." This resolution prescribed particularly the manner in which the printing should be done, and the prices which were to be paid to the Printer. The chief reason for adopting the resolution was clear and obvious. It was utterly impossible that any new contractor could be prepared with the necessary paper, materials, and workmen to execute properly the printing for either House of Congress, without some months previous notice; and, therefore, the joint resolution gave him the time for preparation, which would necessarily elapse between the termination of one Congress and the meeting of another. The Printer, thus elected, was required "to give bond, with sureties, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Senate, for the prompt, accurate, and neat execution of the work." And what power was granted by the resolution to your Secretary over this Printer? Why, sir, in case of any inconvenient delay in the delivery of the work, the Secretary was authorized to employ another Printer to perform any portion of it he thought proper; and, if he were obliged to pay an increased price, he was directed to charge this excess in the account against the regular Printer.

There was not one word in this resolution, from beginning to end, which gave the least color to the idea that this Printer was an officer of the Senate. Throughout the whole of it he was not called an officer, nor was his employment alluded to as official, nor was there a single term used which was not in strict accordance with the mechanical nature of the work to be performed. Thus, then, stood this case. A solemn contract had been entered into—under the joint resolution of 1819, confirmed as it was by the subsequent resolution of 1829—with Blair and Rives, who had been duly elected Printers to the Senate—their bond, with sureties, had been approved by the Secretary—the agreement on both sides was perfect and complete, and, by its terms was to endure throughout the twenty-seventh Congress; and these contractors had thus acquired an absolute right, which no human power could constitutionally divest, to execute our printing and receive for their work the stipulated compensation. Ten times in uninterrupted succession had the Senate elected printers under this resolution of 1819, and ten times had the Printers thus elected executed the printing "during the next Congress."

When the eleventh period of election arrived, the Senators on this side of the house were seized with violent constitutional scruples. They denounced the joint resolution of 1819 as unconstitutional; and, to manifest their abhorrence of its provisions in a still more striking light, they resorted to the revolutionary movement of refusing to vote for Printer, and of giving notice that the moment they obtained the power they would nullify the election. According to their opinion, the Congress which had adopted the resolution could have known nothing about the provisions of the Constitution; and our predecessors, who, for almost a quarter of a century, and in times of the highest party excitement, had carried it into execution, must have been stupid dolts. During the whole of this long period they had been violating their oath to support the Constitution; for Senators on this side of the house had assured us that the joint resolution of 1819 was so plainly unconstitutional, that he who runs might read. No, sir, no: this would not do. This mantle was not broad enough to cover them. Without intending to give offence to any one, Mr. B. said, it would have been better, much better, for them to have boldly avowed that they were acting upon Rob Roy's rule:

*"That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can."*

This was their rule of action on the present occasion. The party to which he belonged had been denounced as Loco Focos, Agrarians, Levellers, and violators of vested rights. Should the resolution be adopted, all these hard names would, he trusted, be at once transferred to their opponents.

But the resolution of 1819 was unconstitutional!

And if it were so, what would be the consequence? It was this: that no constitutional power existed to pass any law under which a binding contract could be made for printing, or for the performance of any other mechanical labor for either House of Congress, previous to the meeting of that Congress for which the work was to be performed. And why? Because, say the Senators, the person who contracts to perform such printing, is thereby at once transformed into an officer of the Senate; and each Senate possessing the power under the Constitution to choose its own officers, the act of employing such a Printer by a previous Senate is in derogation of the constitutional right of choice, which belongs to the succeeding Senate; and is, therefore, unconstitutional, null, and void. This had been the argument! It was difficult to treat it seriously; but he should briefly show that our Printer was not an officer of the Senate in the constitutional sense; that if he were, it would not authorize the violation of this contract; and that no such thing existed, under our system of Government, as a previous and succeeding Senate; the Senate being a permanent body.

What argument had been used to prove that the firm of Blair and Rives was an officer of the Senate? He had heard but one; and that was the argument of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] which had afterwards been endorsed by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.] The Senator must have been hard run to obtain it, for he was obliged, for that purpose, to go back to a period of the world before the art of printing was discovered. This he believed was about its form. "If the art of printing had not been discovered, our Secretary must have employed a great number of amanuenses to make copies of our proceedings; but the printers now make such copies by means of their type; therefore, the printers may be considered as deputies of the Secretary and as officers of the Senate." This argument assumed the fact, that, had the art of printing not been discovered, every amanuensis who might have been employed for the purpose of making copies of our journals and proceedings for distribution among the people, would necessarily have become an officer of the Senate. If this illustration had not been so far fetched, he should not have desired one more striking to prove the fallacy of the Senator's own argument, than that which he himself had thus presented. Was not the idea perfectly absurd, that the hundreds of mere copyists whom it would have been necessary to hire, had not the art of printing been discovered, would each one of them have become an officer—a deputy Secretary of the Senate? In this purely imaginary case, it would have been still more necessary than even at present, to have provided, by contract, at a preceding Congress, for procuring a great number of copyists; and it would then have been still more inconvenient to have held that no power existed under this Government which would enable Congress, at a previous session, to provide copyists for future service. But the bare statement of the proposition was sufficient to convince every candid and unprejudiced mind, that the mechanic who contracted to perform the printing of the body, and was to receive for it the regular wages fixed by law, was not one of our officers. Was the clock-maker, employed by the year to regulate your clock—or the paper-maker, who contracted with your Secretary to furnish the Senate with stationery, an officer of the body? Certainly not.

The printing of the Senate was a mere mechanical work, to be executed by men possessing skill in the art, and to be paid for in proportion to the amount of labor actually performed; and we might, with equal propriety, call any other man, who performed mechanical labor for the Senate, an officer, as thus to denominate the Printer. The fact of his election by the Senate could make no difference. It was the nature of the employment, not the mode of selection, which constituted the officer. If our Printer were now an officer of the Senate, he had been equally so during the long period preceding the year 1819, when he was selected by the Secretary; and all the Printers would be so again, who might be employed by the Secretary under the resolution of Congress, in case the elected Printer should fail to perform his duty.

This joint resolution was conceived in great wisdom. What was the case before its adoption? Congress met—printing was immediately required, and the Clerk was authorized to employ the Printer; but the Printer was not prepared, and could not be prepared immediately with his paper, materials, and hands to perform the work. Great delay and defects in the execution of the printing were the inevitable consequence; and, in order to remedy these evils, the joint resolution was passed.

But suppose we should admit, for the sake of the argument, that Blair and Rives were officers of the Senate—would this benefit the Senators in the slightest degree? He apprehended not. Could not the Senate enter into a contract with its own officers which would be binding upon it? He should be glad to hear any argument to prove that it could not. Let us, then, suppose that the joint resolution had declared, in specific terms, that the Printers elected under it should be officers of the Senate: would such a declaration authorize the Senate to violate its own solemn contract with these officers? This was the position which gentlemen must establish, or they must fail in their argument. The resolution having expressly declared that the persons elected should have the printing of the Senate throughout the whole of the next Congress, and having required them to give a bond with sureties faithfully to execute the work during that period, could the Senate now, by dismissing them, even if they were officers, relieve itself from the obligation of the contract, which, by its terms, was to continue until the termination of the next Congress? No, sir; this contract stood firm, and would endure as long as the Constitution of the country shall remain in force. No human power could rightfully annihilate its binding obligation. He would pledge his whole fortune that such would be the decision, could this plain, simple question be submitted, even without a word of argument, to the tribunal now in session below us, (the Supreme Court.) Gentlemen, therefore, would not gain their point by proving, if they could, that Blair and Rives were officers of the Senate.

Senators had contended that one Senate or one Congress had no right to elect officers for their successors; and that, therefore, the joint resolution violated the Constitution, because it gave the election of a Printer for the next Senate to that which had expired on the third of March. This was as strange a position as any which had been assumed throughout the argument. An old Senate and a new Senate! There could be no new Senate. This was the very same body, constitutionally, and in point of law, which had assembled on the first day of its meeting, in 1789. It had existed without any intermission, from that day until the present moment, and would continue to exist as long as the Government should endure. It was emphatically a permanent body. Its rules were permanent, and were not adopted from Congress to Congress, like those of the House of Representatives. For many years after the commencement of the Government, its Secretary was a permanent officer, though our rules now required that he should be elected at stated intervals. The Senate always had a President, and there were always two-thirds of its actual members in existence, and generally a much greater number. It would be useless to labor this question. Every writer, without exception, who had treated on the subject, had declared the Senate to be a permanent body. It never dies; and it was the sheet-anchor of the Constitution, on account of its permanency. Senators were thus deprived of the poor apology that one Senate had no right to bind its successors. Here, then, we had the spectacle presented of the Senate, in all the forms of law, but two weeks ago having elected an officer, if Senators would have the firm of Blair and Rives thus called, and now dismissing that officer, and annulling their own solemn contract, which, by its express terms, was to endure for two years. If such things could be done—if this body of high and commanding influence throughout the country, could thus set aside its contracts, and that at a period when too strong a disposition already existed in the public mind to disregard the faith of contracts, Heaven only could foresee what might be the disastrous results. The force of our evil example would be felt throughout the Union; and if we sanctioned the principle, that no contract could be binding on us, it was one which would be carried out in practice by other legislative bodies.

Let him beseech Senators to pause and reflect upon the tremendous consequences which might probably result from the adoption of the resolution. Once establish the principle that this body can exercise the power of violating a solemn contract, into which they had deliberately entered, and what would become of the country? Did it not at once sanction the principle in its fullest extent, which had been falsely attributed to the party to which he belonged, that a succeeding Legislature had a right to repeal the contracts entered into by a preceding Legislature. The principle on which this resolution was based, would completely justify Governor M'Nutt in his outrageous attempt to annul the bonds of the State of Mississippi. The principle which lay at the root of both cases was precisely the same, and the violation of faith in both cases would be similar. Blair and Rives, by virtue of a solemn contract, had a vested right to perform the printing of the Senate for two years, and to receive the price fixed by law for their work; and if we could now nullify this vested right, and release ourselves from the obligation of our contract, neither Mississippi nor any other State in the Union was obliged to pay its debts. If the Senate could not be sued, neither could the State be. In this respect, they both stood upon the same footing. A regard for public faith, and that alone, could bind either of them to the performance of their contracts.

But did Senators not perceive what a dangerous example they would set to us by violating this contract, and dismissing Blair and Rives from being Printers to the Senate? The signs of the times plainly indicated that it was their intention to charter a Bank of the United States, if they could, at the special session. Now, sir, the Democratic Senators firmly believe that Congress has no power under the Constitution to establish such a Bank. Suppose, then, we should imitate their example, and refuse to vote upon the question, at the same time declaring to the world our fixed purpose to repeal the charter at the very first moment the Democracy of the country shall be again triumphant: would they not consider this conduct revolutionary? And yet it would only be pursuing the very course which they have pointed out to us, in refusing to vote at the election of Printer, and declaring that they would remove Blair and Rives, and deprive them of their contract, at the very first moment they should attain the majority. Will not their conduct settle this principle, if any precedent could sanction such a measure, that, believing a Bank of the United States to be unconstitutional, we shall be perfectly justified in refusing to vote on the question, and in giving notice to the world of our fixed determination to repeal the charter the very moment we have the power? The one act would be no greater violation of pledged faith and of vested rights than the other. And if we should pursue this course, no Bank of the United States could be established. No capitalist, foreign or domestic, could be induced to advance his money for stock in this Bank, knowing that the charter would be repealed as soon as a change should be effected in the administration of the Government.

The Senator from Missouri (Mr. BREXTON) had, some years ago, proposed to repeal the joint resolution of 1819. This was the only constitutional mode of getting clear of it. He was informed that at that time the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. PAXTON) had earnestly opposed this repeal. He thus gave conclusive evidence that he did not then consider it a violation of the Constitution. What had since changed his opinion, he (Mr. B.) could only conjecture. But no repeal of it could now divest the existing rights of Blair and Rives. Neither the power of the Senate, nor of the whole Government, nor any human power which existed in this land, could violate this contract without the consent of the parties to be injured by such a violation. Just as certain as they had a future before them, the day would arrive, if Blair and Rives should be deprived of the benefit of their contract, when they would be fully indemnified for every loss which they might sustain. That day would speedily come, if under the Constitution it were now in their power to bring a suit against the Senate of the United States.

He had ever held, and trusted he should ever hold, that contracts were sacred and inviolable; and he hoped that his party feelings might never carry him so far as to trample on the rights of any individual. He was, therefore, opposed to doing execution on Blair and Rives.

Mr. BAYARD said, in the course of this debate, objections to this proceeding had been placed on three grounds. The first was, that there was no power in this body, as now assembled, to go into this business and pass this resolution; it being assumed that they were there assembled in a particular capacity, which precluded the exercise of their other functions. The next ground was, that the Printer was not an officer of this body. And the third, that if he were an officer of the body, a contract had been made with him, which they had not the power to rescind. These were the principal grounds. The Senator from Pennsylvania had made an addition in relation to the character of this body, which seemed to him to go the whole length of the subject—that this was a permanent body—the same which came into existence on the 4th of March, 1789, and had continued from that day to this, and must continue in all time, as long as the Government endured, and the respective State Legislatures shall perform their duty. Now, this Senate being so deemed a perpetual body, was vested with certain inherent rights. What were they? They were either absolute or relative; and, whether the one or the other, they belonged to the body at all times, and were to be exercised when proper circumstances presented themselves. There was no such artificial classification, as the Senator supposed, of Legislative, Executive, and Judicial functions. It was a body vested with rights which, though they sometimes might be dormant, always existed, were to be exercised as soon as a proper case was presented. Now, as a part of the absolute rights of this body, was the right to judge of the election returns and the qualifications of its members. There was no question that this body could do this, whenever it was properly assembled; and the only question to arise was, whether the body was properly assembled, in the proper place, and under the proper authority. Another absolute right was, by a majority of its own number, to decide on any ordinary question. Another was, to make rules and regulations for its own government. Another was, to expel any member by a vote of two-thirds of the body; and another was, to elect its own officers. All these rights had no relation whatever to any other department of Government: they were inherent and absolute rights, which might be exercised when the Senate was properly convened. They could not voluntarily assemble in the city of Philadelphia: they could not by common consent assemble at any time they thought proper, to do this act; but when they were assembled, these were inherent and absolute rights, to be exercised beyond all controversy, and beyond all dispute. Now, what were the rights of the body? Why, they were delegated rights, when a session of Congress takes place, and they were acting in a legislative capacity. What was Congress? It was a thing having a definite commencement and conclusion. This must occur once a year—the Constitution says on the first Monday in December; but if the President thought proper, Congress might assemble whenever occasion should arise in which they might exercise their functions; and when they were assembled in Congress, and these inherent and relative rights exist, did that prevent the exercise of their absolute and inherent rights? Ought they not elect their officers and turn out members that may have misbehaved themselves? Well, then, there were other relative rights. The Senate was called the treaty-making power and the appointing power. He did not know whether the phraseology was correct; but this was when properly assembled, whether in session of Congress or at any other time when the House was not in session, and when they could have no session of Congress. He thought it must be apparent to every one, that this Senate possesses the absolute, inherent right to elect its own officers, at any time when lawfully assembled, without reference to any other case, when it might be called on to exercise its relative rights. That being true, was the Printer an officer of the Senate? The Senator from Alabama said it was not an office, nor was the Printer an officer of the Senate; or that he was not more than a quasi officer. He (Mr. BAYARD) confessed he did not well understand how he could be a quasi officer. He had heard of a quasi corporation—a body possessing some of the attributes of a corporation, but wanting others—but he had never heard of a quasi officer. If there were quasi officers, they must be officers with the name, but without employment—officers having sinecures. Now, what was an employment or office? He would quote from an authority, which was perhaps the best extant. Webster's Dictionary thus defines the word officer: "An officer is one who executes an office of some kind. Office, a particular duty, charge, or trust conferred by public authority, and for a public purpose; employment taken by commission from Government, and those who administer it." It might also be a duty or employment of a private nature. It was an employment, but office was a more dignified name. Did any one say the Printer was not an employment? If he had no employment, he (Mr. BAYARD) would agree with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] that he was a quasi officer; but if he had an employment—if he were entrusted with the printing of all their documents, and their confidential documents; too, he thought the Senator from Pennsylvania would have some difficulty in showing that he was not an officer of the Senate. He was employed by the Senate; he was paid out of the contingent fund; his work was of a confidential character, for he had the printing of all their treaties; and yet he was no officer of the Senate! Why, what did he do? Why, by means of his types, precisely what their Secretary did. He transcribed—he was a copying clerk, and nothing more nor less. By the intervention of his types and his press he did what their Secretary did with his pen; he transcribed their documents and journals, and furnished them with a certain number of copies. How was he paid? Out of the contingent fund. How was he elected? By the body. And yet the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) said he was no officer; and the Senator from Alabama (Mr. CLAY) says a quasi officer. That brought him to the last proposition, which is, it is a contract. If it was a contract, he should be the last man in the Senate to violate it. What sort of a contract was it? A contract which carried in gremio the principle of its dissolution—a contract made with an officer who holds his office at the will of the Senate. He should like to know whether the employment of any officer was not a contract? It belonged to this class of contracts—"after you have performed the work, I will pay you." There was the contract; and in accepting an office, which is itself an office at will, the person accepted it with this consideration—that he could be removed at any moment. It was a parliamentary office; and all such were at will. No principle was better understood than that all parliamentary officers are at will. All were at will. The Speaker of the House of Representatives was at will—they might remove him. Did not our collectors, district attorneys, and marshals, hold their office for a period of years, and yet with a defeasible condition?

And what difference did the bond make? Did not their Clerk give bond? And yet was he not removable? This was the effect and operation of the bond—simply, inasmuch as they were charged with a very important duty, that they perform the duty with fidelity, as long as they remain in office. That was all. There was the limitation of it. It was in the nature of things, that if an officer holds his office at will, the same condition goes with the contract. He takes it, subject to the necessary restriction. What, then, was the contract? We will employ you so long as agreeable for us, and pay you at a certain rate. And what did the other party say? I will do it at this rate—subject to your wish or refusal. There was the contract, and the whole contract.

The honorable Senator said, this was a most extraordinary proceeding. He thought not. They had full warning in relation to this matter. Did we not tell them then (continued Mr. B.) that they were doing what they had no right to do, and, the moment we had the power, we should correct it? Did they suppose we would suffer a mere partisan to be chosen, and thrown on us, for whom we were going to provide the means of support? We undertook to show at the time that there was no right to elect in this manner. They would do it; when they had but five or six days to remain in power. We gave them full warning that we should dismiss their officers who hold their office at will. It was an exercise of mere power, and we should submit no longer than we were compelled to. It was an abuse of power. Was it to execute the current work of the day that he was appointed? By the terms of that resolution it was a prospective appointment—it was undertaking to give them a Printer for the 27th Congress—to anticipate this matter; and, so for two years to come, we should be compelled thus to support a mere partisan editor; a paper that had been extremely wanton in its course, dealing in a foul species of detraction, both as to individuals and characters and members of the party.

It was an abuse of power on their part; and the party now in power would use it in correcting this, at least, so far as his vote went.

Mr. BENTON said there was a question connected with this case which was preliminary to the question under discussion, and which he wished to put on record. It was the question of power; and, for the purpose of presenting that, and making it part of the debate, he offered this as an amendment to the whole resolution, after the word "Resolved:"

"That Blair and Rives having been duly elected Printers to the Senate, during the late session of Congress, under the joint resolution of the two Houses, providing for the election of printers in Congress, and the Senate having acted with open doors and in its legislative character, in making the election, it is not now competent for the Senate acting alone in its executive character, to annul the election, and thereby divest the rights which Blair and Rives may have acquired from that election, and the contract resulting from it."

He intended to lay open the whole ground; and he would call for the ayes and noes thereon.

The ayes and noes were ordered.

Mr. BUCHANAN would say a few words in reply to the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] That Senator had still contended that the Printer was an officer of the Senate. He should not again argue that question, because he believed he had shown conclusively that the Printer was not such an officer. The Senator had compared our Printer with the collector of the customs at New York, or the Secretary of the Senate here, both of whom might be removed at pleasure, and had contended that the cases were parallel. He would not now stop to point out the vast difference between them, but would confine himself to asking the Senator a single question. Had not the Senate, if such were their pleasure, a right to make a contract with a mechanic, be he an officer or not an officer, and bind themselves to perform it on their part during the period of two years? And if they had a right to enter into such a contract, have they any constitutional power to nullify it at the end of two weeks, by dismissing the officer, against his will, with whom they had thus contracted?

Mr. BAYARD said: Unquestionably, the Senate might enter into a contract; but all the terms of the contract must be considered. Part of the terms of this contract was, that it was defeasible in its own nature. But if the office be held at will, the ingredient was incorporated into the contract itself, and therefore it was defeasible at any time.

Mr. BUCHANAN continued. This was precisely as he had understood the Senator. This Senate, then, had the right to enter into a contract with an individual to perform its printing, which, by express terms, must continue two years; and yet, in the face of this positive stipulation, it might annul the contract the very next day; because, forsooth, the office was defeasible! That was the position to which the Senator was driven; and if any Senator, however ingenious he might be, could define the nature of such a contract, he would award to him the meed for his skill and ingenuity. The terms of the contract, under the joint resolution, were as precisely fixed as though each member of the Senate had collectively entered into the following stipulation with these Printers: "You shall do our printing for two years; and if you should not execute the work according to your contract, then our Secretary shall be vested with the power to have such portions of it done by others as he may think proper, charging you with the difference between your contract price, and what he may be obliged to pay." The Senate had reserved no power whatever to remove the Printer before the termination of the two years; but merely the remedy on his bond, and the right of punishing him for violating his contract, by employing another to do the work at his expense. The English language could not make a more binding contract upon both parties, and for the purpose of the present argument, he cared not whether the Printer was considered an officer or not.

Names were nothing; it was the substance which we ought to consider; and even if the Printer were an officer, which he clearly was not, he was one of a very different character from your Secretary, your Sergeant-at-Arms, or your Doorkeeper, who were removable at pleasure. These officers required no capital, engaged in no expensive business, and employed no workmen to enable them to perform their duties. They gave us their personal services merely in recording our proceedings, serving our process, preserving order in the chamber, and performing other similar offices, for which they received a certain fixed salary. Not so the Printer. He was selected under a resolution of Congress, directing the manner in which the printing should be executed, fixing the prices which he was to receive for each item, and assuring to him the contract for two years. Let him put a case to the Senator, which might readily occur under this resolution. A Printer is chosen by the Senate, who resides in Philadelphia, New York, or Boston. He invests fifty or a hundred thousand dollars in purchasing presses and paper, employing workmen, and setting up an establishment in this city, for the purpose of enabling him to perform his contract. The new Congress meets; and at the moment of their meeting, he is fully prepared to execute our work; but before he can enter upon it, the Senate dismiss him from employment, and inform him that he was but an officer, whose appointment, to use the language of the Senator from Delaware, was defeasible at pleasure, and that he must submit to be ruined without redress. Was there any Senator who could say that this would not be a plain, palpable violation of public faith, for which the Printer could obtain ample redress under his contract, if the Senate could be sued in a court of justice. The concluding clause of the joint resolution declared, that "each House shall proceed to ballot for a Printer." To do what? To perform the duties of an office? No, sir: such a word did not occur throughout the resolution; but "to execute its work." And for what period? "During the next Congress." What security did the Senate require that the Printer thus appointed should faithfully perform his contract? "A bond, with sureties, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Senate, for the prompt, accurate and neat execution of the work," not for the performance of any official duty. And yet the Printer was an officer who could be dismissed at pleasure! No, sir, no. Blair and Rives were employed "to execute the work" of the Senate during the Twenty-seventh Congress, not to perform any official duties whatever. The joint resolution provided that they should be chosen before the termination of the 26th Congress; for, if this were not the case, no Printers could be selected after the meeting of the 27th Congress for either House, except Gales and Seaton or Blair and Rives. In order to prevent a monopoly in favor of Printers who owned large establishments in this city, it was absolutely necessary to afford others the time necessary to procure similar establishments before their duties should commence. But, under the doctrine contended for, a Printer elected by the Senate from Boston, New York, or Richmond, who had prepared himself fully "to execute its work" might be dismissed the first day of the session, and might be informed, in the language of the Senator from Delaware: "You should not complain, for you accepted this contract under the implied condition that we could turn you out at pleasure." No, sir; in order to promote a competition among printers, this joint resolution provided for the creation of an absolute contract, to endure for two years, which the Senate could not violate, and on which the Printer might confidently rely. It did not refer to an office at all, but placed the subject on its proper foundation, that of the execution work—of mechanical labor—not of official duties. It required bond and security to be given; and also, that, in case the Printer did not perform the work in proper time, the Secretary might have it performed by others, at his expense. By-the-by, would a Printer, thus casually employed by the Secretary, also become an officer of the Senate?

Casting away all the ingenuity used on the other side of the question, was not this the simple statement of the case? I enter into a contract to employ a carpenter, during the period of two years, to build a house or houses for me, for which I agree to pay him a fixed price, according to their measurement; and I take a bond and security from him for the faithful execution of his contract. I stipulate with him, that, in case he fails to perform his duty, I shall be at liberty to employ another mechanic to take his place, and that he shall be answerable for all damages. The moment he is prepared to enter upon his work, I turn about and say, I reserved, in my own mind, the power of annulling the contract, and I now annul it. You may go about your business. I am above the law, and you cannot recover any damages from me. You shall lose the expense and the trouble which you have incurred in preparing to perform your contract. What care I for that.

The Senate neither had the moral nor the constitutional power to violate this contract; and, if they should do it, Blair and Rives, some day or other, before this or some other tribunal, would obtain an ample indemnity for all losses sustained.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said, when the appointment of Blair and Rives took place, about ten or twelve days ago, on his side of the house they considered it one of the most extraordinary instances of the exercise of high-handed power they had witnessed during the present session of Congress from the other side of the house. By one gentleman—a gentleman of great candor and frankness—it was admitted to be an act of power—of pure, naked, unqualified power. Well, on that occasion, they (Mr. CLAY and his friends) gave notice to the other side of the house—they gave notice to the world and to these Printers, that, if they did go into an election under the existing circumstances, they (his side of the house) should, at the earliest possible period, correct the procedure by the dismissal of these Printers from office; and, on the 4th day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-one—the very day on which the pretended contract commenced—his friend near him (Mr. MANGUM) offered the resolution, according to the terms of which these men were to be dismissed, if it were carried. He had said they considered it one of the most extraordinary exercises of high-handed power; for what was it? Why, when they looked at its character, they would see it to be an attempt, by a defeated party, to continue their power and appointments beyond the term of their official power. It was an attempt to throw their cast-off clothes on us. And what sort of soiled clothes were they? Such, as if my servant Charles had come into my presence with them, I would have driven him from my presence for the indignity.

The case of Mr. Rives had been mentioned, and their sympathies were to be excited for him. He would describe the case of Mr. Rives by an anecdote. There was a notorious fellow named Tom Moore, who, after a long course of villany, got into jail in England, and while there he instructed a jackdaw to say a few sentences. Tom played at cards in jail, and continued his tricks there which he had practised when out. The jackdaw looked on all the time, and, as Tom cheated his companions, the jackdaw cried, "Damn it, how he nicks them." At last Tom got hung, and the jackdaw got out among some birds of his own sort, and they were discovered in a farmer's barn making havoc among his corn. The farmer closed the door upon them, and Tom Moore's jackdaw flew upon a beam; from which, as the farmer tore off successively the heads of the rest, he cried, "Damn it, how he nicks them." This at length attracted the farmer's attention, and, looking up, he inquired, "Pray, sir, how got you here?" "Bad company brought me here," was the reply of Tom Moore's jackdaw. And as to poor Mr. Rives, it was bad company that brought him here.

Well, now, let them go into the circumstances of this case. In 1819, a resolution was passed by which each House agreed to appoint its own Printer—to do what the Constitution authorized them to do separately. That continued in force till 1829, when it was so modified that a majority was required to consummate an election of Printer. Well, this continued in force, or at least continued to be respected; but it was, if not unconstitutional, at least unnecessary. As far back as '34 or '35, the House utterly disregarded this resolution, and, instead of putting the appointment of the Printer at the end of the session, they had thrown the appointment to the other end, and made it at the commencement. So the House had done for the last four or five sessions; and it was now without a Printer, having put off the appointment to the next session. But that was not all. The House had not only not considered itself bound by the resolution, which gentlemen told them was the law of the case, but the House had gone on, and, by a resolution of the last session, had varied the terms, and considerably reduced them. Now, if the House was not bound by this resolution, on what principle could it be said that the Senate was bound? If it was a compact between the two Houses, it was a reciprocal obligation; but if the other House was not bound, neither was the Senate bound; and they were neither bound, because the Constitution, which was paramount to all law, gave them the power to elect their own officers. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania said this was a contract—a binding, obligatory contract, to the execution of which their honor, their good faith, their fair dealing, were all pledged. And how did he make it out a contract?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will answer the Senator, if he will permit me.

Mr. CLAY. At the proper time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thought you desired an answer.

Mr. CLAY. I do at the proper time: at my time, not at your time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I await your time.

Mr. CLAY. The argument of his friend [Mr. BAYARD] must have satisfied every one that heard it, that it was an office. What was the fact? Why, this Editor—this senior Editor—had stalked about this hall, day after day, having got the entree on the express ground that he was an officer of the Senate, for he could have got it on no other ground. But being regarded as an officer of the Senate by the Vice President, who had lately vacated his seat, he walked about with all the freedom of any other person who had the entree of the Senate. Then, as to this contract under this resolution: was it a contract because it specified the terms, the fees, and the compensation? Why was not that the case with district attorneys and marshals? Were not they compensated by fees which were specified?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The time was not mentioned.

Mr. CLAY. Time! let me put it to that gentleman. Suppose the party, when it had the power, had chosen to appoint a Printer for ten years, running through General Harrison's term and into that of his successor, so as to disable us from separating ourselves and disencumbering ourselves from the putrid mass, so to be lashed to our bodies and borne by us the whole time—would the contract have been binding? Or suppose the contract, instead of for a term of years, had been for life? Now, in all the cases he had mentioned—those of an attorney, a marshal, a clerk, or any other officer—there were duties specified by law and as clearly enumerated as by the resolution of 1819. But all these held office, subject to the will of the appointing power. Now, in all these cases, what does the contract amount to? To fulfil the duties while they remained in the employment. Well, that is part and parcel of this contract, assuming that they are officers, and he thought it had been proven by the express terms of the resolution of '29 and of '19. What did they do? There was an election. Who succeeded? The one having a majority. How voted for? By ballot. How declared? In the usual mode. The whole ceremony was like that this morning, when they proceeded to the election of a Sergeant-at-Arms. There was an election by ballot—an election by a majority; there was the giving of a bond, the taking of an oath, and the performance of official duties; and, if all these did not create an office and make a man an officer, he should like the gentleman from Pennsylvania to favor him with a definition of an officer. It was the common case, then, of an officer. But they had been reminded of a passage of that inaugural speech delivered the other day, and which he trusted the gentlemen would study and profit by in all its parts.

They were reproached with violating some of the principles of the party coming into power, which were professed when out of power: How? Why, did gentlemen on the other side imagine that the party in power were going to consummate the triumph of proscription by retaining this man, because they had protested against proscription when it was carried on in this nation without regard to services or character, and when persons were introduced of an opposite description and of inferior merits? Could gentlemen "lay that flattering unction to their souls?" Why, if they were to let this man remain, it would be the triumph of proscription—an absolute triumph. He knew not what the rules might be which would be adopted by the Executive department of the Government; but he trusted they would see none turned out but those who were incapable, dishonest, faithless to the Constitution, or who had improperly intermeddled with the elections. That was his principle; and on a former occasion he understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania as giving in his adhesion to it. But gentlemen seemed disposed now to put themselves in opposition; and, on the first day of this session, they rose en masse. But if the gentlemen thought they could excite the sympathies of the country with such a being as Francis P. Blair, let them go out with him to the people, and proclaim the injustice which had been done to him. All he (Mr. CLAY) would wish was that they (Mr. CLAY and his political friends) might not be associated with him. If there was no other ground for his dismissal, he (Mr. CLAY) would go on the ground of infamy of character of the print and the Printer. They might be indicted on that ground. And let him tell Senators that, the other day, when the late and the present President, in a manner so honorable to themselves, were exchanging courtesies with each other—a spectacle with which every manly man must be gratified—that day was fixed upon by this Globe, as a foreign minister told him—for he (Mr. CLAY) scarcely ever saw the dirty heet—that day this man who, against their protest, and all propriety, was to be forced upon them, selected to issue a tirade of abuse and scurrility against the President in power. If they regarded the character of the country at home or abroad, he ought to be dismissed; and he would tell them there was scarcely one circumstance that had done their party more mischief than the retention of such a man and such a paper as the official organ. Now, he said, on the ground of the character and reputation of the man and of the paper, they owed it to Christendom—they owed it to themselves—they owed it to the purity of the national character, to disconnect themselves at once and forever from these men. On the ground of the notoriously bad character of the print and the Printer, he should invoke the Senate to displace them, and give them no longer the sanction of an official character. And what injury would be done them? They were the Printers to the Senate to the 3d of March, and they executed all the duties to that time. Their new office, from which it was proposed to dismiss them, they did not enter until the 4th, and they knew that the attempt would be made to dismiss them. They were notified of it; and what injury then could happen? As to their bond, he hoped, after the passage of this resolution, an order would be made to return their bond to them. They had been put to no expense—they had incurred no outlay. It was but an attempt to prolong their power after the termination of its legitimate exercise, and to force on them (the present majority) unacceptable, unwelcome Printers, whom they had given notice they should attempt to remove as soon as they possessed the power to do it. The time had now come, and he trusted they should avail themselves of it, and by a majority adopt the resolution.

Mr. WALKER said they had been accused of being guilty of an abuse of power in electing a Printer for the next Congress. But if this were an abuse of power, it was one which arose out of a joint resolution of both Houses of Congress, which was passed more than twenty years ago, and which had been repeatedly acted upon by both Houses, and with perfect uniformity in this body. It was a strange abuse of terms to call that an abuse. They were acting precisely in conformity with the law of the land; and they were doing what had been uniformly done by all their predecessors from the period at which this joint resolution was passed to the present period. He repeated, then, it was an abuse, a gross abuse of language and truth, to say this was an abuse of power. But it was asked to be considered an abuse of power, because, at the period when they proceeded to this election, a new Senate was about to come into power, which would be composed of a political majority opposed to the majority which went into this election. And here again they had to complain of these very Senators who now charged this on them (the present minority) as an abuse of power. He would refer to the journals of the Senate of the 28th of February, 1835, but four days before the expiration of that body. And here he would remark, that the session of 1836 had been called the expunging session; but he thought that should be changed, and hereafter this should be called the expunging session, for here this body was to expunge a law of the United States—a joint resolution which had all the sanction of law; they were about to expunge a contract—yes, this body was about to expunge both law and contract. Now, let them see what those very gentlemen, who now charged the present minority with an abuse of power, did before the period arrived when they had to go into a minority. They did what they (Mr. WALKER and his friend) did ten days ago—they elected a Printer. Here were the proceedings on the 28th of February, 1835. And mark the date—but four days before that Senate was to expire.

Mr. PRESTON, in pursuance of notice, moved that the Senate proceed to the election of Printer of the Senate to the twenty-fourth Congress.

Mr. WRIGHT asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the question was decided in the affirmative—ayes 27, noes 18. Among those voting in the affirmative were Messrs. CALHOUN, CLAY of Kentucky, CLAYTON, EWING, MANGUM, PRENTISS, PRESTON, SOUTHWARD, TYLER, and WEBSTER.

A motion by Mr. BENTON to postpone the election was negatived—Ayes 18, noes 28.

The Senate then proceeded to the election, and after 15 ballots, Mr. WRIGHT moved to postpone the balloting indefinitely, which was decided in the negative.

The Senate then proceeded again to ballot, and on the 18th ballot, Messrs. Gales and Seaton were declared to be elected Printers to the next Congress.

Then the Senators who now charged on them [Mr. WALKER's side of the House] as an abuse of power, the election of a Printer on going into a minority, did the very same thing themselves, and at a time when they were going into a minority, by the election of Gales and Seaton. And what did the Democratic majority do? In 1836, having then a majority in the Senate of the United States, did they come forward and annul the contract and the law of the land? No: they had too much regard for the sanctity of the law, to place unhallowed hands on a contract which had been entered into in pursuance of law; and, though they had an absolute majority, they submitted as freemen ought, and allowed Gales and Seaton to continue as Printers to the Senate, and during their two years to derive all the profits arising therefrom, which were enormous. He repeated, they were allowed to remain as the Printers to the Senate, by a majority opposed to them in sentiment. He had almost said, how dare gentlemen, in the face of this fact, and in the face of the country, charge the Democratic members now with an abuse of power?

Well, but what were the reasons given? Here was a motion to dismiss the Printers, and reasons were given. One was the infamy of the Printer. What! was that Printer who was charged to be an officer of the Senate, and whom they were asked to dismiss, on his trial? And were the Senators his judges? If so, who were his accusers? What were the charges? What was the evidence on which those charges were to be supported? For one, he (Mr. WALKER) challenged gentlemen on the other side to the proof. He called for specifications, and for proofs, and he appealed to them not to condemn unheard. Infamy of character! He denied it, and he again called upon gentlemen for proofs. Did they not all know, and had they not met, year after year, and during this very year, Senators and Representatives opposed to us in politics, and one who is now a cabinet minister of General Harrison, in social converse with, and partaking of the hospitality of, the man who was now charged with infamy of character? If he were infamous, did that cabinet minister partake of his infamy—for he was an individual who had known this Printer, and his private character well, in Kentucky during the period of his residence there, and more recently in Washington. He (Mr. WALKER) challenged proof of that character. If he was to be turned out, let him be heard—give him the privilege of an American citizen. Let him be confronted with his accusers, and let proof be adduced. Not only did the Senator who made this charge reflect on the cabinet minister who had partaken of this Printer's hospitality; but, when he charged this Printer with infamy, did he intend to charge infamy upon every Senator opposed to him [Mr. CLAY] in politics, who, ten days ago, voted for this man as the Printer of the Senate. Reasons must be given, and this must be the reason. Execution must be done. The blood of the first Democratic victim was that day to be sprinkled on that altar; but, instead of being rendered infamous, he would be exalted as the first martyred victim, under the proscriptive principles of the new Administration. But, if he could not be removed on the ground of infamy of character, which he (Mr. WALKER) wholly denied, on what other ground was he to be removed? Why, it was plainly on political and party grounds. If he was to be removed because he was the head of a party press, and the head of another party press was to succeed him, it was a direct attack on the liberty of the press. This man was to be punished because he had advocated political doctrines opposed to those of the majority of this body, and a system of rewards and punishments was to be adopted to influence the press. A political editor was to be punished, and a political editor whose doctrines are consonant with those of the present majority of this Senate was to be rewarded. It was a most daring, open, and flagrant attack on the liberty of the press. It had but one parallel, and that was the celebrated case of William Duane, who, in 1800, during the last expiring days of the dynasty of the elder Adams when carrying out the sedition law, was brought up on a charge of libel on that body. That Democratic editor had opposed the administration of John Adams—he had opposed the violence of many of its acts and proceedings; and for this he was brought up before the Senate of the United States. And when he was called up, the counsel that he proposed to advocate his cause—the then Mr. Dallas and Mr. Cooper—were refused to be heard, and he was directed to be prosecuted for a libel on the Senate of the United States. But that, the first attack that was made on the liberty of the press, in the person of William Duane, consigned most of its actors, if not to infamy, at least to expulsion from political power; and he (Mr. WALKER) warned gentlemen that this act, that this bringing down of the political guillotine on the head of this individual—the depriving him, in this summary manner, of his contract, without charge, without accuser, without specification or accusation, and without being heard, might be followed by similar effects. It would be in vain to attempt to delude the country on this subject: there was not a human being that would believe that this was not a political proscription—that this man was not proscribed and deprived of his office or contract because he was the editor of a free press, and promulgated doctrines that were opposed to those of the party in power. For that, in this summary manner, they were to violate both law and contract; and, in the language of the summary resolution of the Senator from North Carolina, they were to dismiss him from office. Well, let it be done; and, though the dismissal might be summary, he (Mr. WALKER) said it might end in the dismissal of those whose first act was proscription.

On the motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON, The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 9, 1841.

The resolution to dismiss Blair and Rives as Printers to the Senate, being taken up—

Mr. HUNTINGTON said, when he rose yesterday to address the Senate, it was not his intention to discuss, at large, the merits of this resolution; nor was it now his purpose to do so. When, a few weeks since, they had before the Senate the resolution to appoint these gentlemen Printers to the Senate, he improved the opportunity to express his views on some of the points, incidentally, and on others more particularly, which were involved in the resolution now before the Senate. It was not his purpose to repeat them; and he would not now say one word on the resolution, were it not that he felt desirous to reply to some of the arguments that had been urged against it—some reply to what had been brought forward; and he asserted (with deference to the honorable member to whom he should allude) what he considered some of the most extraordinary positions which had been advanced in the Senate. And although it was stated by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] who advanced them, that he believed he could be sustained by every judge on the bench below them, and by every judge and respectable lawyer in the Union, notwithstanding his respect for his [Mr. B's] legal attainments and his abilities, he felt almost constrained to say that he did not believe, that out of the Senate these positions would have been advanced and attempted to be maintained by any respectable professional lawyer, or that the opinions could be lawfully maintained. He might be wrong. He did not profess, and ought not to have, entire confidence in his own views, but he believed that on an analysis of the subject, it would be found that the charges against them could not be successfully maintained. What were they?

1st. That the office of Printer to this body is in no sense an office; that what he does is merely mechanical; that he is employed under contract, and not as an officer, and as such, not subject to removal.

2. That if he be an officer, it is competent for this body to contract with him as such; that they had no right, and it would be a breach of faith and honor on the part of this Senate to pass this resolution, for the effect of it would be to break their plighted faith, and disregard their plighted honor.

These were the two positions; and it would be his design to show that they had no foundation in principle or in analogy.

The Senator had stated what, he had no doubt, was the conviction of his own mind to this Senate, and it had gone forth to the country that a repeal, or rather that a removal and dismissal of these men implied in it a breach of contract; and those who sustained the resolution now on the table were to be held out to the community, as those who, in effect, were prepared to break down the inviolability which ought to be thrown around, and by the Constitution and laws of the country is thrown around, all legal constitutional contracts.

He (Mr. H.) did not belong to that class of politicians who think all is fair in politics; nor to another class, who think that the spoils belong to the victors; nor yet to another class, who think that the supremacy of the laws, and the solemnity and binding obligation of contracts, is not to be maintained. No: his habits, his employment, his business in life, had led him at least to the maintenance of what he conceived true doctrine; and that was, that the laws, the Constitution and laws, are supreme, and to be maintained; and that lawful contracts are to be enforced. When this was presented, (if ever such a case should occur,) that a resolution should be passed by either branch of Congress, or both, directing the performance of a great public work, after a contract had been made, they would not find him one that would rise in his place and offer a resolution, that the contract should be rescinded.

He should not contend that it was not binding, and support a resolution which, if passed, would destroy the obligatory force of the contract. No: if this resolution implied in it any thing of the nature of a breach of contract—if its effect was, in the slightest degree, to violate the honor and faith of the Senate, he would be one of the last, in this body to interfere with its due and free execution.

But believing, as he did, that there was in this act proposed to be done, no interference, in the slightest degree, with any contract, expressed or implied—believing it was in the power of this Senate to pass this resolution, in the legal, constitutional power; and believing, further, that it was required, he should come up, and, if there were any responsibility in voting in favor of it, he should take this responsibility, and feel that he was discharging what he not only had a right to do, but what, under the circumstances, was an imperative duty.

The resolution implied two things: one was—that this Senate has the right to dismiss its Printers;

And the other was—that it is expedient to exercise that right. These were the only two points involved in the resolution.

In relation to the first—whether they had the right to pass it (he did not mean merely to vote on it) but whether they had the moral right to pass this resolution—he proposed, for the purpose of meeting the objections which had been urged against it by the Senator from Pennsylvania, (and he would consider it in a very brief manner, for it lay within the compass of a nut-shell,) to endeavor to answer them.

Suppose there had been no joint resolution. The resolution to elect them did not purport on its face to be in consequence or pursuance of a joint resolution. It was nothing more or less than this: "Resolved, That the Senate will to-morrow proceed to the appointment of a Printer"—not for two years, under the joint resolution of 1819, but "for next Congress." Suppose there had been no joint resolution prescribing the duties, the compensation, the mode of appointment, &c. and they had appointed the Printer, could they not have removed him under this resolution?

Is he an officer of the body? If the Senator from Pennsylvania was right, they could not have removed him, if there had been no joint resolution; because, he tells you, that he is not an officer—that it is a contract made, and we cannot dissolve it by our own act.

This brought up the question, whether the Printer was an officer or not? The Senator from Pennsylvania said he was not, but that he was no more such than many individuals who performed services for the Senate; and asks, "is the page who waits on us an officer? Is the person that makes our fire, prepares our stationery, or repairs the clock, an officer?" And then asks whether they are not as much officers as the Printers to this body? They were required to do certain specific acts, and so is a printer. How, then, do you distinguish between the two? Did not the intelligent and honorable Senator perceive the difference; the difference between the page that waits on us here, not appointed by the Senate, and the Printer appointed by the body? If the Printer was not an officer, he (Mr. H.) wanted to know what was an officer? Is our Secretary an officer? He took it for granted that this would be agreed to by all. Why was he an officer? Was it not because he has certain duties to perform, and because he is appointed by the body to perform these duties? Was not that the reason? But the page, and the man that repaired their clock, was not appointed by the body; the Secretary employs him, and appoints him, but not the body itself; he was not, therefore, an officer of the body. If a Printer was not an officer, they had not an officer, except the Vice President, whom the Constitution declares an officer; and whom you cannot remove, except for misdemeanor, for there was not the slightest difference, excepting the duties to be performed, between the Printer and Secretary. What does the Secretary perform? How was he appointed? By the body—to perform certain duties necessary to the well being and honor of the body. What is your Printer? Does he not your printing, instead of writing it out? Do you not require of him the performance of certain acts? What difference is there between the two, excepting that, in the one case, your Secretary does certain specified duties, and has an annual salary; the Printer does some others, and has a different compensation? But in both cases it was a public office—a public appointment, made by the body under the Constitution, under which they were assembled.

Was there any mistake in this? Was he mistaken as to the conclusion they must come to, independent of the joint resolution? And could any one doubt that when under the joint resolution they declared they would appoint an officer, whether they did appoint an officer? They appointed one yesterday, (the Sergeant-at-Arms.) Was he an officer? Could they not remove him to-day, just as they could the Secretary—just what the President does every day he pleases—remove an officer that he appoints? Did the fact that his duties are mechanical make the slightest difference in the case? It seemed to him perfectly manifest, that, independent of the appointment of Printer under the joint resolution, there could not be the slightest doubt that such a person, appointed to perform such duties by this body, was an officer. If he was, (and nothing else was the case,) no principle of parliamentary law was better settled than that an officer holds his office at the will of the body appointing him. He should not go into an illustration of this point, for he was sure that he should have the assent of all Senators to this—that, as a general rule, the Clerk, the Secretary, and officers of Parliament, hold their office at the pleasure of the appointing power.

Another reason why he might be removed. It was not only incident to the nature of the office that he might be removed, but indispensable, as the case may be, to the due observance of the rights of the Senate. If their Secretary should think proper to divulge confidential communications made to this body, could they not remove him? Could they not pass a resolution dismissing him, and appoint another? Suppose he insulted them in open Senate—were they obliged to keep him in office as Secretary? Were they obliged to go through the formality of proceedings to remove him, or could they not get rid of him at once? How was it with the Printer? Suppose he should abuse their confidence, and, when a confidential communication was given to him, should publish it in his newspaper—was it not indispensable, as the case might be, to the preservation of the rights of the Senate, that this person should be dismissed? It was inherent in the very constitution of the body: unless they had the power to remove a person whom they appointed as a servant, there was an end to the body—at any rate, to the preservation of its honor and dignity.

He would not enlarge further on this, but would assume, if there were no joint resolution on this subject, the case would be clear, and then they could pass this resolution without the slightest infringement of obligation.

This brought him to the more important point, to the able argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania, in which he had said every thing that could be said, with that skill and ingenuity that always characterized him in debate. What was the resolution? He would not now go into the difference between the resolution of 1819 and '29. That of 1819, if any lawyer would examine, he would see that it expended its force at the first appointment. He agreed that of 1829 provided that there should be an appointment within the last thirty days of the session; but it did not say how long he must hold it; that of 1819 did—"for two years." Did it make the slightest difference in point of principle whether this officer was appointed under the joint resolution or without it? It was not the creation of an office; the Constitution had prescribed in relation to this. The Constitution said they should appoint him; and though the joint resolution was merely carrying out this principle, it did not make an office—this was what he supposed to be a misapprehension of the Senator from Pennsylvania, as to its nature. Was there any thing in the resolution which made him less an officer than if he was appointed without it? So far from it, the resolution, even of 1819, did nothing more nor less than this—it pointed out in words, specifically, certain duties to be performed by the Printers; it directed the mode in which it was to be performed—the compensation; and then specified the time when to be appointed; that was all. He asked the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to this view of the joint resolution. He (Mr. B.) considered it as creating a contract between the two parties. There was no contract in this resolution—nothing in the form and nature of a contract—nothing more nor less than a declaration that they had certain duties to perform, how they should be paid for, and then at what time the officer to perform them shall be appointed. But did this make him less an officer? Was there any thing of the nature of a contract connected with it? If any one (which he denied) admitted that a contract grew out of the office, it was one which, if the office becomes vacant, or the officer be removed, was annulled and the official bonds with it, which are nothing more nor less than a bond for the faithful performance of the duties while in office.

He would illustrate his view of the joint resolution by a case which was so perfectly analogous, that the human mind could not distinguish between them. They had what was called a sub-treasurer; and then his duties are pointed out, and the mode and time when to be appointed—that was explained by the Constitution of the United States. If he had not been appointed by the resolution, he must have been by the President of the United States.

Now, because the duties were pointed out, the compensation pointed out, and because he gives bond and security, could not the President remove him? Was there any doubt about this? The Treasurer of the United States has certain duties to perform. Who appoints him? The Constitution says the President, unless Congress provide some other manner. Is the Treasurer an officer? Admitted. Can he be removed at the pleasure of the President? Why, has he not entered into a bond to discharge the duties faithfully? And if this Treasurer is such an officer, having specific duties to perform, and as such could be discharged, notwithstanding he had been appointed, could not the Printer, who is appointed an officer under the joint resolution, pointing out his duties, be removed? Let us take the case of the Secretary of the Senate. Suppose, instead of there being any law on the subject, he was appointed by joint resolution, or otherwise—that the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives should perform certain duties, pointing them out—he would suppose there was a similar joint resolution, only substituting the "Secretary" for the "Printer"—that hereafter the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House shall be confined to these duties, to wit: (he then specified the duties;) and that he shall receive his compensation, $3,000 per year, during the next Congress, and then that it proceed, just as this has done, "that on the first Thursday of the first session of each Congress they shall be appointed." Suppose that it was in the form of a joint resolution, could they not remove their Secretary if they pleased? Suppose we had required bonds of him: cannot we remove him because his duties are pointed out? He thought there was no doubt on this subject. Could they not do the same with the Printer? He might go on and multiply these remarks almost indefinitely. As to the nature of this resolution, he would not now go on into the discussion of it at length. He should not inquire whether it was one that could not be repealed by either body, without the consent of the President of the United States, but he wished to proceed on the principle that it was a law—a joint resolution; and then said that there was nothing more in the joint resolution than a declaration of the duties to be performed, and the compensation to be paid; and this was the case with any officer.

One word more. They had now, in the case of their Secretary, without the joint resolution, the duties marked out for him, implied by law. Did there not attach to every officer of the Senate certain duties that he must do? That he must be prompt in his attendance here—that he treat this body with all due respect and decorum? Was not this implied in the very nature of his office?

Did the joint resolution add any thing to the nature of his obligations? Was he less an officer? less subject to removal? If he did not very much mistake the nature of the joint resolution—for he could not think that any gentleman who voted for it supposed that there was any thing more in it than the declaration of what specific duties should be performed—that was all that the joint resolution proposed. He was an officer just as much; so that the joint resolution and the whole subject was brought within the compass of a single inquiry, and that was—independent of this joint resolution, (if they had merely passed a vote declaring that they would appoint a Printer for the next Congress,) could they not remove him? And if they could not, he begged leave to know if there was any officer whom, if they chose, they had not the power to remove?

He would endeavor, as well as he could, to compress his remarks within a short compass. The general view that he had in relation to this matter, considered this Printer as an officer under the Constitution; such an officer as, by acknowledged parliamentary law, is removable. The joint resolution did not make the slightest difference in the nature of the office; and in this point of view, he was prepared to say that the Senate has the power of exercising what was called their right, of removing or dismissing these Printers from office.

On the question, whether they should exercise it or not, he wished merely to say, that, the manner and the circumstances under which this appointment was made, not only justified, but demanded of them, that they should exercise this power; and that was the principle on which they were prepared to place it, independent of other considerations. He held it to be expedient to make this removal.

He knew much was said yesterday about "proscription," and we were told that the first blood of the first martyr was to be shed on your table. There was something rather ludicrous in this idea, of these gentlemen being martyrs under the circumstances under which they were appointed.

He wished to correct what he thought an error. The Senator from Mississippi had said, when the appointment of a Printer was made by the Senate in 1834 and '35, it was an appointment by one political body, when another, at the next session, would be of a different character. He did not so understand it. There never had been an instance until the present, of one political party in either branch of Congress appointing Printers for the body to succeed them, when it was known that at the next session there would be a change in the majority of the body; he believed not a single one. He agreed with the Senator from Mississippi, that at that session those who were in the minority at the commencement, unexpectedly became a majority, and the Printer was not removed. Look at your journal; do you not find that the same body that appointed the Printer in the session of 1834-'35, appointed the committees at the next session. They all knew what was the occasion, in some respects, of the change that took place. A number of the members were removed by death. He could tell of one; and when he thought of his name, he was filled with esteem and respect—he meant his predecessor, the late Mr. Smith, who came at the commencement of the session, and, before its close, the Supreme Being, in his inscrutable Providence, removed him by death. He did not speak of others who were thus taken out of the Senate. Thus a change was effected in the body.

He repeated, so far as he knew, there never had been an officer appointed by this body, by a political party going out of power, when it was known that the succeeding would be of a different character. This was the very first time, in the history of this Government, in which an attempt was made, by a defeated party just going out of office, to elect a Printer, known to be, or supposed to be, unacceptable to the party coming into power. It was known at the time, said at the time; and the Senator from Arkansas, whose frankness on all occasions was worthy of regard, did not hesitate to avow the principle on which they acted. Now, was there any obligation resting on them, either towards Senators or towards the individuals, that they should retain them in office? If there was any principle of propriety that should induce them to continue in office these Printers, personally repulsive to them—if he thought it ought to be done, he would not then vote for this resolution. But he could perceive none. He would dismiss the whole subject, therefore, with the remark, that on the requisite examination of it in every point of view, he had arrived in his own mind to the result, that this body had the power to pass the resolution; and, under the circumstances in which they were called to act on it, not only was it their right, but their duty.

Mr. KING suggested the following modification of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, which Mr. BENTON accepted:

"Resolved, That Messrs. Blair and Rives, having been duly elected Printers to the Senate during the late session of Congress, under the joint resolution of the two Houses providing for the election of Printers to Congress, it is not competent for the Senate to annul that election, and thereby divest the rights which Blair and Rives may have acquired by that election, they having entered into contract to execute the printing, and given bond, which has been approved, as directed by law."

Mr. HENDERSON said, by the amendment it would seem that there was a contract resulting from a law, and the objection to the removal of the Printer was predicated on that. Now, he proposed to show that there was no contract resulting from a law—in other words, he denied that there was a law at all. The resolution of 1819 he assumed to be void. It purported to be a joint resolution prescribing the form and manner in which each House shall elect its own Printer, and pay him. Now, if this were necessary, it was a law. If it were necessary that they should have the concurrence of the other House, and the sanction of the President it was a law; but if it were not necessary, if they had authority by which they could make this appointment—this resolution could add nothing to their original powers. The Constitution says, "every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary, (except on a question of adjournment,) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or, being disapproved by him, shall be re-passed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill." Now, the inquiry was, was this resolution such as, in the language of the Constitution, was necessary to be presented to the President? If it was, gentlemen were right respecting the resolution which they assumed to be a law. He denied that this, in the language of the Constitution, was an "order" or "resolution" that was to be presented to the President, or to which the signature of the President was requisite.

Without going into an argument on that point, after it had been so ably argued, he would assume that it was beyond contradiction. He took it for granted no man would contend, that, to empower the Senate to elect its Printer, it was necessary to confer with the House of Representatives or with the President, or that the Senate should have their concurrence. And how stood the resolution in its operation. Had the House regarded it as law? It was well known that the House had for years disregarded it; it had not been deemed obligatory by the House of Representatives, and the Printers had come in on different terms, and under different contracts. This being the case, it was shown to be no rule of action for the Senate, as it had not been for the House.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut said he should not have trespassed on the time of the Senate for a moment, if it were not that he had heard declarations made which he felt bound briefly to notice; and he would take the liberty to express his opinion as to the soundness of the contract claimed to be such on his side of the House, and so regarded by himself. There appeared to be a necessity—and that seemed to be conceded on the part of their opponents—to enable the Senate to dismiss these Printers, to make them officers of the Senate. All seemed to proceed on that ground; and without that, there seemed to be no claim on their part to dismiss the Printers, and to declare their contract void. Now, there had been a joint resolution giving the appointment of the Printer to the separate bodies, under which, for something like twenty years, the two Houses had appointed their Printers. But it was claimed by the opposite side that this had fallen into disuse, and that, therefore, it was not binding. He could hardly see how it could be regarded as not binding, after twenty years' observance of it. But it had been said that Blair and Rives were admitted on this floor as officers. Could it be pretended that they were under the control of this body as servants? No; but on the contrary, their contract pointed out what they should do. But he understood there had been a proposition to employ a Printer in a different way—that the Secretary should employ the Printer. Now, if the Printer were an officer, he asked whether an officer could be thus constituted by proxy? To his mind it was clear it could not be done; and to him it was equally clear that the Printers were not officers. He would ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments on another point. The dismissal of Mr. Blair was advocated on the other side, on the ground that he was an infamous man. If this were so, was it not to be supposed that the Democratic Senators, who gave him their support, knew that as well as the gentleman who made the declaration? Could it be supposed he could have acquired that character without every man there knowing it? And if he (Mr. SMITH) would give his support to an "infamous" man, to a cheat, a robber, or a debauchee, must he not be as "infamous" as the man he supported? But, before he was charged with that infamy, the man who made the charge ought to know that there was truth in the accusation. If, then, it was meant to reflect infamy on the Democratic Senators, he undertook to say that it was a false, and a vile imputation. But he would ask where he was to look for proof that their Printer was regarded as "infamous?" Was he to look at those entertainments which had been alluded to? Who were the men that were found there, and in intimate social communion with the man now denounced as "infamous?" He believed this man (Mr. Blair) stood as pure and virtuous as any man in the community, and he should not have had his (Mr. Smith's) vote if it had been otherwise. There being no objection, then, to his moral character, and the contract being legal and constitutional, he cautioned the Senate how it proceeded to annul the contract, and to declare it invalid.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, and it was negatived—ayes 25, noes 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, MacRoberts, Nicholson, Seyler, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Walker, Williams, Woodbury and Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Merrick, Moorehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—25.

The question then again recurred on the original resolution, on which the ayes and noes were ordered.

MR. CALHOUN said: I rise, Mr. President, as the question is about to be put, to state the grounds on which I propose to place my vote. There are some questions too clear to be supported or opposed by argument, and this appears to me to be one of that description. All that can be done in such cases, is to give a distinct statement of the points involved, and leave them to force their way by their own intrinsic evidence. It is that which I propose to do in the present instance.

The first point involved in considering this question, is, has the Senate a right to employ persons to do its printing? No one can doubt that. It is admitted on all sides.

The next is, can it enter into a contract with such persons for the purpose? How can that be doubted? How else could they be employed, but by contract, expressed or implied? It is the only mode in which it has ever been done from the foundation of the Government. At first, the mode was by letting it out to the highest bidder; but that was found to be objectionable. Persons not competent, and without adequate means, were in the habit of bidding for the contract on speculation, and afterwards either execute it improperly, or fail to execute at all. A change, in consequence, became necessary in the mode of selecting Printers, which twenty years ago terminated in the present; to fix the rate of compensation, and leave it to each House to select their Printers by the vote of a majority. Such has been the invariable practice ever since. It is, in fact, as far as the present question is involved, the same in principle with the original mode. The only difference is, that, in the present, the rate is fixed, and the persons selected or designated by each House by a vote of the majority; and in the original, the lowest bid determined both the rate and the persons. The execution, in each case, was under contract.

The next point is, has the Senate made its selection to do its printing for the time specified; and have the persons so selected entered into a contract to perform it? There, sir, on the table of the Secretary, lies the bond of Messrs. Blair and Rives, duly executed—signed, sealed, and delivered, with adequate security, and a heavy penal sum for the faithful execution of the printing; they having been previously selected, in due form, under the order of the Senate. Every thing has been done orderly, and according to the invariable practice which has prevailed for the last twenty years, without being disturbed, or questioned, under all the party changes which have occurred during that long period, until the present time.

It is this contract, thus made, that this resolution proposes to rescind, not directly, but indirectly, by dismissing Blair and Rives as Printers to the Senate, but which would be, in effect, to set aside and annul their contract; and what would that be but a plain and palpable violation of contract—a naked act of power and bad faith on our part?

Such is the inevitable consequence, from a simple statement of the points involved in the question. There can be no escape, but by denying that the instrument which they have signed, and by which they have bound themselves to execute the printing of the body, is a contract; and to this extremity have gentlemen been driven, against the plain facts of the case. For this purpose, they distinguish between employment and office, and insist that they are not simply persons employed to do the printing of the Senate, but that they are officers of the body, appointed under the provisions of the Constitution, which authorizes each House to appoint its own officers; and that, as such, they are as liable to be dismissed as our Secretary or Doorkeeper. I do not deny that all public employments may be regarded as offices, taking the term in its broad sense, and offices as employments; but the distinction between them, as far as the question of contract, or the right of dismissing at pleasure, is concerned, is as broad and plain as the Pennsylvania avenue. When the business to be done is to be performed by the person employed, it may be either one or the other, according to circumstances. If the capital and materials belong to the person employed, if he hires the workmen, if he runs the risk of loss and gain, he is simply an employee, and not an officer; and the engagement between him and the public a contract, and not simply a bond for the faithful execution of official duties, as this has been represented to be. The reason of the difference is obvious. A reciprocal obligation in all such cases, either expressed or implied, between the employer and the employee, always exists, unless there is an express stipulation to the contrary; and it is on such understanding of mutual obligation that the business of the community is almost entirely conducted.

Such is the fact in this case. Blair and Rives engaged to do the printing of the Senate at their, not our, expense. For this purpose a large capital must necessarily be invested in building, printing apparatus, and materials, accompanied by a heavy outlay in the hire of hands and incidental expenses. There is the hazard. If the building or materials should be burnt or destroyed; if prices should rise, so as to make it a losing concern; the loss is theirs, not ours. And is it to be supposed that all this hazard would be incurred without the plighted faith, on our part, that they should continue to do our printing, for the time stipulated, provided they should faithfully perform their engagements? The contrary supposition would be absurd. I put it to the Senators on the opposite side, if, instead of having the buildings and printing apparatus, they had erected the one and purchased the other, under the bond which they have given to execute the printing, would you not regard the dismissal an act of gross injustice—a violation of a fair understanding between you and them, which justified the incurring of such heavy expense on their part, as necessary to the execution of the work? And can it make their bond more or less a contract, because they happen to have them already in their possession? If you reverse it, and suppose the building, the printing apparatus, and the expense and risk, to be the public's, and not theirs, and that they had been elected to take the general superintendence of a public establishment, instead of their own, then, indeed, they would be officers in the sense you contended for, and liable to be dismissed, like other officers, and not mere employees to do the printing of the Senate, as they clearly are. Such and so wide is the difference between officers, in the proper sense, and mere employees, as far as the question of rescinding this contract is involved.

But it has been said that it has been decided that they are entitled to be admitted into this chamber on the ground that they are officers of the body. But is there not obviously a marked distinction between that and the principle on which the question of contract stands? In deciding by the Vice President the case of the right of admission, it was not necessary to distinguish between an officer and that of an employee, the performance of whose duty made his presence necessary here, as much so as if he superintended a public printing establishment as a salaried officer, and not a private one, at their own risk and expense, and even more so in some respects.

It is also said that their bond is no more a contract than that given by the collector of the customs, or any other officer, for the faithful discharge of duty, and which it is admitted does not permit his dismissal. What has already been said is sufficient to distinguish between the two cases. But suppose the case to be reversed, and that the collector, say of the port of New York, instead of being a mere superintendent, to collect the revenues of that port, at the expense of the public, as is the case, had made an arrangement with the Government to collect it at his own expense and risk, for a fixed period, at a given rate per centum, could he, in that case, be dismissed, so long as he faithfully performed his engagement, without violation of contract? If farther illustration of the difference of the two cases be necessary, the Post Office Department will furnish it. The two classes, officers and employees, are both to be found in that branch of service. The deputy postmasters are of the former description, and can be dismissed the service without violation of contract; but very different is the case with the persons employed to carry the mail. They do it at their own expense, and are acknowledged to be contractors; and can, as such, only be dismissed, as is acknowledged, in consequence of a positive stipulation in their contract to that effect.

But other grounds are assumed in attempting to justify this lawless act of power, as I must regard it. We are told that the other House have changed the practice under the joint resolution of 1819 and 1829. I reply, that each House has a right to interpret for itself; and it is not for us to say, whether they adopted the true interpretation or not. One thing, however, is certain, that they have never yet dismissed their Printer, or attempted to do so, even under circumstances any way similar to the present. But, suppose they had, would that justify us in departing from our uniform custom of twenty years' standing, and which, no one can doubt, is in conformity to the letter and spirit of those resolutions? But, sir, I lay both resolutions out of the question in the view I have taken. I do not inquire whether they are constitutional or not, or whether we have, or have not, conformed to them. It is unnecessary as far as the present question is concerned. It is sufficient that we have a right to employ contractors to do our printing; that Blair and Rives have been so employed, and that they have entered into a written contract, with all due solemnities, to perform their duty. If the original resolutions be unconstitutional, or if there be in what we have done any want of conformity to them, it is we, and not they, who are responsible. So say justice and common honesty, as well as self-respect.

But, sir, I have stated the case far stronger than is necessary for the side I support. I might waive our undoubted right to employ persons to do our printing by contract; I might admit it to be doubtful whether the bond given by Blair and Rives is a contract or not, and whether they are in fact officers or merely employees, and yet stand on impregnable grounds in maintaining that you have no right to pass this resolution. I might rest the question on the simple fact that you selected them as Printers, and have entered into a written instrument with them that they are to do the printing, and might concede that it is a disputed and doubtful point whether they are officers in the sense you contend for, or not, and yet show conclusively, on the soundest principles, that we have no right to do this act. We are one party, and they another, to this transaction—we the powerful, and they the weak; and is there any rule more fundamental, according to the code of morals, and the principles of our free political system, than that no one has a right to judge in his own case? Or that the right of decision, in such cases as this, belongs to another and appropriate department, and not to us? To assume the reverse, would be to assume that one Legislature had the right to set aside contracts entered into by its predecessors, whenever a question of doubt can be raised: no, still stronger, entered into by itself; for the Senate is a perpetual body. It is the body which authorized this transaction, that now undertakes to undo. Pass this resolution, and you would set a precedent, as inconsiderable as is the interest involved in this case, which would authorize any State to cancel its bonds, to revoke its charters, and annul its contracts, and to make it a question of mere expediency—of personal and party like and dislike—and not a violation of the eternal principles of justice—whether they should or not adhere to their engagements.

And with whom does so dangerous a measure originate? With those who have assumed to be the protectors of the sanctity of contracts—the champions of vested rights and chartered privileges; who, in their zeal, stigmatized their opponents as loco focos, agrarians, and contempters of plighted faith. And let me ask, at what time is such a measure brought forward? At the moment when the indebtedness of the country is greater than has ever been known; when many of the States have thoughtlessly plunged themselves in debt almost beyond their ability to meet their engagements; when the pressure of the times, and the example of the non-fulfilment of engagements by the great moneyed institutions of the country, have done so much to weaken the force of contracts, in the estimation of many; and when especially it is the duty of all good citizens, and this body in particular, which has such just and great influence over public opinion, to avoid any act which can, by possibility, be interpreted into a disregard of the sacred obligation of contracts. It is at such a moment that the party which professes to be the special guardian of the public faith, call on us to do this dangerous act; and for what purpose? The poor, the pitiful one of turning out Printers of one political faith, in order to put in others of a different; to put out Blair and Rives to put in Gales and Seaton, who, in no respect whatever, either in punctuality in the performance of their duty, or personal respectability, are their superiors. I cannot but express my amazement at the step, coming from the quarter it does, and with the course which, it is understood, the party from which, it comes intend to take in reference to a leading measure of policy—I refer to a National Bank. It is said, and believed, that it will be one of their first measures, and that on which they rely to carry through their avowed policy. Do you not see that this measure, as inconsiderable as it is, will furnish ground from which to assail such an institution with powerful effect? You propose to set aside this contract because you believe that the Senate has no constitutional right to make it. Is there not a large party in the country, now accidentally in a minority, who believe, and have believed from the beginning, that Congress has no right to charter such a bank, and have ever resisted its establishment in consequence of such belief? You believe that the instrument signed by Blair and Rives to do your printing is not a contract. Is there not a considerable portion of the community who believe that a bank charter is no contract? That it is a grant merely of a public franchise, which can be withdrawn at the pleasure of the grantor? If I may venture an opinion, I would say it is far more difficult to prove that this instrument is not a contract, than that a charter of a bank is one.

But we are told that we were forewarned not to make the appointment of Printers; that we would soon be in a minority; and that if we ventured, in spite of such warning, to appoint, that those we might select would be dismissed when the majority changed sides. Will not the same warning be given when you come to propose a bank charter? Will you not be told that it is clearly unconstitutional; that you have seized on the accidental ascendancy of your party, to force it on the country, against its sober and habitual conviction, both as to its expediency and constitutionality; and that, if you venture to act under such admonitions, your acts will not be respected when you come to be again in a minority?

Thinking, as I do, in reference to a National Bank, I would rejoice to see you raising up such difficulties in the way of the establishing one, could the effect of this pernicious example you are about to set be confined to that. But that is impossible. It will go far beyond, and be followed by immeasurable evils, unless, as I hope, the sense of justice in the public mind should react against what you purpose to do.

As to myself, I, on the present occasion, act on the same principles which guided me in 1834, on the question of the removal of the deposits by General Jackson. I then, and now, believed that the Bank had a right to the use of the deposits under its charter, and of which it could not be divested except on just apprehension that they were not safe in its vaults, or for its neglect or mismanagement as the fiscal agent of the Treasury. Thus regarding it, I acted with those whom I now oppose, in opposition to the removal, and that on the principle on which I now act. Of the two, I regard that a less clear case, as clear as I consider it, of contract than the present; and this resolution, should it pass, a more palpable violation of rights secured by contract, than the measure I then opposed.

Mr. KING of Alabama said he was not disposed to enter into a long argument. The clear, forcible, and incontrovertible ground occupied by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] rendered it unnecessary that he should say any thing. He felt that this matter was settled. He felt that argument was of no avail. He felt that an appeal to justice, to a sense of propriety, would be disregarded; that every consideration which ought to influence the Senate in the discharge of its duties, was to be set aside in this case. Did the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HENDERSON] know any thing of the history of this Government, when he got up here and told them that this must necessarily be an office, because the individual executed their printing? If that Senator would but turn his attention to the subject, he would find that, uniformly, individuals had been employed by contract up to the year 1819. Previous to 1815, they were employed by the officers of the two Houses, and they entered into bond for the faithful execution of the work. The Printers were not elected by this or the other House, but the Secretary and Clerk caused the printing to be executed for their respective Houses. In 1815, in consequence of its being believed that it would be more economical and better for the country that the officers of the two Houses should be associated together in contracting for this work, a resolution was adopted which he would read to the Senate. [The resolution was read, and directed the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, immediately after the adjournment of that and each succeeding Congress, to advertise for three weeks successively, in two newspapers printed in the District of Columbia, for proposals for supplying the Senate and House of Representatives for the succeeding Congress with the necessary stationery, printing, &c.]

Well, Mr. President, under that joint resolution, which thus became the law of the land, a Mr. DeKraft became the contractor. He was the lowest bidder, and he entered into bond to perform the work; but under that contract the printing was so badly done, that it became a serious subject of complaint in both Houses. The consequence was, that a committee was raised to ascertain the true value of the printing, for it had been intimated that this individual, from his anxiety to get the job, had stipulated to take less than it was worth, and consequently he could not execute it in such a manner as it was important the printing for Congress should be executed, and on paper of the proper description, without serious loss by his contract. At the head of that committee was Mr. Wilson, a Senator from the State of New Jersey, a practical printer. That committee reported, fixing precisely the prices to be paid for every species of work necessary for the printing of the two Houses. In conformity with that report, the resolution of 1819 was passed, and then it was they commenced designating the individual who should execute the work at the prices thus fixed. They had acted on that resolution from 1819 to the present time, without variation or change. What, he would ask, were the Printers of 1812, when Way and Weightman were, the contractors? Were they officers of the Senate? No one will venture to make the assertion. They were simply contractors, and if they violated their contract, they were liable to have it set aside, and suit brought against them for damages. What were the obligations of DeKraft as an officer of the Senate, when he became the contractor under the resolution of 1819? None—nobody ever pretended that he occupied any such official position. It would have been ridiculous to have done so: for, though the work was badly executed, he was held to his contract; while some other printer was occasionally employed to do portions of the work, he being compelled to pay the difference in the price. He (Mr. KING) believed they had never heard of the Printer being an officer of the Senate until a gentleman, now no longer a member of this body, took offence at something published in the paper of the then Public Printer, when he intimated his intention to bring the matter before the Senate, and to move for the dismissal of the Printer; but that gentleman backed out, for he knew he could not sustain such a procedure. Has it come to this, that this Senate, actuated by political or private hostility, or by individual griefs, should set itself to work to nullify an agreement with an individual who has done his work faithfully? Was any Senator here prepared to say the work was not well done? No: political hostility alone actuated Senators, and it was all they could avow. He (Mr. KING) had traced this matter from the earliest period to the present time, and he could entertain no other belief, than that the Printer was simply an employee of the Government; that he was like other individuals who contracted to do work, and if he failed to execute it, or did not do it correctly, he was liable to be prosecuted for damages. But, as he had already said, he felt that the thing was settled. The fiat had gone forth from headquarters, and those who in their secret hearts might regret it, were brought to do an act of which their judgments disapproved; being carried along by their party predilections to perpetrate it. He (Mr. KING) would not reply—his indignant feelings would not permit him to reply—to the imputation of motive by which it was alleged his side of the House were actuated. Such imputations were unworthy of the person who uttered them—unjust towards his (Mr. KING's) friends, and unworthy of this body. What were Blair and Rives? The contractors for the public printing. Suppose, for a moment, they were every thing that Senators in their places here have thought proper to denounce them for—suppose they were base—suppose they had no character—suppose they did not deserve the countenance or support of this body—were these sufficient grounds on which to set aside their contract, so long as the work was correctly executed? What was it to the honorable Senators whether those individuals were of good or bad character? He (Mr. KING) was not there the advocate of Blair and Rives; he looked beyond that—he looked at the principle involved, and the consequences which would follow to the country, should this resolution be adopted. This act would become a precedent, which must forever shut the mouths of the Senators who established it. No more shall we hear of the Democrats being agrarians—of being disposed to break down vested rights; or to violate the obligation of contracts; they must be forever silenced by their own act. But who is this Mr. Blair, who has been so violently assailed on this floor? If his (Mr. KING's) recollection served him aright, this man Blair resided years gone by in the State of Kentucky, where he figured as no inconsiderable personage. He was then the political friend of the Senator from Kentucky; his intimate associate; and, if he was not misinformed, his confidential correspondent. Was he infamous then? He presumed not. He (Mr. KING) knew nothing of Mr. Blair, except by character, until he made his appearance in this city some years past. Since that time, he had been on terms of social intercourse with him—had observed his conduct in the social and private relations of life; and he felt bound to say, that for kindness of heart, humanity, and exemplary deportment as a private citizen, he could proudly compare with the Senator from Kentucky, or any Senator on this floor by whom he has been assailed.

But he was the conductor of a political newspaper, which was abusive in its character. With the manner in which that paper was conducted, he (Mr. KING) had nothing to do. He should neither undertake here to approve or condemn. But were they to exclude, as Printers of the Senate, men who conducted political, or, if you please, abusive newspapers? Then they must exclude the man who, not twenty days past, in an address delivered on that avenue, and published in the National Intelligencer, grossly insulted every man, of both Houses of Congress, who was opposed to the present dominant party, by uttering and publishing what he must have known to be utterly untrue. Gentlemen speak of the importance of having for Printers, men who so conduct themselves as to produce harmony and good feeling in this body. Admitting it to be correct, and he (Mr. KING) was not disposed to question it, would the man who delivered that address, if elected Printer, produce this kindly feeling? He (Mr. KING) knew not who it was the majority in this body intended to elect as Printers; but he knew that gentlemen, actuated by political hate, were running counter to their declarations; and were about to do what they had denounced in such strong terms. The object cannot be mistaken; it is to wreak their vengeance on a political foe, and provide for a political friend. His friend and colleague had just suggested an idea, which he would throw out. Let the country hear it, and let the Senate understand it. Could Blair and Rives, having given bond, resign this appointment, without the assent of the Senate? No. The contract was made, and they could be held to their bond, and the strict performance of the duties they had undertaken. They could not divest themselves of their obligations, even if they would; yet the Senate, one of the contracting parties, was undertaking, in the power of their strength, to annul the contract, the other party refusing to set it aside. Now he did think, and he was in the habit of expressing his opinions plainly, that this was the most high-handed, and reckless assumption of power that was ever exercised by any deliberate body under the sun. It was a naked exercise of power, unmindful of justice, or of law, or of the sacredness of contracts; and if gentlemen could exercise that power under such circumstances, it was for them to do it, and for the country to understand it. Every man in this country who is engaged in executing work under contract with the Government, will be told, in language not to be misunderstood: "Though you do your work faithfully, comply with your contract to the very letter, you have no security for a moment. Any individual who possesses weight with the dominant political party, who is influenced to act against you by party hostility, or private griefs, can procure the abolition of your contract, even should it involve you in ruin." Let the country but understand that as the true state of the question here, and he (Mr. KING) would cheerfully abide its judgment. He (Mr. KING) had already said, and said truly, that it was not his intention to enter at large into this question. The argument was all on one side; and all the ingenuity of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HUNTINGTON] had failed to protect his friends from the force of the arguments which had been addressed to them by Senators on this side of the house. He (Mr. KING) was willing to gratify the Senator from Connecticut, and throw aside the joint resolution of 1819, under which elections of Public Printers had been made for more than twenty years. But, set it aside—admit that it has no binding force—does it affect this case? Not in the least. The election had taken place by a Senate competent to make it. What mattered it, then, whether the individual was designated under a joint resolution of the two Houses, or by the mere will of the Senate? The fact is that he was legally selected, that he has entered into the contract, and given the necessary bond, which is now on the table of your Secretary, still stare gentlemen in the face. There is no escaping from them. He trusted there was no Senator who would seriously contend that the majority who authorized the contract, had not the power to do so because that majority was soon to be placed in a minority—for upon that ground every act of the last session, which the Senate in its wisdom had thought proper to perform, might be set aside because it was passed by a majority, the political opponents of the present majority. But he felt he was expending his strength in vain, wearying his lungs for no good; he expected to convince nobody; it was settled; the fiat had gone forth, and these men were to be sacrificed. He warned gentlemen of the result to themselves from this exercise of power. They had the power, and they would exercise it. But he trusted in God it would open the eyes of the people, and cause them to see what they had to expect from such a reckless party. He (Mr. KING) was not one of those who, either in public or private life, ever, by indirection, accomplished any act. He pursued a straight forward course—one sanctioned by his judgment, and approved by his conscience; and if this case were reversed, and a proposition had been made, under like circumstances, to dismiss Gales and Seaton in 1837, he would have raised his voice against such a wanton violation of the faith of the Senate, and of a solemn contract. They (Mr. KING and his friends) were then as much opposed politically to those individuals (Gales and Seaton) as the honorable Senators opposite could be to the individual now under his trial. Yes; his character was on trial, for that was the point on which the whole matter was made to turn. He (Mr. Blair) was on trial, without the possibility of defending himself. An American citizen, possessing equal rights with his accusers and judges, is put on trial, his character branded as deep as Senators on the other side could fix it, and he is denied the privilege, which belongs to every freeman in this land of liberty, to be heard in his defence. Was this what they had a right to expect from the Senate of the United States? Was this the promised reform? Was this the high, the liberal, the manly spirit which was to actuate the Whig party? They had recently heard much throughout the whole country (should he be permitted to call it rant and fustian) about proscription for opinion's sake; and this is the first act of those gentlemen who are exerting their utmost energies in opposition to their own professions. Yes, but a few days had passed, since they had heard speech after speech denouncing proscription.

What a beautiful illustration is this procedure of the doctrines then laid down. He was pained to see an American Senate enter into this matter in this spirit. He had been here long, and his associations were of an intimate character with many who entertained different political opinions from himself. He could say, and no man could gainsay it, that political differences alone had never induced him to cut off social intercourse with those he deemed to be gentlemen. He acted with them as gentlemen who honestly differed with him. He held his opinions, and was willing they should hold theirs. He himself never gave a vote for any measure which his judgment did not approve; but he did not reproach others who differed with him. This body (said Mr. KING) has been called the highest tribunal of this country—perhaps of the world. Should the Senate, then, to get clear of a political opponent, fritter away this high character? Should it induce this people to doubt that the Senate of the United States is the protector of right, the frowner-down of every thing that is wrong? He hoped not. He hoped, for the credit of the respective States, whose sovereignty we represent, such an example would not be set. He would not further detain the Senate. It had not been his design to have said any thing, but he could not repress the feelings of his bosom.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he rose to say a few words on a collateral point. He was perfectly aware of the relation in which he stood to the Senate and to this country. He was aware that he was now, as heretofore, to be the object of attack, of concerted attack. He stood now, as he had stood heretofore, firm and erect, and ready to repel assaults, when worthy of his notice, from whatever quarter they came.

He had said, in the course of his remarks yesterday, that he believed the Globe to be an infamous paper, and its chief editor an infamous man. He said nothing of gentlemen on the other side, who chose to vote for this editor as Printer to the Senate. But by matter of unlawful inference and illogical deduction, two or three had risen and undertaken to consider that they partook of the infamy of Blair and Rives, if they be infamous. If any one of them had appealed to him to say whether he regarded them as infamous because he regarded this principal editor as infamous, he should promptly have said that he had no such views. But no such appeal was made to him; and yet the Senator who sits in the corner yonder, [Mr. SMITH of Connecticut,] and who must excuse him if he (Mr. CLAY) considered him unworthy of his notice, had gone on in a course of general remarks, which were evidently intended for him, (Mr. C.) He, however, should have said nothing to him, [Mr. S.] but a Senator, who he supposed considered himself responsible, had gone a step further, and had chosen to class him (Mr. CLAY) with Blair, and to consider Blair as equal to him in every point of view—in reputation and every thing else. Now, this was altogether an unparliamentary proceeding. They had the right to comment, and in the freest manner, on the character and standing of persons nominated for office, or who had come before them as these men had done. During his long services in the Senate he did not know that he had spoken of an editor, or of his newspaper, unless the matter came up before the Senate; and when he spoke of the infamy of this man, he spoke of him in connection with his daily libels. He scarcely ever looked at a paper, edited by this man, in which his (Mr. CLAY's) name appeared, which was not filled with untruths and misrepresentations. Not long ago, this same editor called the honorable Senator from South Carolina, John Calhoun, and it was charged by this very editor that it was impossible for him [Mr. Calhoun] to speak the truth. And in return, it had been said of that editor that he looked like a galvanized corpse. Now, if they were to take the character of this editor from what his present friends had said of him, they would find it to be infinitely worse than any thing he had said, bad as it might be. But he (Mr. CLAY) should be unwilling to take the character of his (Mr. Blair's) present friends from what he had said of those friends, for he considered him a common libeller, and the Globe a libel; and for the Senator from Alabama [Mr. KING] to undertake to put him on an equality with Blair, constrained him to say that it was false, untrue, and cowardly.

Mr. KING rose and said: Mr. President, I have no reply to make—none whatever.

Mr. SMITH rose for the purpose of saying but one word in answer to the Senator from Kentucky. It seemed that he (Mr. SMITH) was not worthy of that Senator's notice.

Mr. CLAY. Not at all.

Mr. SMITH. But the Senator from Kentucky was worthy of his notice. He did not, however, design to take a view of those characteristics of the honorable Senator on which he (Mr. SMITH) presumed that Senator prided himself; but he was willing to admit, if the character of that honorable Senator was to be formed from the acts of his public and private life, he did possess a character far more notorious, in some respects, than his, and a character with which he (Mr. SMITH) did not desire that his should be compared. That Senator pretended to despise him. What was it for? He had undertaken to say that he (Mr. SMITH) had thrown out remarks to him. But why should that honorable Senator take any thing he (Mr. SMITH) had said, to himself? Was it because he (Mr. SMITH) had repelled as vile slanders as ever came from a vile hearer? Humble as he (Mr. SMITH) might be, he would not descend to the prominent points of the character of that honorable Senator, which gave him so much fame all over the world. He (Mr. SMITH) did not belong to those walks. If, however, the Senator thought those prominent characteristics of his reputation gave him a distinction of such elevation as to place him (Mr. SMITH) beneath his notice, he would not, in return, call him "the Senator who sits in the corner," but he would leave him to the people; who, four years hence, will show the Senator, as they have shown him heretofore, that they understand his reputation and know how to appreciate it.

Mr. PRESTON regretted that any thing should have occurred that should have driven honorable Senators to do any thing inconsistent with parliamentary decorum; and then proceeded at length to speak on the resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT then obtained the floor, but gave way for a motion to adjourn.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, March 10, 1841.

A message was received from the President of the United States, containing several communications of an Executive character.

The resolution to dismiss Blair and Rives as Printers to the Senate, being taken up—

Mr. WRIGHT said it was his intention to occupy the time of the Senate but for a very few minutes. They much more frequently than they were aware of, he apprehended, made their conclusions govern their reasons, rather than considered well their reasons, and let them dictate their conclusions. It seemed to him that their respected opponents, on this occasion, were governing themselves by this perverted rule; and it should be the object of his few remarks to show wherefore he pronounced this conclusion. Let them look at the history of the action of this body for the few days of this extra session. On the day before yesterday a vacancy in the office of Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate was filled: a majority of the body decided—and it was not then his purpose to complain of that decision—that their public duty required that it should be filled. It was not exactly contended that any thing in anticipation during this short session required the filling of that office, but that in prospect an extra session might be held, and a Sergeant-at-Arms might be required, and the proper performance of the duty of the body was to fill the office then, and it was filled. Now they had a Printer to the Senate, and he expected the judgment of the body was about to be pronounced that they should have none, for the form of the proceeding before them did not look to filling a vacancy. What was the argument in reference to the Sergeant-at-Arms? That he should have time to prepare himself for the discharge of his duties, in the case of an early call of Congress. If that was a good argument for the appointment of a Sergeant-at-Arms, could they say to-day that they should dismiss their Printer and have none, because the Sergeant-at-Arms was an office requiring preparation, and that of Printer to the body was a place, whether office or not, requiring none. It seemed to him they should not; and he did not for a moment suppose such a train of reasoning would be indulged in, and yet it was his desire to present to the body the action of the body as it had been, and the action as it was proposed to be. Why was the law of 1819, in the shape of a joint resolution, passed? Because, as he had always been informed and believed, it was supposed that this business of printing required time—that types, and presses, and hands, and paper, and ink, were to be accumulated, preparatory to the business of Congress; and hence it was that the expiring Congress named the Printer for the succeeding Congress. Now—and they were sitting, in his judgment, in a very questionable form, to perform any of these acts, but he had no further argument to make on that, for it had been decided by the Senate—sitting, then, he repeated, under circumstances which rendered the whole very questionable, they were called upon to dismiss—call it an officer, if they pleased, or a contractor, if they pleased—that agent of the body that was connected with the public business, in relation to whom, in all time past, Congress had supposed time was required; and they had decided, in relation to an officer about whose duties Congress had never before formed any such judgment in either branch, that he should be appointed in advance, and have time to prepare for the discharge of his duties. This seemed to him to be the position in which they were placing themselves, and he desired to couple this consideration with the fact, as he believed it, that they were then, for the first time, within the history of this Government, sitting as a Senate alone, no Congress being in session—sitting under an extraordinary call to aid an Executive in forming his Administration—they were sitting with open doors, keeping their journal in the form of legislation, and transacting this business, which no Senate before had ever been called upon to transact. And what had been the justification? That the last session of the Senate, which expired on the 3d of March, had been guilty of a usurpation and abuse of power in appointing this Printer. And was that so? And was it to be so said in that chamber, and to that body? Why, how long had that usurpation continued? Certainly ever since the passage of the resolution of 1819—twenty years he believed. A few days ago was the eleventh occasion on which the Senate had thus appointed a Printer, and was it now discovered, for the first time, and by his respected opponents on that side of the House, that this was a usurpation? He remembered very well, a few years ago to have seen the same thing done by them; and if it was not a usurpation then, it was not a usurpation now. He did not design to discuss the question of power—it had been better discussed than he was able to discuss it; he merely desired to present to gentlemen the practical effects, and what would seem to him to be the practical deductions. Well, then, so much for the manner in which a dismissal of officers of the Senate, as gentlemen now choose to claim them to be, was proposed to be made at this extraordinary session, and in this extraordinary manner. And now for the time, and particularly as it was applicable to the resolution on the table. He believed it found its way there on the 4th of March. The President had completed his Inaugural Address, and had taken the oath of office, but, he believed the fact to be, that he had not had time to clear the walls of the Capitol on his way to the President's House, when that resolution was laid on the table of the Senate. There was then most certainly nothing lost in point of time. And the resolution was—what? To dismiss an officer, say gentlemen—an officer of the Senate—and he desired it to be understood that he did not intend to discuss the question whether the Printer was an officer or not; for that, too, in the course of this debate, had been fully and clearly discussed by his friends much more ably than he could discuss it himself. He cared not whether the Printer be an officer or a contractor, or what they pleased—it was, he supposed, assumed to be a resolution to dismiss a person in the employment of the Government by a competent authority, in the form of law. Well, in that Inaugural Address, and coming from one who ought to be the organ of the party in power—of the party which had placed him on that high elevation, what did he tell them?

"It was the remark of a Roman Consul, in an early period of that celebrated Republic, that a most striking contrast was observable in the conduct of candidates for offices of power and trust, before and after obtaining them—they seldom carrying out, in the latter case, the pledges and promises made in the former. However much the world may have improved, in many respects, in the lapse of upwards of two thousand years since the remark was made by the virtuous and indignant Roman, I fear that a strict examination of the annals of some of the modern elective Governments, would develop similar instances of violated confidence."

It would be his duty, by and by, to refer very briefly to what were the pledges, before the election, of that distinguished man, on this particular point; but he did not propose to do it now. He merely desired the Senate to remember that that speech was delivered, and that this resolution followed instantly upon it. And now, for the reasons for that removal—because they had seen the manner of the action, and the time of the action—and he gathered those reasons as he had heard them given there. Was it that those contractors had failed—for the same individuals who are now the Printers to the Senate have been so for several years—had there been a suggestion of any failure in the performance of their duties as Printers? He had heard of none, neither as to the time of accomplishing their labor, nor of the manner of its accomplishment. Then, as to the performance of the trust which they had undertaken to perform for the United States, fault was not found. Well, as individuals, as private citizens, perfectly separate, in every sense, from their connection with a political partisan newspaper, had fault been found? He had not heard it. He had enjoyed a considerable acquaintance with those two individuals for some years, and he owed it to them to say, and he said it cheerfully, that in private life he found them amiable and estimable men, correct in their moral deportment, so far as he had ever seen or heard, and esteemed by the society in which they lived. As connected with their newspaper, he had heard fault enough; he had heard none in any other connection; he assumed that none had been found. Then, how stood the matter? They are the conductors of a political newspaper; and because that paper had been conducted offensively to their opponents, they were to be thus summarily dismissed from the place they held, whether it be a contract or an office. It was, then, a political removal, and nothing more nor less. It concentrates itself in that; and no other aspect, he presumed, would be attempted to be given to it. He had never, in his life, been in the habit of entering into discussions as to the mode of conducting the public press. He hoped never to indulge in them. He knew the press, upon all sides, was conducted with too much looseness; he wished it were better. He was not disposed, on this occasion, to make a distinction between the press on one side or the other—he merely desired to bring this discussion to the point that, for reasons connected with the Globe newspaper—reasons purely and exclusively growing out of the angry political strife of the day—this dismissal was to take place. There the action was based; and if he had understood all he had heard, it was based on that alone, and had no greater extent. Now, having considered the manner of the act, the time of the action, and the reasons for it, let them look a little to the political parties and their relations. And here he must be permitted to say, what he hoped he need not at any time say, that he did not design to make any remarks calculated to excite. He did not design, nor had he any occasion to make, any personal remarks; but he had the right, and he believed it was his duty, to state what he believed to be the present history of the country in reference to political parties. And he appealed to every member of the body, and he appealed with as much confidence to his opponents as to his political friends, whether there had been any single point in the last heated and exciting political struggle more distinctly set forth, and more constantly debated before the country, than the point of removals from office for political opinion's sake? Had there been any outcry against the last Administration, and the one which preceded it, more commonly raised than that of political proscription for opinion's sake? And how long since was it that he heard, in this chamber, from a most eloquent Senator, now no longer a member of this body, that he had seen officers of the Federal Government whispering their opinions, because they durst not pronounce them under that proscriptive Administration? And while that honorable Senator said this, he repudiated and condemned that proscriptive policy; and he (Mr. WRIGHT) had read to them, from the Inaugural address of the President, what he seemed to suppose was to be the practice of his party. He (Mr. WRIGHT) did not charge on the President—he did not believe, in his heart, that the President had any agency in this matter. He did not intend to condemn the President in advance. He did not mean to condemn any man so; but the country had a right to expect that he was the exponent of the principles and practices of his party. And what now is that practice? An instantaneous removal of a political opponent. A movement made in point of time, he believed, sooner than any movements of such a character, at any period of the history of this Government, and a movement, as he had attempted to show, and as he believed the fact to be, to remove merely for political cause. He would not, on this occasion, go into the arguments which connected this movement with the public press. He would only ask Senators to pause and consider how long it had been since their printing had been performed by any other contractor than the conductor of a partisan newspaper? Certainly not since the passage of the law of 1819. And what were they then declaring? That if their Printers were the conductors of a partisan newspaper, they must "whisper" their opinions, as an honorable Senator had said; and that they were not to express them boldly and like freemen; that if they proclaimed their opinions in their journal or newspaper, they must meet with dismissal from Congress. Was not that the practical condition? And had they not, then, the right to turn to their opponents, and ask them if they were authorized to expect this as the first step of this Administration which was to annihilate proscription? He knew the paper spoken of had been a warm political paper; he did not know that it had been any more so than two others, and the only two other prominent journals in this District. And he thought he did know that neither of the persons connected with the Globe had ever committed, either as editors or as men, so flagrant an abuse of the Congress of the country, as another editor had committed in a public and official speech, within a few days, in the streets of this city. He would not now either read that speech or comment upon it; but he mentioned it to show that all editors were violent partisans; and that whether writing for their newspapers, or in their official capacity, they write with a freedom of language sometimes not tolerated by truth. Could they restrain their licentiousness? Should they, sitting there in that capacity, try? In his opinion they should not. He had already said he should not discuss the question whether the Printer of the Senate was an officer of the Senate, or a contractor with the Senate; but this he simply would say, that the argument of an honorable Senator, made yesterday, based principally on Webster, did not satisfy his mind. The honorable Senator had argued that an election must produce an officer, and the Senator asked if any body had ever heard of an election of a contractor. Well, if the honorable Senator would tell him (Mr. WRIGHT) how he could obtain a contractor for even his private business, without an election, he would answer his argument. He (Mr. WRIGHT) knew of no other way; and he considered, so far as the honorable Senator's argument was concerned, that it was enough to say that the choosing in this case, or the election, by the vote of the Senate, was merely the selection of a man to perform that duty; and that instead of imposing it on their Secretary to elect a contractor, as well as to make the contract, the Senate chose to designate the individual, leaving their officer to make the contract with him. And this appeared to be a proper use of the term. Webster said, to "elect" was to "pick out, to select from among two or more—to select or take for an office or employment—to choose from among a number—to select or manifest preference by vote or designation." And the definition of the word "election" in Webster, was, "the act of choosing; choice; the act of selecting one or more from others; the act of choosing a person to fill an office or employment by any manifestation of preference as by ballot, uplifted hands, or viva voce, as the election of a king, a president, or a mayor.

They might as well elect a man to do a job of work as to elect a President of the United States; it was only a mode of designating the individual whom they would put in charge of certain duties. They might designate a person for a certain position, and call him an officer; they might give him a commission and rank, as in the case of a purser in the navy, mentioned yesterday; in another case, they might name the contractor to build their house, or a post office, or a patent office, or to do their printing. He did not desire, however, to protract this discussion; nor was it necessary, for this point had been argued so much more clearly and ably than he could do it. He would, then, trouble them no longer than to say that his purpose, yesterday and to-day, had been simply to place before this body this subject as it had presented itself to his own mind, and to call upon them to say whether it was in conformity with what should be understood to be the declarations of the President, and whether it was in conformity with the protestations of the party, before they reached power.

And let him say to those gentlemen, that we (the late majority) might have done many things wrong; but those gentlemen would be wise not to follow our bad example. And yet we never denied that we preferred to carry on the Government, when in power, through the agency of our political friends, than through that of our opponents. They did not repudiate doctrines of this kind; they avowed the doctrines to the extent to which they practised them. But what was charged upon them? That they avowed them to the whole extent. Well, look at their practice; and he feared some of the friends of the gentlemen opposite were regretting that they had not gone further. He (Mr. WRIGHT) said this in no ill temper. He had found several of his acquaintances, on visiting this city, were astonished to find such a number of offices filled with what they considered "good Whigs." Yes, the prizes were infinitely diminished because they had not pushed this doctrine further. They (the late Administration) did not repudiate it; it was the other side that did so; and he begged the gentlemen opposite would not lead them into the practice of a doctrine which those gentlemen had themselves proscribed.

Mr. MANGUM spoke at length in support of his resolution. He denied that it was predicated on the sole ground of political opinion; that had its influence, but, in addition to that, there was a want of personal confidence in the present officers. The Printer of the Executive documents of the body must necessarily be informed of the progress of the most delicate negotiations; and by the infidelity of the Printer, these negotiations might be broken off, and this nation might be thrown into a war with a foreign power. It was necessary, then, that they should have an officer in whom they could have strict personal confidence, and not one whose predilections were with an opposing party. He had no wish to deprive any man of any legal right; but rather than keep in these Printers, he would consent to pay $100,000, if awarded by a legal tribunal. The character of the Senate, the dignity of that body, their self-respect, and the public opinion of the country, required that these men should walk out of office.

Mr. SEVIER was "not so soft" as to imagine that any thing that he or those who acted with him, could say on this subject, would prevent the passage of this resolution. The thing was fixed, and he considered that sometime between this and the first of June, Blair and Rives were to be dismissed from being Public Printers; and he only rose, and he supposed his friends had the same intention, to tear the mask off the gentlemen opposite, who were about to illustrate their spirit of toleration, of which they had said so much to the people. It now seemed that their toleration, and kindness, and forbearance, of which they had been told during the last three or four months, was to turn out, as he had ever believed it would turn out—a sheer humbug, and he wished it to be seen by the spectators and the country, that it lasted until the 4th of March, and no longer. A friend of his had this morning read an extract from the Inaugural address. He (Mr. SEVIER) had not had time to read the whole of it, but he should do so on board the steamboat on his return home. He, however, listened to it and heard much of Rome and Asia Minor, and Scandinavia, and the Roman Empire, and he knew not what, but he should resume the discourse at the earliest opportunity. They also heard of forbearance and toleration; but who believed it? Who of the twenty thousand or thirty thousand persons who heard it—half of whom were office seekers—believed, for a moment, that that forbearance and toleration were to be carried out into practice? He (Mr. SEVIER) had no faith in those professions, nor of their retrenchment either. They had already had one chapter under the head of retrenchment, in the election of a Sergeant-at-Arms, who would have nothing to do but to receive his salary until the meeting of the next Congress; and this was to be chapter one, under the head of reform. Now, he regretted that the gentlemen did not come forward with manly boldness, and say "these men must die, and we will behead them." They had the power, and that was reason enough. Why, the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PAXSON,] who had addressed them, had talked about the joint resolution being a nullity, and he had said that of that resolution they had power to disencumber themselves. But did not that Senator himself, in 1835, and perhaps before, too, vote to elect Printers for this body before the 4th of March? Well, if it was unconstitutional now, it was unconstitutional then; and why did not that honorable Senator get up in his place and object to it? Why did he vote to sustain what was unconstitutional? Did a change in the body from a majority to a minority change the constitutionality of that resolution? No: its constitutionality stood the same, whether the gentlemen were in a majority or minority. It had been very properly said that this was a permanent body, and that the election, whether before the 4th of March or after, was good and valid. It had been acquiesced in before, as he found, on looking at the ayes and noes. It had been the practice for twenty odd years, and no one ever disputed it before. Why, in the other House, in 1833, Gales and Seaton were elected with ninety-nine votes; but, afterwards, a document was published, signed by a hundred members, in which they stated that they voted for Blair and Rives, and yet Blair and Rives lost their election. A new election was claimed, on the ground that Gales and Seaton had been chosen either by fraud or mistake; and what then was the cry from the "glorious Whigs?" What did Gales and Seaton say? Why, column upon column was written to show that what was done by that body was beyond the reach of subsequent interference, and the election was considered settled, when those Printers had a majority against them in that Congress.

But now, they were told it was indiscreet and improper that Blair and Rives should be retained, because they had confidential printing, and they might betray the secrets of the body. Well, if they did, remove them, and he would vote for it; but had they not hitherto printed confidential documents, and was there a man there who could charge them with having betrayed their trust? Would they prefer giving the printing to a man to be selected by this body, who, unable, to discharge his duties, having neither types nor presses, should transfer their confidential printing to others who were not designated by the Senate, and in whom the Senate might not have confidence? The thing had already been done, and Allen of the Madisonian, when elected Printer some time since, was obliged to transfer it to Gales and Seaton.

But one Senator had said that the main object was to remove Messrs. Blair and Rives. Well, go ahead and do it; all he (Mr. SEVIER) wanted was, that they should boldly avow what they do. Let them come forward like men, and say it was their will and pleasure—let them say it boldly, and do it like men; for such reasons as were given, contrary to the practice of years, were lost on him. One Senator would remove Blair and Rives, because, he alleged, they were forced on them at the last moment. He had no doubt Blair and Rives were unacceptable to those gentlemen; but was that new? Were Gales and Seaton acceptable to his side of the House in 1833 and 1835? No: these things were the result of the accidents of party warfare, which had always been, and always would be, acted on as long as this was a Government. He (Mr. SEVIER) was one of those who had helped to gag it down on those gentlemen, and he would do it again if he had the power. But he had risen merely to tell these galleries that this cry about toleration was all humbug. They had already the whole matter illustrated in two chapters—the one headed "Retrenchment," and the other "Reform;" and he wished the gentlemen to take down their false sign, and to put up a true one.

Mr. WOODBURY observed, that at one time he had not expected to take part in this debate. Most of what he afterwards intended to say, had been recently explained by others. He should, therefore, crowd himself on the attention of the Senate for only a few minutes, and on matters connected with his peculiar position, on what was not already exhausted. The questions before us probably appeared somewhat different to him, as a new member, than to those who had occupied a seat here in February, and mingled in the excitement and discussions which accompanied the election of the present Printers. To him some of these questions seemed extraordinary. He was summoned here to a session of the Senate without the House of Representatives; and, of course, a session for the transaction of Executive business merely. This body was a permanent one; and hence it was supposed that no new officers were to be elected, if no vacancies already existed. But if they did exist, he entertained no doubt we could complete the organization of the body, and fill those vacancies, if the officers were believed to be necessary, or if we had any business for them to do; and whether such an election was conducted with open or closed doors, was not very material, it being an organic measure, or, in other words, an act of inherent power, or, as denominated by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] "absolute power." It was neither legislative nor executive, strictly speaking; but being one of organization, it seemed proper, either to precede any other business, or to be taken up when the necessary occasion demanded. But what did we see? Was the office, employment, or contract of a Printer vacant? Nothing of the kind. The resolution under consideration was not then required to organize this body, but tended directly to disorganize it. It went to create vacancies, instead of filling them. It assigned no reason whatever for making them, and did not even propose to fill them, when made. On its face, therefore, it seemed disorganizing, as well as out of order, irregular and unnecessary. Most unfortunately, then, we commence our proceedings in disorganization. Where they will end, remains to be seen.

But it has been observed that sometimes, if not on this occasion, it was justifiable to force vacancies, and then proceed to new elections. In such cases, however, it would seem a proper preliminary, that in some report, resolution, or motion, reasons for it should at least be assigned, if not proved, in order that it might appear on the record why action was proposed, and definite notice given of what was to be met. If the last election of Printers was considered unconstitutional, or, if the incumbents had since grossly misbehaved in their official capacity, why are not these grounds of removal regularly set forth? If, considering the Printers merely officers, and in no respect contractors, it is admitted that various grounds might be supposed which could be considered sufficient, if duly stated, and proved. But unless these were done, the proceeding looked extraordinary, and new members were acting in the dark; and our journal, he feared, would appear discreditable. But, aside from this, what reasons have been assigned, orally, in favor of the resolution? Nobody has pretended, in this debate, as I understand it, that the election of Blair and Rives was unconstitutional. The mover himself [Mr. MANGUM] says he will not call it so; and if the opposite side, as a party, seriously assumed such ground, their acts should correspond, and they would at once proceed to choose successors to the present incumbents, instead of offering this resolution to remove them.

The resolution itself, then, recognises them to be in office constitutionally. Indeed, they were elected at the usual time, in the usual manner, and on the usual terms, which have prevailed for nearly twenty years in this body. What should impeach such an election? The only argument against its validity that I have heard on this occasion, has been, that the other House had recently obtained their printing to be done at a less price than was provided in the joint resolution of 1819. But it would be difficult to prove that the departure from the law by one House vitiated its force with the other, which might prefer to adhere to the law; or that the members of the other House could not procure their printing to be done more economically than the law required, if opportunity offered, and still not be guilty of any illegality, nor the law itself become void.

Considering these Printers, therefore, as duly in office, and, for argument, merely at this moment, that no contract exists, but that the present resolution proposes to dismiss them from office only, the question—and, in my view, the first, if not the most important question—recurs. Is it intended to be done with or without cause? Which? Its language is silent on that point, and hence the natural inference may be, that the removal is contemplated to be made without cause. Yet several gentlemen, in debate, strongly disclaim any such design or motive, and detail various reasons for the measure. But, in the threshold, all of us ought to form explicit opinions on this point. It is due to justice, frankness, manliness. And if, in truth, any member votes for the removal without cause, then I presume the act, in him, is admitted to be an arbitrary act. It is merely sic volo—sic jubeo. It is an act which I will not presume ever to occur, as it appears to me one utterly unworthy this dignified assembly. It would be sheer caprice and wantonness; and if not rank injustice, it at least can never be vindicated in the high forum of the American Senate.

Whatever a collector might do to a tide-waiter, in a moment of irritation and displeasure, this assembly of ambassadors from the sovereign States of our great Union, can never set an example of removal without any cause whatever, because so derogatory to it, and at the same time so dangerous to other legislative assemblies. Over our whole country, they look up to us for decorum, gravity, caution, and wisdom. Beyond all this, if these Printers be at the same time contractors, which I shall endeavor to demonstrate hereafter, such a removal, without any cause whatever, would not only be arbitrary, and of evil example, but grossly illegal.

In either view, therefore, whether as officers or contractors, I understand all the gentlemen on the other side who have spoken, admit the existence of a cause for the removal, and thus admit the impropriety of acting without one. Then, what is the cause? what its validity? and how is it ascertained or tried?

The gentleman from North Carolina, who offered the resolution, says it is a cause, not solely political. The member from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] avowed it was a cause touching something infamous in the management of the public press. Others appeared to speak of mere political difference of opinion as sufficient to justify the removal. Others, who have not yet spoken, are supposed to be ready to vote for their dismissal, either for that reason alone, or for that, coupled with some indefinite, undefined incompatibility of temper, difference of fashion and appearance, or want of harmony in feeling and taste. Now, let me caution gentlemen who may, even in common cases, remove from office for a mere difference in political opinions, though most on the other side, it is believed, are pledged not to remove at all for that cause, that they stand on very slippery ground in removal of printers for a mere difference in political views. In the first place, the sufficiency of this cause in ordinary instances is viewed not alike among all gentlemen on either side. But I do not propose to discuss that question now. Be it remembered, however, that he who votes for this removal for that cause alone, and has heretofore censured others for removals on account of it, must admit that he has done a wrong to others, or is now doing one himself.

If his course be now right, so was theirs. But much more than this. If such a course was right in relation to officers not Printers, and adopted by ordinary tribunals, it by no means follows that it is expedient or justifiable in respect to a class of officers connected with the public press. Nor should it ever, in my apprehension, be hastily exercised, in the unusual form now proposed, by such a political tribunal as the Senate, whose doings can be communicated to their respective States only to a very limited extent, except through a free, bold and vigilant press. I say, then, in this view, that the present is a new case in our annals. Grant, then, that some gentleman may feel justified elsewhere in making, for such a cause, the removal of an ordinary officer, it should require grave consideration in them as Senators, members of a representative body, to drive away from around that body, merely for a difference in opinion in politics, the only watch dogs of their masters—the people and the States. They are the sentinels who scrutinize our conduct, and daily report it in behalf of our constituents—the public censors, to criticise it fully and fearlessly—to expose errors or foibles, and hang up vices, if any, to indignant reprobation.

Again, are we to claim to be above mistakes—immaculate? Are we alone to be screened and all beside exposed? Are we more holy than other citizens? In brief, the effect of such removals, if not revolting to public sentiment and causing a speedy and scornful re-action, cannot but tend, however well meant, to sap the whole foundations of the liberty of the press. It lays the axe at the root of its independence. It tends to render it craven and cowardly—to silence its warnings—to make it fawn around power, rather than expose its wrongs or rebuke its usurpations. It is the business and duty of political editors to be vigilant, and indeed censorious, where occasion appears to require it. It is their fearless vocation. Shall we attempt to unnervise them? Can error of opinion be tolerated at all, unless reason is left free to combat it? And will not liberty of conscience become also in jeopardy by such a course? But, gentlemen exclaim, at least the Senator from Kentucky does, these Printers are to be removed, not merely for difference in political opinion, but for harsh reflections on members of this body—for libellous strictures—that require this kind of punishment, or justify such retaliatory measures. This opens a new and wide field for reflection. Real libels are a crime, and punishable as such at common law. Are we to accuse others of crimes, and punish them here in this summary form—without hearing—without a specification—notice—a jury—counsel, or witness? Are we to do all this, also, in our own cases, interested and ex parte? to be accusers, judges, and executioners? This course has been called military, but is it not going beyond even a drum-head court martial? The humblest citizen, for the smallest offence, is by the Constitution entitled to the benefits of the 6th amendment, in the following words: "For all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation—to be confronted with the witnesses against him—to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence." Our officers may libel others, or assault others; and their conduct then, on complaint, comes before us for examination. But we should not then remove them without specified charges and a hearing; and will we act differently when our own interests or feelings render us less safe and proper to judge? These circumstances illustrate the importance of ascertaining, as I have attempted, whether these Printers are to be removed with or without cause; and if with cause, for what one? Is it for a crime, and a crime against us, or for a mere difference of opinion? The different consequences to the parties likewise show the importance of these distinctions. If you had proposed to remove them without any cause, then the act being merely arbitrary, would tend to affix, and would affix, no stigma or reproach on them; but rather it would fix them on ourselves. We should be considered wanton and tyrannical. Again, if you remove them for cause, and that a mere difference in opinion, it would not tarnish nor brand them with any disgrace, because differences of opinion, under free institutions, are inevitable, and often honest. All of us must, therefore, be content to go in and out before this great people frequently, as we happen to agree with, or differ from, the majority, however acquired; and though at times we may feel and assail the temporary delusions, the supposed deceptions, and, indeed, the occasional tyranny of majorities, no wound is given to our characters by retiring to private life.

But when majorities seek to expel an individual from office for an alleged crime, for what is denounced as infamous, and when that attempt is made by the very body against which the offence was committed; the whole scene becomes changed.

The individual and the body are both in a new attitude, and considerations spring up that overshadow all questions of the rights of property and contracts, and all mere differences of political opinion. The good name—the immediate jewel of the soul—is in danger, and the tocsin of alarm and inquiry cannot be sounded too loud, because the deed, if done, may affix a foul stain on the victim, which will last and spread as long and as far as the mighty power of the press itself.

The party accused may, therefore, in such a case, before sentenced to ignominy, well expect full notice, a deliberate hearing, and witnesses confronted against him, if not an impartial tribunal, for trial. He may, as in the present instance, have wife, children, and friends, the solitudes of relatives, the charities of neighbors, and all the comforts and honest pride of life around him. Are these to be thus suddenly blasted? Are ruin and dismay to overwhelm the whole at once by an ex parte condemnation for crime, and this not in a corner, or by some pie poudre court, unknowing and unknown, but by one of the highest tribunals in the world, so as to diffuse the fatal poison more quickly as well as injuriously, through all the veins and arteries of the community?

In the other aspect of the transaction as affecting our own character, it may also be wise to consider whether a different course of proceeding be not due to ourselves and the reputation of this distinguished body, as well as of the sovereign States we represent. A proper self-respect, moderation, and delicacy, seem to require of us unusual caution not to do wrong, while complaining of wrong—nor to be hasty, where the consequences to others are lasting—nor, perhaps, to condemn at all, where we ourselves are a party in interest, and the other side has been unnoticed and unheard. Gentlemen may truly say, that their motives are good and their convictions strong. But others, even in this body, widely and conscientiously differ from them in opinion on the whole case. Is, then, a one-sided, ex parte action on the subject either liberal, chivalrous, or humane, to say nothing of justice? Is it not in a free country, with equal rights and with the glorious institutions of courts and juries, an action open inevitably to much criticism and suspicion? Can it escape rebuke on both sides of the Atlantic?

It is not enough, in a tribunal like this, to be like Cæsar's wife, pure in intention; but, it may be becoming, at least, if not indispensable, to adopt a course of action entirely above suspicion. Some may ask what other step than the present one should be adopted, when the majority believe the accused to be guilty? I answer, follow the usual course of inquiry and trial. The course that finds a ready approval in every heart, soul, and head, in a country of equal and just laws. Give the accused notice of the specific charges against him; and by all means hear him before you strike. Again, as to any kind of trial here, in our own case, undoubtedly this Senate may be as safe as any other interested tribunal. But if no imperative necessity exists for an immediate and final trial here, and especially one which will appear to the accused at least as possessing some indecorous haste, why not send him and his conduct first, as others are sent, to be tried by the courts, and under the usual constitutional forms, in order to ascertain guilt or innocence.

If individuals here feel aggrieved, as well as the majority, they can prosecute also for damages, besides indicting, and then the transaction will assume the ordinary aspect of one under the reign of the laws, and not be exposed to the suspicion of one prompted in any degree by passion or prejudice. At least, let us know and have specified the precise circumstances in which the supposed outrages have been perpetrated, before we proceed farther in condemnation, and see if we ourselves can agree whether they are libels or not. It is very likely to turn out, that, amidst twenty lawyers in this body, who should scrutinize these particular cases, not five of them would agree, independently of any political consideration, whether they all were or were not libels. It is unmanly to be too sensitive or thin-skinned on these subjects.

Again, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] says, common fame is enough to condemn the Printers. Would he or I like to be tried by our political enemies, as to political topics, on common fame? Would we not both be in some danger of the lamp post or the guillotine? Have we not both been clothed over and over again with what we considered, and in many cases knew to be, atrocious libels? Have we been exempt from slanderous attacks even in Congress? I expect to continue to be assailed with my full proportion of newspaper abuse—perhaps even for some of these remarks. But far be it from me, on that account, to claim any new mode of punishment for libels, or wish to revive any exploded old mode, like a star chamber or attainder, or the sedition law. I would pursue no different course than heretofore, and think that, if I could not in time live down defamation, I was not worth living. Others may take different views of such matters: they have a right to. Let such, however, go to the laws for protection and redress—the old, sturdy, common laws of a free people—which, ever since Magna Charta, they are unwilling to have changed. These are ample to punish all ordinary offences. But do not resort to any new mode of effecting the object, by summarily and unceremoniously dismissing the supposed offender from office, as if he had committed some scandalum magnatum, and was to be punished in some absolute monarchical form, which many will not hesitate to regard as unworthy the liberality of the present age and the justice of so enlightened a body as the Senate.

Some have likened this case to a contempt. Such was the suggestion of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HUNTINGTON.] He asks could we not, and should we not ourselves punish for a contempt on the Senate? I feel obliged by the suggestion. The doctrine of punishing for contempts, by either judicial or legislative bodies, in its old and unlimited use, has long been my utter abhorrence. It has been, in that use, one of the worst relics of the barbarous ages of despotism. In the first place, the party which accuses is also the judge. This is contrary to all the elements of impartial justice. In the next place the punishment by fine and imprisonment may be almost unlimited and wickedly oppressive, when inflicted, as it often is, under the irritation of wounded vanity, or the stings of supposed insult.

Who can read, without horror and detestation curdling his blood, the cruel and excessive punishment of cropped ears—long imprisonment—heavy fines—the bastille and banishment formerly inflicted for libels and contempts? But even in contempts the accused is heard. Not, it is true, before a jury, which should be the case generally, but he is still notified and heard—witnesses are examined for and against him—specifications filed. Why not then, at least, do as much in the present case? When an editor, in 1827, was accused of violence committed within the walls of "this building on a messenger of the President of the United States, did we attempt to try him without specific notice, and a full hearing?

So shocked were Congress, after impartial inquiry, at the latitude and wide constructive powers assumed by courts and legislative bodies on this subject of contempt, that they hesitated to punish, even though the offence was perpetrated within the Capitol, but not in their presence. And after the trial of Judge Peck, who was impeached here for oppressive conduct in the punishment of Lawless for a supposed contempt, though even Lawless was notified and heard by the judge, an act of Congress was immediately passed, which took away the power from courts to punish for such offence, unless committed in their actual presence, or in the actual obstruction of legal process.

It provided, expressly, (see act, March 20, 1831,) "that the power of the several courts of the United States to issue attachment, and inflict summary punishments for contempts of court, shall not be construed to extend to any case, except the misbehavior of any person or persons in the presence of the said courts; or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of the said courts, in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any officer of the said courts," &c. "to any lawful writ," &c.

Shall we go beyond the limits deliberately imposed on courts by ourselves, and punish as contempts, or quasi contempts, acts not done in the presence of this body, nor upon our officers, nor obstructing any of our proceedings? and do it, too, without notice or trial of any kind? Shall we punish for supposed libels published a mile distant, and in the usual pursuit of one's business and profession as an editor?

Let us see if there be any aggravation in this case, or, rather, not much extenuation. We elected, to be Public Printers for this body, the editors of a public press. Both political parties have done this repeatedly before in both Houses. Was it ever expected that those elected were thereupon to cease to be editors? Suppose they have the zeal of partisans, courage, enthusiasm, even. Do we dislike or censure those qualities in others, if exerted in our own behalf, or in our own cause? So we elected them when known as editors of a party press. Did we require or expect that they were to cease to be party editors? Could we, with decency, insist that we ourselves, in consequence of our votes to them, had indirectly bribed them, and were not to be afterwards criticised as freely as others? If so, then, I repeat it, we insist on what is utterly destructive to all liberty of the press. Should we undertake, by our douceurs or favors, to stifle or seduce the press, we disgrace it and ourselves. What is an editor good for who will not, after elected, as well as before, denounce what he deems tergiversation? expose what he believes to be corrupt coalitions? strip off the mask from what he regards as political hypocrisy? shew up the inconsistencies between the professions and practices of those in power, and much more the brazen-faced differences in doctrine before and after an election? What is old English liberty worth—that has descended to us from our sturdy sires—if unlicensed printing—first contended for by Milton himself—cannot be any longer tolerated here? Let us have no imprimatur before publication—no previous license to be obtained—no censors, with power to exclude or veto what is disagreeable to weak nerves or bilious temperaments. No: Punish wrong, if you please, when committed in this, as in other cases, and in the usual manner; but away with bills of attainder, with sedition laws, or patronage and dismissals, that are calculated to silence or terrify, and which, if so used, would make us, in a few years, a nation either of mere courtiers or slaves. I admire the spirit of Collier, a century ago, as described in the book just before me. It says: "He was under the frown of power. His name was already a mark for the invectives of one half of the writers of the age." What did he do under such fearful odds? Succumb and play the spaniel? No: "In the cause of good taste, good sense, and good morals, he gave battle to the other half;" and he triumphed, even over such men as Dryden and Congreve, as well as over all the myrmidons of power. Majorities had no fears for him; and I should entertain a very different opinion of the editorial corps in this country if I could believe, for a moment, that the frown of power could ever drive the mass of them from their high duties. On the other hand, much charity is due to them for errors, when happening. They are obliged to take opinions and facts often at second hand. They are often misled in their views by others, who know better than they do, and are interested to mislead them. They are educated with the prejudices and failings of other people, and sometimes look with jaundiced eyes. They must, also, of necessity, in writing so much, write at times carelessly, hastily, ignorantly, and hence erroneously. Some are of excitable temperaments. Are we to throw the first stone at such? Among them, too, as in all professions, are some that are venal, with a few hacks and hirelings without requisite training, honor, or morals; and who, with prostituted pens, would stab by an innuendo, or murder character for bread. But many of them I know to be the reverse of all this, gentlemen in manners, ripe as scholars, with elevated talents, and integrity unassailable, and evincing justice and candor even to political enemies. As conductors of newspapers, they occupy a most important citadel in defence of public liberty. They may often prove its palladium. Meaning well, and doing well, in the main, they are seldom guilty of that express malice, which constitutes the essence of crime in defamation. I doubt whether half as many real libels occur as is usually supposed. But some are inevitable. In the well regulated Commonwealth of Massachusetts, twenty or more years ago, the law officers of the State were required to examine the files of a few of the Boston papers of both political parties, during some months, and report their opinion of the number of libels contained in them. If my memory be not treacherous, the result was some twenty to fifty in each paper. Yet, perhaps, these, on a fair and full hearing of all the parties, might have dwindled down one-half; and most of the others have been cases of libels only from implied malice, and from overweening confidence placed in the statements or opinions of indiscreet, though powerful advisers. But some licentiousness, I repeat it, is inevitable. There will, at times, be overaction on both political sides, coloring—hyperbole. We might as rationally expect to have the wonders of steam without any explosions, as a free press and no libels; to have fire for warmth and the arts, without any conflagrations; or storms and tempests to promote vegetation and health, without any wrecks or inundations.

While the Senate shall continue to elect the editors of party papers on either side as Printers, they might as well expect to see the play of Hamlet performed without the character of Hamlet, as to see all its members escape criticism and censure by their Printers. But wrong is done, at their peril; under the laws, and only under them, and in the usual forms only, let excesses be corrected or punished. Removing persons from office who are favorable to the minority, will only change the objects of attack by those who will then become the Public Printers. Attacks will then be made by the new Printers on the minority. But still, even the majority cannot escape from them from other quarters. It is a delusion, either to expect it, or in any way to discourage or prevent free discussion, or, as I impute no bad motives, to do acts which are likely to possess that tendency.

But the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] assigns a still different reason for removing the present Printers. It is a want of personal confidence. They may, he says, for an instance, disclose confidential messages. But have they ever done it heretofore? And if they have not, and have given a bond not to do it, and taken an oath, also, has he a right to urge such an objection? Should they ever be guilty, the remedy by suit on their bond, or by the revocation of their contract, as broken on their part, would be the obviously proper remedy. If we now punish them beforehand, and in a different way, we convict and punish them, not for a crime committed, but for a mere suspicion that one may be committed. We expel them for a possibility of wrong, and not for a wrong itself. What an act for the greatest constitutional tribunal of the country! This remark recalls to my mind the only other consideration with which I shall now trouble the Senate on this extraordinary resolution. If our employment of these persons as Printers involves the duties, obligations, and rights of a contract, as well, perhaps, as an office, it is manifestly not legal to remove them on any cause, or for any reason yet stated in debate. Nobody contends here, in cases like this, if amounting to contract, that one party to it can remove the other party; or, that this body can remove a party to any contract running to the United States like this, and properly made, unless that party consents, or has first broken it, or has done some act incompatible with its terms and character.

It is not pretended that any of these have occurred in respect to Blair and Rives. The only question, then, remaining, is, have they, in this case, any rights as contractors, or in the nature of a contract? In this inquiry, if the appointment of these Printers under the resolution of 1819 was unconstitutional or illegal, as some are supposed to contend, their contract then, and since entered into, was valid, from the inherent, absolute, and organic power of this body to do all necessary for the due transaction of their business, and thus authorize their officers to enter into such contracts for the performance of our necessary printing; and their case would then be that of a mere contract, nothing but a contract, and not of an officer connected with it, or created by either the Constitution or the laws.

Again: whether the resolution of 1819 be constitutional or not, and whether the Public Printer be an officer or not, it can be made manifest that he is a contractor, or has rights and duties under a contract; for an officer may be also a contractor, and may have rights in the nature of a contractor, just as much as if he were not an officer. In this case, the nature of it, and the facts, show not only that a contract was made, but made in the usual form, and not, as is suggested, without authority in the Senate to have it made.

The resolution of 1819 prescribes how the printing shall be done, the prices, and when the Printer shall be designated or elected by the Senate. All these having taken place regularly, and a bond duly executed to the United States to comply with the provisions of that act, and this having been the practice for near a quarter of a century, are we now to be told that it is no contract, because the Senate, as a body, cannot enter into a contract?

How are our laws for erecting public buildings, forts, etc.? Do they expressly authorize the President or the Departments to enter into contracts to do the work? On the contrary, it is merely implied, in almost every instance, from the nature of the case; and the contract is, in almost every instance, made under the superintendence of the appropriate Secretaries, or subordinate officers, and in the name of the United States, as both were in this case, and not in the name of the Senate or of the Departments, or by the President, or heads of Departments, in person. The contracts, on such occasions, are also signed but by one party, or are, by a bond of one party, to deliver materials, or do work, as here; and referring to a law for particulars, or annexing a schedule of them. But in whichever form, they are in essence equally contracts and binding; or all our obligations of this kind, from the foundation of the Government, are invalid.

Again: it is said by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] that there can be no contractor or contract where there is an election of an individual. But in this instance, the election of a particular person to have the contract has been substituted for the lowest bidder, formerly in use with a view merely to fix who should have the contract. This has been done to procure what the member from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] considers so indispensable—i. e. a Printer who, when selected, has the confidence of the body.

This is the whole amount of the election in the present case. Its essence or substance—and we are now looking beyond forms—is a mere designation of the person who, at the time of the election, has the confidence or preference of the body to receive the contract, instead of the lowest bidder. Besides this consideration, several classes of officers exist, as before stated, who may be contractors, or possess rights, in the nature of a contract, as well as any other person, and still be officers.

The case of Dartmouth College and Woodward—(4 Wheaton Rep. p. 657)—is very full on this point. It was more familiar to most professional gentlemen twenty years ago than now, or they never would have insisted, on this occasion, that there could be no contract where a person had been elected, or was in any sense an officer. I say nothing of the correctness of the law of that case as to the distinctions between public and private charters, or as to some other positions.

But I read from it a few passages, to show how much wider a range is there, judicially, given to the meaning of contracts, and rights held under contracts, than the Senators from Delaware or South Carolina have seemed to suppose. The case itself arose under that clause in the Constitution, which bears directly on the present discussion, and which provides that no State shall pass any "laws impairing the obligation of contracts."—(Art. 1, sec. 9.)

The Confederation took it for granted, that Congress itself, or either House, would, in their more retired, elevated and cautious position, never do any act impairing the obligation of contracts, and hence, extended the express prohibition to the States alone. There was danger from them in the circumstance, expressed by a member, that the "sober people of America, had seen with regret and with indignation, that sudden changes and legislative interference, in cases affecting present rights, because jobs, in the hands of enterprising and influential speculators." The clause was introduced "to shield themselves and their property from the effects of those sudden and strong passions to which men are exposed." (6 Cranch. 87.) Similar dangers, it now seems, may, unexpectedly, arise here as with the States; but justice requires me to add, that none of the gentlemen on the opposite side, are understood to claim the right to annul contracts in Congress any more than in the States, though some of them have, I think, very unfortunately, spoken of paying large or small damages, if they should annul contracts. They will, however, find that if the deplorable violation once takes place, in the flush of victory, and in the hot blood of passion, any reparation in damages will be but a feeble atonement for violated faith; and a stigma will be fixed on the character of the Republic, which ages cannot remove. The damning deed will be done. The little credit left of the States will be lost, and the high credit of the Union prostrated. The De Tocquevilles' and Chevaliers may have to write a new warning to the advocates of free principles abroad, and a new chapter of burning shame to us on the rashness and reckless injustice of party madness under free institutions. But again it is said, we can repair damages. What! we to be lavish of the people's money to repair the damages we ourselves have committed? What justice and economy!

Who, also, are to fix or estimate the damages? The party doing the wrong, as the Senate cannot be sued. What an impartial remedy! The end of such a beginning, under the new Administration, can more easily be imagined than seen.

What disastrous coming events thus cast their shadows before! Is this the first act in a drama that is to advance in proscriptive violence, like the tragic scenes enacted in the Italian Republics of the middle ages? Are our historians and poets, if, unfortunately, politicians, to be, like Dante, not only proscribed, but banished? Is confiscation to follow in case of contracts and property, and some apology to be offered, by talking of damages estimated by the injuring party now or paid at some future period, after hope long deferred, and when victory shall hang in the other side of the scales?

Of one thing, thank God! I feel satisfied—that, however violent causes may increase and inflame as they move onward, yet the atrocities of party rage evinced by females in some former Republics can never be revived in ours. In the ruthless proscription of triumvirates, none of our fair countrywomen can ever, I trust, under the humanity, sympathy, and benevolence of Christian education, call for the proscribed head of a political opponent, and, in impotent madness, pierce his dead tongue with a bodkin, in revenge for his philippics uttered against demagogues, profligates, and usurpers.

But one moment to the decision of our highest judicial tribunal, as to what constitutes a contract, rather than to the lexicographers and looser definitions proffered on the other side.

The decision in the case of Woodward and the Dartmouth College, was not that indentures, mutually signed by two parties, or unsealed agreements so signed, alone constitute contracts, as some definitions read seem to imply. But Chief Justice Marshall, in that case, which was a mere charter by a Provincial Governor, to a few persons, as officers of a literary institution, declared, that "the opinion of the court, after mature deliberation, is, that this is a contract, the obligation of which cannot be impaired without violating the Constitution." (page 650.) Again: (page 656,) "a grant is a contract." So are said to be all the private corporations, such as banks, turnpikes, and railroads;

(page 669,) though having officers, and making officers, almost without number. And Justice Story adds, in respect "to grants of power to State officers or to contracts, relative to their offices," &c. (pages 693 and 694.) "When the Legislature makes a contract with a public officer, as in the case of a stipulated salary for his services during a limited period, this, during the limited period, is just as much a contract within the purview of the constitutional provision as a like contract would be between two private citizens."

Yet the Senator from North Carolina contends that the Senate, though it constantly appoints officers, and helps to fix their salaries, cannot enter into any contract, or be in any way a party to any contract. And the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] is understood to contend that there can be no contract with a person elected. Again, Justice Story says: "Many dignities and offices, existing at common law, are merely honorary and without profit, and sometimes are onerous. Yet a grant to them has never been supposed the less a contract on that account." (page 699.)

But how much more is such an officer a contractor, if a grant of privilege to print, etc. is made to him, and the party to be protected as holding rights under a contract, if he possess a private beneficial interest in the duties attached to the station; and if large amounts of property are to be held, procured, and delivered under the contracts as in the present case, and for a limited period, and at certain prices. The judge adds: also, "in respect to franchisees, whether corporate or not, which include a permanency of profits, such as a right of fishing or to hold a ferry, a market or a fair, or to erect a turnpike, bank or bridge, there is no pretence to say the grants of them are not within the Constitution." (page 699.) That is, there is no pretence they are not contracts, or do not involve the rights and duties of a contract.

I quote the remarks to gentlemen on the other side, that they may call to mind what has been decided, and said in the highest judicial tribunal of the country on points analogous to that in dispute here, and how they have differed from their present position.

It will thus be seen, that, in the opinion of such a tribunal, officers may be elected or appointed, and still have rights under their offices, and under grants which are in the nature of a contract, which no legislative power can lawfully impair.

In the same case, it is held, as has been quoted, that bank charters possess a like character of a contract; and, in 1833, on the removal of the deposits, to which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] has referred, it was not denied, by the then Administration, that the charter gave certain rights in the nature of a contract; but, the question was merely concerning the extent and limitations of the contract. The Opposition, at that time, concluded, that the substance of the contract prohibited the removal of the deposits, unless first ascertained to be unsafe in the vaults of the Bank. The Executive contended there was no such limitation or qualification, because the charter itself expressly provided "that the deposits of the money of the United States in places in which the said Bank and the branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said Bank or the branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall, at any time, otherwise order and direct," &c. (section 16 h.) The Secretary did "otherwise order and direct," and, consequently, according to the views of the Executive, conformed to the contract, instead of violating it by removing the deposits.

In the present case, the other indications of a contract, beyond all which has yet been stated, are decisive. There not only always was a contract, and nothing but a contract, before 1819, but always since has there been a contract; not a mere bond to perform a naked public trust, as in cases of mere officers, but a bond to comply with the particulars of the joint resolution, and thus to furnish certain materials, of paper and ink, which equal in value nearly half the stipulated price to be paid for the whole work. No such contract or engagement exists with most other officers, and none such with mere officers. In this case, the law on the one side, and the bond on the other, make it a part of the contract on the one side, that they shall furnish these materials during a limited period, which is one of the tests of a contract by Justice Story, that is, for two years, or the next Congress, as well as to perform the labor, and provide a fixed capital, necessary to do the work promptly, in types, presses, etc. This capital equals thirty or forty thousand dollars.

Again: on the other side, it is virtually engaged, as a consideration for this bond, that they shall have the work for a definite time; that they shall be paid a stipulated price for the work, during that stipulated time. This makes it exactly, throughout, one of the cases adduced in the Supreme Court, to illustrate what is a contract, in the case of certain officers. Couple these considerations with others, before mentioned in this debate, that these Printers are designated to furnish the materials, and do the duties as a firm, and not as individuals, showing the business character of the case, that they are proposed in this very resolution to be dismissed as a firm, and not Mr. Blair alone—who seems alone to be objectionable—that they cannot resign without our consent, which is the case with no mere officers—that they have given, and the law requires them to give, bonds, not to do the duties of an officer, but "for the prompt, accurate, and neat execution of the work." And the whole undertaking comes as clearly, as any case on record, within the form, as well as substance, not only of definitions, but of decisions, in respect to contracts. Sound common sense, and immemorial usage, cannot, in my opinion, justify any other view of the subject. No scholastic subtlety can long bewilder either this body or the community as to the real essence of the transaction. However party feeling may insensibly warp some of us for a time, and it may all of us—however sudden irritation may have provoked and rendered plausible the expression of doubtful opinions—however any Senator may, in his zeal to serve others and the public, indulge in eloquent indignation at supposed vice—and however all this, under human frailty, may make some feel power and forget right, without any motive existing actually to violate vested rights, yet the scrutiny of free discussion and of time will dispel all delusion. All attacks on private charters and contracts have a revolutionary tendency; and one of the sages of '76 is depicted as holding up to the world's abhorrence various encroachments, and, among them, a broken charter, and other lawless acts of ministerial power. Reactions will come. Truth must follow after falsehood, and though sometimes slow, yet sure: though crushed to earth, she will rise again. The people at large are sensitive to injustice and oppression, though committed on the humblest individual. An emanation from Deity himself is constantly at work in the human heart to correct evil, to bring back erring man from wrong, and to do justice to the aggrieved, however late.

In closing, allow me to invite you, before you vote for the present resolution, to look at a few cases of the operations of such a feeling and principle in man, and especially in relation to this formidable class in society, composed of those connected with the public press.

In our provincial weakness as colonies, a practical printer,* once as their agent, stood before the assembled power of an English Parliament. Though faithful to his arduous trust, he was stigmatised by the reckless Wedderburnes of that day as a libeller, and guilty of various other high crimes and misdemeanors, which it is not necessary here to repeat. The petitions he presented were trampled in the dust—the prayers of his constituents rejected with scorn—and the proscribed and insulted agent was driven back across the Atlantic in supposed infamy. He at once devoted all his energies to the cause, and did more, perhaps, by his pen, tongue, and the press, than any other individual, to prepare us for the coming crisis. What was the termination of the outrage? A few years after the same printer appeared at the same court as the representative of thirteen free, independent, and sovereign States. Rumor adds, that, in the same dress, worn when he was vilified, he then and there affixed his name to the treaty of peace, in which his opponents virtually acknowledged the wrongs they had inflicted, and the sacred rights we had claimed.

But nearer home, in this very body, within the recollection of many of us, and deeply so of myself, a printer from my native State,† when nominated to office, was rejected, principally, it is apprehended, on the ground of a supposed libel published some years previously. I then believed, and still do, that he was imposed on by others as to the facts of the case, and that no express malice existed, nor any intentional wrong was designed to any one. But the blood was up even in this grave assemblage. Reason was, in some degree, blinded and stifled by honest indignation, at what was considered licentiousness of the press; and, without trial or conviction in the courts of law, and with a private life of great purity, an untiring industry, and singular clearness of intellect, he was driven from his subordinate office in apparent disgrace. Only one brief year afterwards what did we behold of returning justice and popular indemnity? This same printer is sent here as the representative of a sovereign State, to sit and act by the side of those who had rejected him, and is soon afterwards exalted still further, by his elevation to the chair of its Chief Magistracy.

One other illustration, and I have done.

In the case of John Wilkes, known wherever popular liberty is known, and the particulars of which need not, therefore, be detailed, his papers were seized by the minions of power, under a general search-warrant, because he had caused to be printed what were considered libels. The community looked to the outrage by such a seizure on him and his papers, and his domestic sanctuary, rather than to the individual guilt or innocence. They regarded the oppression, rather than the character, of the intended victim of ministerial usurpation. To evince their indignation at the profligate invasion of his rights, they at once elected him to the House of Commons. From that House he was expelled (or dismissed, as this resolution would term it) by the pliant supporters of that ministry. This was a second outrage, not much less flagrant than the first, and the people again returned him there by acclamation. Yea, more—the friends of liberty, of law, and the sacred rights of property and domestic exemption from inquisitorial search-warrants, caused the record of his expulsion to be expunged. It stands expunged to the present day, and I may venture to predict it will continue to stand expunged, till free principles themselves shall be expelled from the birthplace of our fathers.

In referring to this case, do I justify the conduct of Wilkes, in many respects? or do I undertake officially to decide on any general imputations, cast in debate, on the present Printers? Far from it. This seems to me not to be the proper time or proper stage in the proceedings for that purpose. They will ably vindicate themselves, I have no doubt, when notified of any specific charges and allowed to defend themselves against accusations like other free citizens in a free country, before they are condemned.

But Junius justly said of Wilkes, whatever may have been his character, it was, in a public view, the precedent and the principle, and not his character, which was most involved. Like Paine, during the Revolution, our fathers looked to his politics, rather than to his infidelity; and Mr. Jefferson afterwards generously protected him for his political rather than religious principles. Hence, Junius proceeded further, and observed as to Wilkes, if he had vices, his very vices pleaded for him in such a case, because they were made an apology by others for an act of oppression. Thus, (Letter 11th:) 'But, let Mr. Wilkes's character be what it may, this at least is certain, that circumstanced as he is, with regard to the public, even his vices plead for him. The people of England have too much discernment to suffer your Grace to take advantage of the failings of a private character to establish a precedent by which the public liberty is affected, and which you may hereafter with equal ease and justification employ to the ruin of the best man in the kingdom.'

Yes, to destroy even a Wilberforce, a Fox, or a Pitt, in the first moments of exultation after some party victory. Yes, it is the principle in which lurk the poison and the peril. And the great unknown, with indignant eloquence, added: "The laws of England shall not be violated even by your holy zeal to oppress a sinner."

Mr. WALKER said his friend from Arkansas had alluded to the fact that, in 1833, Gales and Seaton were declared to be elected, having received, according to the tellers ninety-nine votes, when before Congress reassembled a hundred individuals published under their signatures, that they had deposited their ballots for Blair and Rives; and in point of fact, though the tellers announced the election of Gales and Seaton, that Blair and Rives were elected. Now this result must have been either through fraud or mistake; he believed it was through mistake, for he hoped the day would not come when there would be a recourse to fraud in either of the two Houses of Congress, to defeat an election. But whenever it was, Blair and Rives were duly elected, and they proposed, in consequence of this fact, that they should be proclaimed the Printers to Congress. But what was the ground then taken by the Whig party, and by Gales and Seaton in editorial articles, which he had before him, and to which he would call the attention of the Senate? And these sentiments were not only promulgated by the party here at that period, but they were reaffirmed by the Whig press throughout the Union in articles republished from those of Gales and Seaton, who were now to be the Printers on the removal of Blair and Rives. In an article published in the National Intelligencer, on the 27th of November, 1833, in which they are giving their reasons why they should be considered Printers for the two years, they treat it in precisely the same manner that the election of Blair and Rives was now treated; they proclaimed it was a contract. But the following was their own language:

"Passing by other indications of lesser consequence, we arrive at that contemporaneous one with which we began, from Cincinnati, concurring in the scheme of the New Hampshire Patriot, the Albany Argus, the New York Standard, &c. Having travelled thus far with us, the reader will probably have made up his mind, by this time, that a deliberate plan has been formed here, to be attempted if the conspirators dare, and which all the organs of the lower Cabinet are busily engaged, by dirty and despicable arts, endeavoring to accomplish, for undoing the election of Printer made at the last session of Congress."

"This grand project of the cabal, whose existence and dangerous influence we exposed to our readers in several numbers during the last summer, presents itself in two aspects, the one MORAL, the other LEGAL."

And here he would call the attention of the Senate to the denunciation of Gales and Seaton of the attempt to remove them as both "immoral and illegal." Such was the charge made by Gales and Seaton, in 1833, against that act which was now to be accomplished by their friends in this body—an act, too, of which the men who denounced it then were now to reap the fruit. If this were an immorality and an illegality, he would turn it over to the consciences of gentlemen, when they came to give their vote for Gales and Seaton to fill the vacancy now to be created. But he would proceed with that part of the article which treats it as a contract with Gales and Seaton. It is as follows:

"The reason for thus making the appointment for each Congress at the close of the preceding session, was of course to enable the contractor to prepare the necessary materials to enable him to execute so extensive a work; which every man of business knows it will take several months to do. After the person elected has given the required bond, the contract be tween him and the House which has chosen him is complete, and it is only in case of failure in the proper execution of the work, or inconvenient delay, that the Secretary or Clerk of either House can employ another Printer to do any part of the work. Such a thing has in fact never yet occurred, in the course of fourteen years practice under the resolution."

"On the 3d of March, 1821, just at the close of the Congress next after that in which the above measure was first adopted, the following resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives:

"Resolved, That this House will forthwith proceed to ballot for a Printer to execute its work during the next Congress, according to the provisions of the resolution, 'directing the manner in which the printing for Congress shall be executed; fixing the prices thereof, and providing for the appointment of a Printer or Printers,' passed on the 3d day of March, 1819."

"Under this resolution, the election was made at the Sixteenth Congress, for the Seventeenth, and so continued to be made, from Congress to Congress, until the Twentieth Congress, when, upon the recommendation of the Committee of Retrenchment, the following resolution was passed, early in February, by both Houses of Congress, and approved by the President of the United States:

"A RESOLUTION amendatory of a Joint Resolution passed 3d March, 1819."

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That within thirty days before the adjournment of every Congress, each House shall proceed to vote for a Printer to execute its work for and during the succeeding Congress, and the person having the majority of all the votes shall be considered duly elected; and that so much of the resolution approved the 3d day of March, 1819, entitled 'A resolution directing the manner in which the printing for Congress shall be executed, fixing the prices thereof, and providing for the appointment of a Printer or Printers,' as is altered by this resolution, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

The resolution, too, set forth that, in case of the non-execution of the work, the work might be done by another Printer, and the contractor should pay any surplus to the new Printer that might be allowed, as damages for the non-execution of his duty. Now let them see what was said on the effect of the joint resolution of 1819 and 1829:

"Thus, and with all these solemn forms and sanctions, was consummated the election of Printer, which the Kitchen Cabinet, in all the insolence of power, with matchless presumption, undertake to order the House of Representatives to set aside; when they could no more legally do, the reader will perceive, than they could now set aside the election of Mr. Adams to the Presidency in 1825, and declare every act done in consequence of it to have been illegal and void!"

There was the doctrine of the Whig party of 1833, promulgated by their accredited organ in Washington city, and under circumstances less strong than those now existing, for there was now no allegation that Blair and Rives were chosen by fraud. Gales and Seaton then declared that it was a solemn contract, and that they could be no more dismissed than that Mr. Adams could be dismissed from the Presidency by the vote of Congress; and yet now they were to reap the fruit of the act which they then, in elaborate editorial articles, denounced as illegal and immoral, and to use their own language, as an act of "matchless impudence." That was not his language, but the language of the gentlemen who were to be elected Printers by the other side, who were about to do the very same act which was then pronounced to be immoral and illegal, and "matchless impudence." This joint resolution had been in force for twenty-two years, for the first election of Gales and Seaton took place on the third of March, 1819. To this fact let him call the attention of this body and the country, and let him ask if this body was not now to act on this joint resolution.

The resolution was acted upon at the following periods: 1819, '21, '23, '25, '27, '29, '31, '33, '35, '37, '39, and '41.

There was not one single gap or intermission in this body from the 3d of March, 1819, to this period. There were examples in their favor for twenty-two years, under all the mutations of party and of doctrine that this country had undergone, and not one example to the contrary; but at this late period, this Whig Senate was about to create an example for the violation of the resolution of 1819. For the first time, a Whig Senate was about to dismiss a Printer appointed under that joint resolution, for never had either House given them one solitary example, during a period of twenty-two years, to justify the act that was then about to be performed by a Whig majority. And what was the ground on which the resolution had been disregarded in the other House? On looking at the journals, it would be seen that they were twofold. One was a dispute in regard to the manner of the election—whether it should be by ballot or viva voce. They failed not on the ground that the resolution was inoperative, but on the ground that it required a vote of two-thirds to take the resolution up for action; and two-thirds could not be found to agree upon a day. And when the session was hastening to a close, and it was supposed that an attempt to act upon this resolution would defeat bills that were on their passage, and, therefore, two-thirds could not be found to support it, this non-action of the House of Representatives was to constitute ground for the deviation of the Senate from its uniform practice from 1819 to 1841! But the House of Representatives had set them no such evil example, as that, after an election had been consummated, it should be disregarded and set aside, and the contract rescinded. The specified grounds on which the contract could be set aside, were a failure to execute the work, or delay in its execution; and they were not to interpolate on that contract provisions that were not in it. It was to be a contract on one side, as well as on the other. It was obligatory on Blair and Rives, as one of the contracting parties, and on the Senate of the United States as the other, and the only other contracting party; and yet this Senate, the party entering into this contract with Blair and Rives, were to be the sole judges and violators of that contract—an example for which would not be found in the whole course of jurisprudence, from the commencement of legislation down to this time. Blair and Rives could neither resign nor abandon their contract without the consent of the Senate; nor release themselves from its obligations; and was it ever heard or dreamed of, that a contract was binding on one party and not on another? This, then, clearly distinguished it from all other cases which had been mentioned in debate. He, therefore, implored the Senate to maintain the good faith and honor of the country, in which they had so deep an interest, and not, by the violation of this contract, set an evil example to the respective States of the Union, to impair that good faith which should ever be held inviolate. He would rather that some compromise should be effected than that this great principle should be violated by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. MANGUM read various extracts from the Globe of the same period, maintaining doctrines directly the reverse of those contended for by the Intelligencer.

Mr. WALKER called the attention of the Senate to the fact that that doctrine was repudiated by the Democratic party to which it was directed.

But one word more. They had designated a partnership to be the Printers to the Senate, and he wished to inquire whether they could elect a partnership to an office? He proposed that question for the consideration of his friends on the other side, and he wished them to think well of it before they consummated the work which they had now begun. Did they elect Blair and Rives, or Gales and Seaton, as they did their Secretary and Sergeant-at-arms, to any office known to the law? And if they had designated two individuals as one, on what principle did they dismiss both? This showed clearly that they were merely designating contractors, and not electing officers.

On the motion of Mr. PRESTON, the Senate then went into Executive session.

THURSDAY, March 11, 1841.

The resolution to dismiss Blair and Rives being under consideration—

Mr. BERRIEN resumed the debate, this day, in support of the resolution. The views which he expressed at some length, were those of previous speakers. The resolution, he said, affirmed two things: the first was, that the Senate had power to do the act contemplated by that resolution; and secondly, that there was cause for doing it; and these involved the position that the Senate, as now assembled, was invested with its constitutional powers to elect its own officers, which included the idea that it had the power also of dismissal. They were then sitting as a "Senate," the Printer was an officer of the Senate; and partaking of the views and feeling of the majority of the people by whom the new Administration had been called into office, their organ of communication with the people, who was necessarily entrusted with most confidential communications, should not be the editor of a leading political paper of that party which had already announced their determined opposition to the existing Administration. It was "the very error of the moon" to suppose they could tolerate or continue these Printers one instant beyond the acquisition of the power to dismiss them.

Mr. BENTON said six years ago the Senate happened to be engaged in the same business; which now occupied its attention. He happened to be in connection with the Senate in 1835, when the actual majority of that day, being just about to go into a minority, proposed to bring on the election of Printer for their successors; which was resisted by the minority, who were then soon to be the majority, on the grounds which had been adopted by the gentlemen opposite, who had argued the question during this debate. He, (Mr. BENTON,) on that occasion, as in 1833, submitted a resolution to repeal the joint resolution of 1819, which was now treated by gentlemen on the other side as a nullity. He had done so, because standing as it did on the statute book, it was clothed with all the forms of law. His resolution of 1833, for repealing the law of 1819, and remitting to each House of Congress the election of its own Printer, was referred by then existing majority in the Senate (which was the same politically as now existed here) to a committee composed wholly of that political party, consisting of Messrs. Robbins, Poin-dexter, and Bibb. That committee retained the resolution to the end of the session; they then reported against it, and they were supported by the majority in the Senate. That was in 1833. In 1835, the same course was taken by him pretty early, and again by the same political party in the Senate, his resolution was referred; it was then referred to the Judiciary Committee, consisting of five members, four of whom were of the same political party as was this day in a majority. That resolution was so referred, in opposition to his earnest remonstrance, to a committee, with whom it might lie long. It was afterwards brought back with the decision of the committee against the repeal of the resolution of 1819, and again the Senate sustained the decision. It was in the latter part of the session of 1835, that that resolution was brought back, when it was reported to the Senate by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] and thus, by two committees of that body, belonging to the political party now predominant in this body, the propriety of repealing the resolution of 1819 was reported against, and those reports were acquiesced in by the majority of the Senate. The joint resolution, then, which for a week past had been treated by the other side as a nullity, was adhered to by them in 1833 and 1835, and adhered to on a proposition being made, and coming regularly before the Senate, to decide the propriety of taking it off the statute book. On the 23d of February, 1835, political power being about to shift itself on others, the election of Printer was brought on. He, (Mr. BENTON,) and others, made all the resistance to it that they could; and he believed they stated their objections, if not as strongly, at least as broadly, as the gentlemen opposite now do. They urged the impropriety of the bringing on an election by gentlemen who were leaving their seats, and imposing on their successors an officer of another political party, who might be unacceptable and disagreeable to them. He (Mr. BENTON) said he should look upon it as the exercise of mere power, which would not be obligatory on those successors, and which they might disregard if they would; and, therefore, for one, he undertook to say then that he should disregard it, and that he should not submit to the imposition of a Printer of the adverse political party upon them, but that he should move, in his place, at the next session, to set the Printer aside and take another up. Of all this he gave notice in his place; and when gentlemen made their objections to this election, a fortnight ago, and said they were not bound by it, but would move to set it aside when they were competent to do it, it seemed to him they were reading out of his own book. Indeed, he had the book brought, and the language was found exactly to correspond. Nothing could be more explicit than the statements he made on that occasion. Standing in his place, he promised he would make a motion to set the election aside, and to go into an election for themselves: it was all in the book which lay before him, but he would not trouble the Senate with reading it. He made the pledge; but on the ensuing session coming round, was that pledge redeemed? Did he move to set the election aside? Did he move to supersede Gales and Seaton, and go into the election of another person? No; he did not. He gave the notice, but when the time came round, he never made the movement. Why? For want of will within himself? He presumed not. Why then? Because the gentlemen elected were perfectly agreeable to him? By no means.

They were gentlemen of adverse politics, and they were far, he assured the Senate, from sprinkling him and his party with lavender. The gentlemen were adverse to him in politics, their paper was disagreeable to him; and yet did he move to set their election aside? Did he take a step to redeem the pledge he had given? No, not one step; and why? Because the body of the Democratic party—some might have forgotten it as a transient thing—utterly refused to go into it. He did not know that he found a backer among them; but so far he could speak, that his political friends refused to go into the election of a Printer, and for the reasons here given: Messrs. Gales and Seaton had entered into a contract, they were the Printers to the Senate for two years, and the Democratic party permitted them to serve out their two years—the Democrats being the majority. Twice, then, under such circumstances, were adverse printers permitted to hold their contract—twice, and for two years each time, were they permitted to hold it to the end of the term. He mentioned this, for the purpose of showing how his political friends had acted heretofore. He did not quote it to show his own consistency, or of doing honor to himself: not at all. It was to remind them of what his friends had done, and thereby to do justice both to those present and those absent; for the purpose of showing how the Democracy had used its power, when, on two former occasions, they utterly refused to touch the contract of the Printer. It was to bring that fact to the minds of Senators, and not to go into any argument, that he had risen; and every word he had spoken was confirmed by the book before him. He did this to bring it to the knowledge of the Senate and of the country—he did it for the purpose of confronting professions with practice. The Democratic party had been described as the "spoils party," the "intolerant party," the "proscriptive party," and the party which swept every thing away that differed from them. Another party had come in which was to "proscribe proscription." That was the profession on which the gentlemen had come in; but, without going into generalities, take the case now before them, and how stood it? The last gentleman who had addressed them, [Mr. BERRIEN] had summed up their whole doctrine, when he said they could not tolerate for an instant—which was the smallest subdivision of time—Printers of adverse politics to do their business.

Then, while the tolerant, the merciful, the element, the anti-proscriptive Federalists refuse to tolerate, for one instant; the intolerant, proscribing, tyrannical Democrats were tolerant for four years—at two ends of the Capitol, and for two years at a time, and for two years at the end of that time, had they tolerated Gales and Seaton. He would conclude with again saying that he had made these observations only for the purpose of doing justice to the Democracy—to show them consistent and uniform in 1833, and 1835, and in 1841—and in showing the Federalists refusing to be bound by a law in 1841, and treating it as a nullity, which they refused to repeal in 1833 and 1835; in showing them as adhering to the joint resolution of 1819, when it is in favor of Gales and Seaton, and trampling it under foot when it is in favor of Blair and Rives.

The yeas and nays were then about being taken, when

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said that many Senators were absent, being necessarily occupied in preparation for their departure for their homes; and that it should not be taken without some little notice of the absentees, as they had some business in Executive session to transact, he would move that the Senate go into Executive session, and at 3 o'clock, the question be taken.

Most of the Senators now appearing in their seats, he waived the motion, and the yeas and nays were taken, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Moorehead, Porter, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, MacRoberts, Nicholson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Woodbury, and Wright—18.

So the resolution to dismiss Blair and Rives as Printers of the Senate to the 27th Congress was adopted.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky moved the following order:

Ordered, That the official bond taken from Blair and Rives, as Printers of the Senate of the 27th Congress, be delivered to them by the Secretary of the Senate.

On this Mr. BENTON called the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and the motion was carried by a precisely similar vote to that on the above question—yeas 26, nays 18.

The Senate then went into Executive session, and afterwards adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, March 14, 1841.

Mr. TAPPAN presented the following letter of Messrs. Blair and Rives, which was read:

GLOBE OFFICE,

Washington, 15th March, 1841.

On the 12th inst. the Secretary of the Senate, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, sent to us a letter enclosing our bond for executing the printing for that body during the 27th Congress; the contents of which letter we did not know when it was handed to us; and on examining its contents, we immediately returned it to the Secretary's office, where it was left, with a letter demanding of him all the copy that has been ordered to be printed, or that may be ordered to be printed, by the Senate, during the 27th Congress.

We now inform the Senate that we are prepared, and have been ever since our election, to execute any printing that has been ordered; and shall keep ourselves prepared to execute all the printing that may be ordered by the Senate during the 27th Congress; and we hereby respectfully demand the copy of all that has been ordered, and all that may be ordered during the 27th Congress, as fast as the orders shall be made.

Respectfully,
BLAIR & RIVES.

To the Senate of the United States.

The letter was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PRESTON rose and addressed the Senate as follows: It is, I am sure, painfully within the recollection of the Senate, that a few days since a very unpleasant collision occurred on this floor between the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Alabama. Any interruption of the habitual and characteristic harmony of this body, or the parliamentary decorum of its proceedings, is, under any circumstances, deeply to be regretted, but especially in the present case, inasmuch as the manifestation of heat occurred between Senators of such long and distinguished standing. It might well be supposed that nothing but mistake or accident could have led to such a result; and thoroughly convinced of this, I rise, Mr. President, to state my conviction of the existence of misapprehension, and to state succinctly the mode in which it occurred.

On the occasion alluded to, the Senator from Kentucky, conceiving that the remarks of the Senator from Alabama were calculated and intended to be injurious to his character, and personally offensive, retorted in language of direct affront—language which I am convinced he could not have employed, but under a deep sense of injury. In this view of the remarks of the Senator from Alabama, I believe he was mistaken. Indeed I am convinced, from information which has casually come to my possession, that the Senator from Alabama did not intend to be personally offensive. At the bottom of this affair, therefore, there is a misapprehension, which I announce with pleasure, and in the confident belief that, being announced, the honorable and distinguished Senators will permit no personal difficulty to arrest an adjustment which is earnestly demanded by the Senate and the country.

Mr. CLAY said he shared with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] in the regret which he had manifested, on account of the occurrence disturbing the usual harmony and good feeling which prevailed in the Senate, to which he had alluded; and he bore, with pleasure, testimony to the honorable and high minded feelings which had prompted that Senator to make the appeal which he had just presented.

Before he (Mr. C.) proceeded to respond particularly to that appeal, he wished to submit a few general observations to the Senate in regard to the privileges of Congressional or Parliamentary debate.

Every Senator had the most perfect right to speak with the utmost freedom of those who were in power; he might renounce them as arbitrary, wicked, and incompetent, and their measures as tyrannical, corrupt, and ruinous to the best interests of the country. So it was equally the right of every member to deliver his sentiments without reserve on the character of all persons not members of the body, but whose names or characters were connected with the subject under debate, and all brought before the Senate as candidates for appointment to office. All this a member has a right to do under no other responsibility than that which his own conscience and public opinion impose. But while this right was clear and undeniable, was essential to the due discharge of official duty, and was in no case to be restrained, the same liberty did not extend to the language of Senators towards each other, or in reference to their motives. In speaking to or of each other, the utmost respect and decorum ought ever to be preserved, all personality avoided, and especially all imputation of improper motives. Under these impressions as to the privileges of debate, and guided by these rules, Mr. C. had spoken, a few days since, of the elder Editor of the Globe newspaper, whom it was then proposed to dismiss from the office of Printer to the Senate. Had not that individual been thus legitimately and directly before the body, he should have forbore, as he had always hitherto, in his public station, forbore, to say a word in regard to him or the paper which he edit. Notwithstanding ten years of the most unparalleled abuse and wanton and unscrupulous attacks of himself, Mr. C. had remained silent; and so he should still have remained; but when the name of that person was directly before the Senate, and his character and conduct of a public journal became a legitimate subject for its consideration, he had felt it to be his right to speak of him in the terms he had done. When, on the next day, the Senator from Alabama (Mr. KING) addressed the Senate, he must say that, while that gentleman was speaking, he had thought that there was, on his part, a studied, a premeditated, and, as he then believed, a preconceived design to make an assault upon him and his character. And when the Senator concluded by instituting a comparison of Mr. C. to a man whom he had, but the day before, declared to be infamous, and of whom he had spoken as a common libeller, and of his paper as libellous, he did not doubt that his object was a personal offence to Mr. C. It was under this impression that Mr. C. had addressed to the Chair some remarks which he intended as a deliberate offence to that Senator.

But it was due to the Senator from Alabama, as well as to himself, to state that he had since received satisfactory information, on which he placed implicit reliance, that there had been no purpose or intention on the part of that Senator to offer any personal affront to Mr. C. or to cast the slightest imputation on his character or honor. Mr. C. had, therefore, been mistaken as to the design which he had supposed that Senator to entertain; and he must have entirely misapprehended the language employed. Ready, therefore, at all times promptly to repair an injury, as he hoped he ever should be to repel an indignity, and always taking more pleasure to repair than to repel, and without any regard to the nicety of mere technical forms, to which those acquainted with him well knew he never attached great importance—under the circumstances as thus explained, and with the understanding which he now had of the real intentions of that Senator, it was with infinite pleasure he now declared every epithet in the least derogatory to him, to his honor, or to his character, to be withdrawn.

Mr. KING said: I concur with the Senator from Kentucky as to the duty which every Senator owe to himself and to the body of which he is a member. He should studiously avoid all personalities, and keep himself strictly within the rules of order, and never depart from decorum in debate. I have long been a member of the Senate, and I can fearlessly appeal to my brother Senators to say, whether, on any occasion, I have violated prescribed rules, or been guilty of indecorum in debate.

The Senator from Kentucky, from whoever he received the information, has not been misinformed. That Senator having, with his characteristic frankness, explicitly withdrawn the injurious expressions used by him, I now feel myself at liberty to state, and I do it in the same spirit of frankness, that nothing which was said by me was intended to be personally offensive to that Senator; nor was it my design, in any manner, to derogate from his character as a gentleman or man of honor. I make this statement with pleasure; for, while I am always prepared to defend my honor when assailed, I carefully avoid attacking others.

Mr. PRESTON expressed his satisfaction at the satisfactory termination of the misunderstanding between the Senators; and then, on his motion,

The Senate then went into Executive session, and when the doors were again opened,

Mr. WRIGHT was discussing a motion submitted by Mr. RIVES in relation to printing letters of the Adjutant General and of the Secretary of the Senate, in connection with the memorial of General Jesup which was ordered to be printed during the last session of Congress.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. WRIGHT and BENTON on the ground of the impropriety and irregularity of transacting business of a legislative character during an executive session of the Senate; while they expressed their willingness to vote for the printing of any document which might be necessary for the elucidation of the subject, if the motion for it was submitted at the proper time.

The motion was advocated by Messrs. RIVES, ARCHER, and PRESTON, and was agreed to—aye 20, noes 10.

Mr. MERRICK, from a committee appointed to wait on the President, and inform him that the Senate were prepared to adjourn if he had no further tee had performed that duty: that the President communications to make, reported that the committee had informed them that he had no further communications to make; and expressed to them, and desired it to be communicated through them to the body, his wishes for the health and happiness of the members of the Senate, and for their safe return to their homes and families.

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT,
The Senate adjourned sine die.

REPORT

OF THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,

In compliance with the "Act to authorize the appointment of additional paymasters, and for other purposes," passed July 4, 1836.

Message of the President.

Sen. & H. of Reps.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT.

The following message from the President of the United States was received by Mr. VAN BUREN, his Private Secretary:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

Our devout gratitude is due to the Supreme Being for having graciously continued to our beloved country, through the vicissitudes of another year, the invaluable blessings of health, plenty, and peace. Seldom has this favored land been so generally exempted from the ravages of disease, or the labor of the husbandman more amply rewarded; and never before have our relations with other countries been placed on a more favorable basis than that which they so happily occupy at this critical conjuncture in the affairs of the world. A rigid and persevering abstinence from all interference with the domestic and political relations of other States, alike due to the genius and distinctive character of our Government and to the principles by which it is directed; a faithful observance, in the management of our foreign relations, of the practice of speaking plainly, dealing justly, and requiring truth and justice in return, as the best conservatives of the peace of nations; a strict impartiality in our manifestations of friendship, in the commercial privileges we concede, and those we require from others: these, accompanied by a disposition as prompt to maintain, in every emergency, our own rights, as we rea from principle averse to the invasion of those of others, have given to our country and Government a standing in the great family of nations, of which we have just cause to be proud, and the advantages of which are experienced by our citizens throughout every portion of the earth to which their enterprising and adventurous spirit may carry them. Few, if any, remain insensible to the value of our friendship, or ignorant of the terms on which it can be acquired, and by which it can alone be preserved.

A series of questions of long standing, difficult in their adjustment, and important in their consequences, in which the rights of our citizens and the honor of the country were deeply involved, have, in the course of a few years, (the most of them during the successful administration of my immediate predecessor,) been brought to a satisfactory conclusion; and the most important of those remaining are, I am happy to believe, in a fair way of being speedily and satisfactorily adjusted.

With all the powers of the world our relations are those of honorable peace. Since your adjournment, nothing serious has occurred to interrupt or threaten this desirable harmony. If clouds have towered above the other hemisphere, they have not cast their portentous shadows upon our happy shores. Bound by no entangling alliances, yet linked by a common nature and interest with the other nations of mankind, our aspirations are for the preservation of peace, in whose solid and civil-izing triumphs all may participate with a generous emulation. Yet it behooves us to be prepared for any event, and to be always ready to maintain those just and enlightened principles of national intercourse, for which this Government has ever contended. In the shock of contending empires, it is only by assuming a resolute bearing, and clothing themselves with defensive armor, that neutral nations can maintain their independent rights.

The excitement which grew out of the territorial controversy between the United States and Great Britain having in a great measure subsided, it is hoped that a favorable period is approaching for final settlement. Both Governments must now be convinced of the dangers with which the question is fraught; and it must be their desire, as it is their interest, that this perpetual cause of irritation should be removed as speedily as practicable. In my last annual message you were informed that the proposition for a commission of exploration and survey promised by Great Britain had been received, and that a counter project, including also a provision for the certain and final adjustment of the limits in dispute, was then before the British Government for its consideration. The answer of that Government, accompanied by additional propositions of its own, was received, through its minister here, since your separation. These were promptly considered; such as were deemed correct in principle, and consistent with a due regard to the just rights of the United States and of the State of Maine, concurred in; and the reasons for dissenting from the residue, with an additional suggestion on our part, communicated by the Secretary of State to Mr. Fox. That Minister, not feeling himself sufficiently instructed upon some of the points raised in the discussion, felt it to be his duty to refer the matter to his own Government for its further decision. Having now been for some time under its advisement, a speedy answer may be confidently expected. From the character of the points still in difference, and the undoubted disposition of both parties to bring the matter to an early conclusion, I look with entire confidence to a prompt and satisfactory termination of the negotiation. Three commissioners were appointed shortly after the adjournment of Congress, under the act of the last session providing for the exploration and survey of the line which separates the States of Maine and New Hampshire from the British Provinces; they have been actively employed until their progress was interrupted by the inclemency of the season, and will resume their labors as soon as practicable in the ensuing year.

It is understood that their respective examinations will throw new light upon the subject in controversy, and serve to remove any erroneous impressions which may have been made elsewhere prejudicial to the rights of the United States. It was, among other reasons, with a view of preventing the embarrassments which, in our peculiar system of government, impede and complicate negotations involving the territorial rights of a State, that I thought it my duty, as you have been informed on a previous occasion, to propose to the British Government, through its Minister at Washington, that early steps should be taken to adjust the points of difference on the line of boundary from the entrance of Lake Superior to the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods, by the arbitration of a friendly power, in conformity with the seventh article of the treaty of Ghent. No answer has yet been returned by the British Government to this proposition.

With Austria, France, Prussia, Russia, and the remaining powers of Europe, I am happy to inform you our relations continue to be of the most friendly character. With Belgium, a treaty of commerce and navigation, based upon liberal principles of reciprocity and equality, was concluded in March last, and having been ratified by the Belgian Government, will be duly laid before the Senate. It is a subject of congratulation that it provides for the satisfactory adjustment of a long standing question of controversy, thus removing the only obstacle which could obstruct the friendly and mutually advantageous intercourse between the two nations. A messenger has been despatched with the Hanoverian treaty to Berlin, where, according to stipulation, the ratifications are to be exchanged. I am happy to announce to you that, after many delays and difficulties, a treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States and Portugal, was concluded and signed at Lisbon on the 26th of August last, by the plenipotentiaries of the two Governments. Its stipulations are founded upon those principles of mutual liberality and advantage which the United States have always sought to make the basis of their intercourse with foreign powers; and it is hoped they will tend to foster and strengthen the commercial intercourse of the two countries.

Under the appropriation of the last session of Congress, an agent has been sent to Germany, for the purpose of promoting the interests of our tobacco trade.

The commissioners appointed under the convention for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States upon Mexico having met and organized at Washington, in August last, the papers in the possession of the Government, relating to those claims, were communicated to the board. The claims not embraced by that convention are now the subject of negotiation between the two Governments, through the medium of our Minister at Mexico.

Nothing has occurred to disturb the harmony of our relations with the different Governments of South America. I regret, however, to be obliged to inform you that the claims of our citizens upon the late Republic of Colombia have not yet been satisfied by the separate Governments into which it has been resolved.

The Charge d'Affaires at Brazil having expressed the intention of his Government not to prolong the treaty of 1828, it will cease to be obligatory upon either party on the 12th day of December, 1841, when the extensive commercial intercourse between the United States and that vast empire will no longer be regulated by express stipulations.

It affords me pleasure to communicate to you that the Government of Chili has entered into an agreement to indemnify the claimants in the case of the Macedonian, for American property seized in 1819; and to add, that information has also been received which justifies the hope of an early adjustment of the remaining claims upon that Government.

The commissioners appointed in pursuance of the convention between the United States and Texas, for marking the boundary between them, have, according to the last report received from our commissioner, surveyed and established the whole extent of boundary north along the western bank of the Sabine river, from its entrance into the Gulf of Mexico to the thirty-second degree of north latitude. The commission adjourned on the 16th of June last, to reassemble on the 1st of November, for the purpose of establishing accurately the intersection of the thirty-second degree of latitude with the western bank of the Sabine, and the meridian line thence to Red river. It is presumed that the work will be concluded in the present season.

The present sound condition of their finances, and the success with which embarrassments in regard to them, at times apparently insurmountable, have been overcome, are matters upon which the people and the Government of the United States may well congratulate themselves. An overflowing Treasury, however it may be regarded as an evidence of public prosperity, is seldom conducive to the permanent welfare of any people; and experience has demonstrated its incompatibility with the salutary action of political institutions like those of the United States. Our safest reliance for financial efficiency and independence has, on the contrary, been found to exist in ample resources unencumbered with debt; and, in this respect, the Federal Government occupies a singularly fortunate and truly enviable position.

When I entered upon the discharge of my official duties in March, 1837, the act for the distribution of the surplus revenue was in a course of rapid execution. Nearly twenty-eight millions of dollars of the public moneys were, in pursuance of its provisions, deposited with the States in the months of January, April, and July, of that year. In May there occurred a general suspension of specie payments by the banks, including, with very few exceptions, those in which the public moneys were deposited, and upon whose fidelity the Government had unfortunately made itself dependent for the revenues which had been collected from the people, and were indispensable to the public service. This suspension, and the excesses in banking and commerce out of which it arose, and which were greatly aggravated by its occurrence, made, to a great extent, unavailable the principal part of the public money then on hand; suspended the collection of many millions accruing on merchants' bonds, and greatly reduced the revenue arising from customs and the public lands. These effects have continued to operate, in various degrees, to the present period; and, in addition to the decrease in the revenue thus produced, two and a half millions of duties have been relinquished by two biennial reductions under the act of 1833, and probably as much more upon the importation of iron for railroads, by special legislation.

Whilst such has been our condition for the last four years in relation to revenue, we have, during the same period, been subjected to an unavoidable continuance of large extraordinary expenses necessarily growing out of past transactions, and which could not be immediately arrested without great prejudice to the public interest. Of these, the charge upon the Treasury, in consequence of the Cherokee treaty alone, without adverting to others arising out of Indian treaties, has already exceeded five millions of dollars; that for the prosecution of measures for the removal of the Seminole Indians, which were found in progress, has been nearly fourteen millions; and the public buildings have required the unusual sum of nearly three millions.

It affords me, however, great pleasure to be able to say, that, from the commencement of this period to the present day, every demand upon the Government, at home or abroad, has been promptly met. This has been done, not only without creating a permanent debt, or a resort to additional taxation in any form, but in the midst of a steadily progressive reduction of existing burdens upon the people, leaving still a considerable balance of available funds which will remain in the Treasury at the end of the year. The small amount of Treasury notes, not exceeding four and a half millions of dollars, still outstanding, and less by twenty-three millions than the United States have in deposit with the States, is composed of such only as are not yet due, or have not been presented for payment. They may be redeemed out of the accruing revenue, if the expenditures do not exceed the amount within which they may, it is thought, be kept without prejudice to the public interest, and the revenue shall prove to be as large as may justly be anticipated.

Among the reflections arising from the contemplation of these circumstances, one, not the least gratifying, is the consciousness that the Government had the resolution and the ability to adhere, in every emergency, to the sacred obligations of law; to execute all its contracts according to the requirements of the Constitution, and thus to present, when most needed, a rallying point by which the business of the whole country might be brought back to a safe and unvarying standard—a result vitally important as well to the interests as to the morals of the people. There can surely now be no difference of opinion in regard to the incalculable evils that would have arisen if the Government, at that critical moment, had suffered itself to be deterred from upholding the only true standard of value, either by the pressure of adverse circumstances or the violence of unmerited denunciation. The manner in which the people sustained the performance of this duty was highly honorable to their fortitude and patriotism. It cannot fail to stimulate their agents to adhere, under all circumstances, to the line of duty; and to satisfy them of the safety with which a course really right, and demanded by a financial crisis, may, in a community like ours, be pursued, however apparently severe its immediate operation.

The policy of the Federal Government, in extinguishing as rapidly as possible the national debt, and, subsequently, in resisting every temptation to create a new one, deserves to be regarded in the same favorable light. Among the many objections to a national debt, the certain tendency of public securities to concentrate ultimately in the coffers of foreign stockholders, is one which is every day gathering strength. Already have the resources of many of the States, and the future industry of their citizens, been indefinitely mortgaged to the subjects of European Governments, to the amount of twelve millions annually, to pay the constantly accruing interest on borrowed money—a sum exceeding half the ordinary revenues of the whole United States. The pretext which this relation affords to foreigners to scrutinize the management of our domestic affairs, if not actually to intermeddle with them, presents a subject for earnest attention, not to say of serious alarm. Fortunately, the Federal Government, with the exception of an obligation entered into in behalf of the District of Columbia, which must soon be discharged, is wholly exempt from any such embarrassment. It is also, as is believed, the only Government which, having fully and faithfully paid all its creditors, has also relieved itself entirely from debt. To maintain a distinction so desirable, and so honorable to our national character, should be an object of earnest solicitude. Never should a free people, if it be possible to avoid it, expose themselves to the necessity of having to treat of the peace, the honor, or the safety of the Republic, with the Governments of foreign creditors, who, however well disposed they may be to cultivate with us in general friendly relations, are nevertheless, by the law of their own condition, made hostile to the success and permanency of political institutions like ours. Most humiliating may be the embarrassments consequent upon such a condition. Another objection, scarcely less formidable, to the commencement of a new debt, is its inevitable tendency to increase in magnitude, and to foster national extravagance. He has been an unprofitable observer of events, who needs at this day to be admonished of the difficulties which a Government, habitually dependent on loans to sustain its ordinary expenditures, has to encounter in resisting the influences constantly exerted in favor of additional loans; by capitalists, who enrich themselves by Government securities for amounts much exceeding the money they actually advance—a prolific source of individual aggrandizement in all borrowing countries; by stockholders, who seek their gains in the rise and fall of public stocks; and by the selfish importunities of applicants for appropriations for works avowedly for the accommodation of the public, but the real objects of which are, too frequently, the advancement of private interests. The known necessity which so many of the States will be under to impose taxes for the payment of the interest on their debts, furnishes an additional and very cogent reason why the Federal Government should refrain from creating a national debt, by which the people would be exposed to double taxation for a similar object. We possess within ourselves ample resources for every emergency; and we may be quite sure that our citizens, in no future exigency, will be unwilling to supply the Government with all the means asked for the defence of the country. In time of peace there can, at all events, be no justification for the creation of a permanent debt by the Federal Government. Its limited range of constitutional duties may certainly, under such circumstances, be performed without such a resort. It has, it is seen, been avoided during four years of greater fiscal difficulties than have existed in a similar period since the adoption of the Constitution, and one also remarkable for the occurrence of extraordinary causes of expenditures.

But to accomplish so desirable an object, two things are indispensable: first, that the action of the Federal Government be kept within the boundaries prescribed by its founders, and, secondly, that all appropriations for objects admitted to be constitutional, and the expenditure of them also, be subjected to a standard of rigid but well considered and practical economy. The first depends chiefly on the people themselves, the opinions they form of the true construction of the Constitution, and the confidence they repose in the political sentiments of those they select as their representatives in the Federal Legislature; the second rests upon the fidelity with which their more immediate representatives, and other public functionaries, discharge the trusts committed to them. The duty of economizing the expenses of the public service is admitted on all hands; yet there are few subjects upon which there exists a wider difference of opinion than is constantly manifested in regard to the fidelity with which that duty is discharged. Neither diversity of sentiment, nor even mutual recriminations, upon a point in respect to which the public mind is so justly sensitive, can well be entirely avoided; and least so at periods of great political excitement. An intelligent people, however, seldom fail to arrive, in the end, at correct conclusions in such a matter. Practical economy in the management of public affairs can have no adverse influence to contend with more powerful than a large surplus revenue; and the unusually large appropriations for 1837 may, without doubt, independently of the extraordinary requisitions for the public service growing out of the state of our Indian relations, be, in no inconsiderable degree, traced to this source. The sudden and rapid distribution of the large surplus then in the Treasury, and the equally sudden and unprecedentedly severe revulsion in the commerce and business of the country, pointing with unerring certainty to a great and protracted reduction of the revenue, strengthened the propriety of the earliest practicable reduction of the public expenditures.

But, to change a system operating upon so large a surface, and applicable to such numerous and diversified interests and objects, was more than the work of a day. The attention of every department of the Government was immediately, and in good faith, directed to that end; and has been so continued to the present moment. The estimates and appropriations for the year 1838 (the first over which I had any control) were somewhat diminished. The expenditures of 1839 were reduced six millions of dollars. Those of 1840, exclusive of disbursements for public debt and trust claims, will probably not exceed twenty-two and a half millions; being between two and three millions less than those of the preceding year, and nine or ten millions less than those of 1837. Nor has it been found necessary, in order to produce this result, to resort to the power conferred by Congress, of postponing certain classes of the public works, except by deferring expenditures for a short period upon a limited portion of them; and which postponement terminated some time since, at the moment the Treasury Department, by further receipts from the indebted banks, became fully assured of its ability to meet them without prejudice to the public service in other respects. Causes are in operation which will, it is believed, justify a still further reduction, without injury to any important national interest. The expenses of sustaining the troops employed in Florida have been gradually and greatly reduced, through the persevering efforts of the War Department; and a reasonable hope may be entertained that the necessity for military operations in that quarter will soon cease. The removal of the Indians from within our settled borders is nearly completed. The pension list, one of the heaviest charges upon the Treasury, is rapidly diminishing by death. The most costly of our public buildings are either finished, or nearly so; and we may, I think, safely promise ourselves a continued exemption from border difficulties.

The available balance in the Treasury on the first of January next is estimated at one million and a half of dollars. This sum, with the expected receipts from all sources during the next year, will, it is believed, be sufficient to enable the Government to meet every engagement, and leave a suitable balance in the Treasury at the end of the year, if the remedial measures connected with the customs and the public lands, heretofore recommended, shall be adopted, and the new appropriations by Congress shall not carry the expenditures beyond the official estimates.

The new system established by Congress for the safekeeping of the public money, prescribing the kind of currency to be received for the public revenue, and providing additional guards and securities against losses, has now been several months in operation. Although it might be premature, upon an experience of such limited duration, to form a definite opinion in regard to the extent of its influences in correcting many evils under which the Federal Government and the country have hitherto suffered, especially those that have grown out of banking expansions, a depreciated currency, and official defalcations, yet it is but right to say that nothing has occurred in the practical operation of the system to weaken in the slightest degree, but much to strengthen the confident anticipations of its friends. The grounds of these have been heretofore so fully explained, as to require no recapitulation. In respect to the facility and convenience it affords in conducting the public service, and the ability of the Government to discharge through its agency every duty attendant on the collection, transfer, and disbursement of the public money with promptitude and success, I can say with confidence that the apprehensions of those who felt it to be their duty to oppose its adoption, have proved to be unfounded. On the contrary, this branch of the fiscal affairs of the Government has been, and it is believed may always be, thus carried on with every desirable facility and security. A few changes and improvements in the details of the system, without affecting any principles involved in it, will be submitted to you by the Secretary of the Treasury, and will, I am sure, receive at your hands that attention to which they may, on examination, be found to be entitled.

I have deemed this brief summary of our fiscal affairs necessary to the due performance of a duty specially enjoined upon me by the Constitution. It will serve, also, to illustrate more fully the principles by which I have been guided in reference to two contested points in our public policy, which were earliest in their development, and have been more important in their consequences, than any that have arisen under our complicated and difficult, yet admirable, system of Government: I allude to, a national debt, and a national bank. It was in these that the political contests by which the country has been agitated ever since the adoption of the Constitution, in a great measure, originated; and there is too much reason to apprehend that the conflicting interests and opposing principles thus marshalled, will continue, as heretofore, to produce similar, if not aggravated, consequences.

Coming into office the declared enemy of both, I have earnestly endeavored to prevent a resort to either.

The consideration that a large public debt affords an apology, and produces, in some degree, a necessity also, for resorting to a system and extent of taxation which is not only oppressive throughout, but likewise so apt to lead, in the end, to the commission of that most odious of all offences against the principles of Republican government—the prostitution of political power, conferred for the general benefit, to the aggrandizement of particular classes, and the gratification of individual cupidity—is alone sufficient, independently of the weighty objections which have already been urged, to render its creation and existence the sources of bitter and unappeasable discord. If we add to this, its inevitable tendency to produce and foster extravagant expenditures of the public money, by which a necessity is created for new loans and new burdens on the people; and, finally, if we refer to the examples of every Government which has existed, for proof how seldom it is that the system, when once adopted and implanted in the policy of a country, has failed to expand itself, until public credit was exhausted, and the people were no longer able to endure its increasing weight, it seems impossible to resist the conclusion, that no benefits resulting from its career, no extent of conquest, no accession of wealth to particular classes; nor any, nor all its combined advantages, can counterbalance its ultimate but certain results—a splendid Government, and an impoverished people.

If a National Bank was, as is undeniable, repudiated by the framers of the Constitution as incompatible with the rights of the States and the liberties of the people; if, from the beginning, it has been regarded by large portions of our citizens as coming in direct collision with that great and vital amendment of the Constitution, which declares that all powers not conferred by that instrument on the General Government are reserved to the States and to the people; if it has been viewed by them as the first great step in the march of latitudinous construction, which, unchecked, would render that sacred instrument of as little value as an unwritten Constitution, dependent, as it would alone be, for its meaning, on the interested interpretation of a dominant party, and affording no security to the rights of the minority; if such is undeniably the case, what rational grounds could have been conceived for anticipating aught but determined opposition to such an institution at the present day.

Could a different result have been expected, when the consequences which have flowed from its creation, and particularly from its struggles to perpetuate its existence, had confirmed, in so striking a manner, the apprehensions of its earliest opponents; when it had been so clearly demonstrated that a concentrated money power, wielding so vast a capital, and combining such incalculable means of influence, may, in those peculiar conjunctures to which this Government is unavoidably exposed, prove an overmatch for the political power of the people themselves; when the true character of its capacity to regulate, according to its will and its interests, and the interests of its favorites, the value and production of the labor and property of every man in this extended country, had been so fully and fearfully developed; when it was notorious that all classes of this great community had, by means of the power and influence it thus possesses, been infected to madness with a spirit of heedless speculation; when it had been seen that, secure in the support of the combination of influences by which it was surrounded, it could violate its charter, and set the laws at defiance with impunity; and when, too, it had become most apparent that to believe that such an accumulation of powers can ever be granted without the certainty of being abused, was to indulge in a fatal delusion?

To avoid the necessity of a permanent debt, and its inevitable consequences, I have advocated, and endeavored to carry into effect, the policy of confining the appropriations for the public service to such objects only as are clearly within the constitutional authority of the Federal Government; of excluding from its expenses those improvident and unauthorized grants of public money for works of internal improvement, which were so wisely arrested by the constitutional interposition of my predecessor, and which, if they had not been so checked, would long before this time have involved the finances of the General Government in embarrassments far greater than those which are now experienced by any of the States, of limiting all our expenditures to that simple, unostentatious, and economical administration of public affairs, which is alone consistent with the character of our institutions; of collecting annually from the customs, and the sales of public lands, a revenue fully adequate to defray all the expenses thus incurred, but, under no pretence whatsoever, to impose taxes upon the people to a greater amount than was actually necessary to the public service, conducted upon the principles I have stated.

In lieu of a national bank, or a dependence upon banks of any description, for the management of our fiscal affairs, I recommended the adoption of the system which is now in successful operation. That system affords every requisite facility for the transaction of the pecuniary concerns of the Government; will, it is confidently anticipated, produce in other respects many of the benefits which have been from time to time expected from the creation of a national bank, but which have never been realized; avoid the manifold evils inseparable from such an institution; diminish, to a greater extent than could be accomplished by any other measure of reform, the patronage of the Federal Government—a wise policy in all Governments, but more especially so in one like ours, which works well only in proportion as it is made to rely for its support upon the unbiassed and unadulterated opinions of its constituents; do away, forever, all dependence on corporate bodies, either in the raising, collecting, safekeeping, or disbursing the public revenues, and place the Government equally above the temptation of fostering a dangerous and unconstitutional institution at home, or the necessity of adapting its policy to the views and interests of a still more formidable money-power abroad.

It is by adopting and carrying out these principles, under circumstances the most arduous and discouraging, that the attempt has been made, thus far successfully, to demonstrate to the people of the United States that a National Bank at all times; and a national debt, except it be incurred at a period when the honor and safety of the nation demand the temporary sacrifice of a policy, which should only be abandoned in such exigencies, are not merely unnecessary, but in direct and deadly hostility to the principles of their Government, and to their own permanent welfare.

The progress made in the development of these positions, appears in the preceding sketch of the past history and present state of the financial concerns of the Federal Government. The facts there stated fully authorize the assertion, that all the purposes for which this Government was instituted have been accomplished during four years of greater pecuniary embarrassment than were ever before experienced in time of peace, and in the face of opposition as formidable as any that was ever before arrayed against the policy of an Administration; that this has been done when the ordinary revenues of the Government were generally decreasing, as well from the operation of the laws, as the condition of the country, without the creation of a permanent public debt, or incurring any liability, other than such as the ordinary resources of the Government will speedily discharge, and without the agency of a National Bank.

If this view of the proceedings of the Government, for the period it embraces, be warranted by the facts as they are known to exist; if the army and navy have been sustained to the full extent authorized by law, and which Congress deemed sufficient for the defence of the country and the protection of its rights and its honor; if its civil and diplomatic service has been equally sustained; if ample provision has been made for the administration of justice and the execution of the laws; if the claims upon public gratitude in behalf of the soldiers of the Revolution have been promptly met and faithfully discharged; if there have been no failures in defraying the very large expenditures growing out of that long continued and salutary policy of peacefully removing the Indians to regions of comparative safety and prosperity; if the public faith has at all times, and every where been most scrupulously maintained by a prompt discharge of the numerous, extended, and diversified claims on the Treasury; if all these great and permanent objects, with many others that might be stated, have, for a series of years, marked by peculiar obstacles and difficulties, been successfully accomplished without a resort to a permanent debt, or the aid of a national bank, have we not a right to expect that a policy, the object of which has been to sustain the public service independently of either of these fruitful sources of discord, will receive the final sanction of a people whose unbiased and fairly elicited judgment upon public affairs is never ultimately wrong?

That embarrassments in the pecuniary concerns of individuals, of unexampled extent and duration, have recently existed in this, as in other commercial nations, is undoubtedly true. To suppose it necessary now to trace these reverses to their sources, would be a reflection on the intelligence of my fellow-citizens. Whatever may have been the obscurity in which the subject was involved during the earlier stages of the revulsion, there cannot now be many by whom the whole question is not fully understood.

Not deeming it within the constitutional powers of the General Government to repair private losses sustained by reverses in business having no connection with the public service, either by direct appropriations from the Treasury, or by special legislation designed to secure exclusive privileges and immunities to individuals or classes in preference to, and at the expense of, the great majority necessarily debarred from any participation in them, no attempt to do so has been either made, recommended, or encouraged, by the present Executive.

It is believed, however, that the great purposes for the attainment of which the Federal Government was instituted have not been lost sight of. Intrusted only with certain limited powers, cautiously enumerated, distinctly specified, and defined with a precision and clearness which would seem to defy misconstruction, it has been my constant aim to confine myself within the limits so clearly marked out, and so carefully guarded. Having always been of opinion that the best preservative of the union of the States is to be found in a total abstinence from the exercise of all doubtful powers on the part of the Federal Government, rather than in attempts to assume them by a loose construction of the Constitution, or an ingenious perversion of its words, I have endeavored to avoid recommending any measure which I had reason to apprehend would, in the opinion even of a considerable minority of my fellow-citizens, be regarded as trenching on the rights of the States, or the provisions of the hallowed instrument of our Union. Viewing the aggregate powers of the Federal Government as a voluntary concession of the States, it seemed to me that such only should be exercised as were at the time intended to be given.

I have been strengthened, too, in the propriety of this course, by the conviction that all efforts to go beyond this, tend only to produce dissatisfaction and distrust, to excite jealousies, and to provoke resistance. Instead of adding strength to the Federal Government, even when successful, they must ever prove a source of incurable weakness, by alienating a portion of those whose adhesion is indispensable to the great aggregate of united strength, and whose voluntary attachment is, in my estimation, far more essential to the efficiency of a Government strong in the best of all possible strength—the confidence and attachment of all those who make up its constituent elements.

Thus believing, it has been my purpose to secure to the whole people, and to every member of the contending, by general, salutary, and equal laws alone, the benefit of those Republican institutions which it was the end and aim of the Constitution to establish, and the impartial influence of which is, in my judgment, indispensable to their preservation. I cannot bring myself to believe that the lasting happiness of the people, the prosperity of the States, or the permanency of their Union, can be maintained by giving reference or priority to any class of citizens in the distribution of benefits or privileges, or by the adoption of measures which enrich one portion of the Union at the expense of another, nor can I see in the interference of the Federal Government with the local legislation and reserved rights of the States, a remedy for present, or a security against future, dangers.

The first, and assuredly not the least, important step towards relieving the country from the condition into which it had been plunged by excesses in trade, banking, and credits of all kinds, was to place the business transactions of the Government itself on a solid basis; giving and receiving in all cases value for value, and neither countenancing nor encouraging in others that delusive system of credits from which it has been found so difficult to escape, and which has left nothing behind it but the wrecks that mark its fatal career.

That the financial affairs of the Government are now, and have been during the whole period of these widespread difficulties, conducted with a strict and invariable regard to this great fundamental principle, and that by the assumption and maintenance of the stand thus taken on the very threshold of the approaching crisis, more than by any other cause or causes whatever, the community at large has been shielded from the incalculable evils of a general and indefinite suspension of specie payments, and a consequent annihilation, for the whole period it might have lasted, of a just and invariable standard of value, will, it is believed, at this period, scarcely be questioned.

A steady adherence, on the part of the Government, to the policy which has produced such salutary results, aided by judicious State legislation, and, what is not less important, by the industry, enterprise, perseverance, and economy of the American people, cannot fail to raise the whole country, at an early period, to a state of solid and enduring prosperity, not subject to be again overthrown by the suspension of banks or the explosion of a bloated credit system. It is for the people, and their representatives, to decide whether or not the permanent welfare of the country (which all good citizens equally desire, however widely they may differ as to the means of its accomplishment) shall be in this way secured; or whether the management of the pecuniary concerns of the Government, and, by consequence, to a great extent, those of individuals also, shall be carried back to a condition of things which fostered those contractions and expansions of the currency, and those reckless abuses of credit, from the baleful effects of which the country has so deeply suffered—a return that can promise, in the end, no better results than to reproduce the embarrassments the Government has experienced; and to remove from the shoulders of the present, to those of fresh victims, the bitter fruits of that spirit of speculative enterprise to which our countrymen are so liable, and upon which the lessons of experience are so unavailing. The choice is an important one, and I sincerely hope that it may be wisely made.

A report from the Secretary of War, presenting a detailed view of the affairs of that department, accompanies this communication.

The duty connected with the removal of the Indians, in which the army has been constantly engaged on the Northern and Western frontiers, and in Florida, have rendered it impracticable to carry into full effect the plan recommended by the Secretary for improving its discipline. In every instance where the regiments have been concentrated, they have made great progress; and the best results may be anticipated from a continuance of this system. During the last season, a part of the troops have been employed in removing Indians from the interior to the territory assigned them in the West—a duty which they have performed efficiently, and with praiseworthy humanity; and that portion of them which has been stationed in Florida continued active operations there throughout the heats of summer.

The policy of the United States in regard to the Indians, of which a succinct account is given in my message of 1838, and of the wisdom and expediency of which I am fully satisfied, has been continued in active operation throughout the whole period of my administration. Since the spring of 1837, more than forty thousand Indians have been removed to their new homes west of the Mississippi; and I am happy to add that all accounts concur in representing the result of this measure as eminently beneficial to that people.

The emigration of the Seminoles alone has been attended with serious difficulty, and occasioned bloodshed, hostilities having been commenced by the Indians in Florida, under the apprehension that they would be compelled, by force, to comply with their treaty stipulations. The execution of the treaty of Payne's Landing, signed in 1832, but not ratified until 1834, was postponed, at the solicitation of the Indians, until 1836, when they again renewed their agreement to remove peaceably to their new homes in the West. In the face of this solemn and renewed compact, they broke their faith, and commenced hostilities by the massacre of Major Dade's command, the murder of their agent, General Thompson, and other acts of cruel treachery. When this alarming and unexpected intelligence reached the seat of Government, every effort appears to have been made to reinforce General Clinch, who commanded the troops then in Florida. General Eustis was despatched with reinforcements from Charleston, troops were called out from Alabama, Tennessee, and Georgia, and General Scott was sent to take the command, with ample powers and ample means. At the first alarm, General Gaines organized a force at New Orleans, and, without waiting for orders, landed in Florida, where he delivered over the troops he had brought with him to General Scott.

Gov. Call was subsequently appointed to conduct a summer campaign, and, at the close of it, was replaced by General Jesup. These events and changes took place under the administration of my predecessor. Notwithstanding the exertions of the experienced officers who had command there for eighteen months, on entering upon the administration of the Government I found the Territory of Florida a prey to Indian atrocities. A strenuous effort was immediately made to bring these hostilities to a close; and the army, under General Jesup, was reinforced until it amounted to ten thousand men, and furnished with abundant supplies of every description. In this campaign a great number of the enemy were captured and destroyed; but the character of the contest only was changed. The Indians, having been defeated in every engagement, dispersed in small bands throughout the country, and became an enterprising, formidable, and ruthless banditti. General Taylor, who succeeded General Jesup, used his best exertions to subdue them, and was seconded in his efforts by the officers under his command; but he, too, failed to protect the Territory from their depredations. By an act of signal and cruel treachery, they broke the truce made with them by General Macomb, who was sent from Washington for the purpose of carrying into effect the expressed wishes of Congress, and have continued their devastations ever since. General Armistead, who was in Florida when General Taylor left the army, by permission, assumed the command, and, after active summer operations, was met by propositions for peace; and, from the fortunate coincidence of the arrival in Florida, at the same period, of a delegation from the Seminoles who are happily settled west of the Mississippi, and are now anxious to persuade their countrymen to join them there, hopes were for some time entertained that the Indians might be induced to leave the Territory without further difficulty. These hopes have proved fallacious, and hostilities have been renewed throughout the whole of the Territory. That this contest has endured so long, is to be attributed to causes beyond the control of the Government. Experienced generals have had the command of the troops; officers and soldiers have alike distinguished themselves for their activity, patience, and enduring courage; the army has been constantly furnished with supplies of every description; and we must look for the causes which have so long procrastinated the issue of the contest, in the vast extent of the theatre of hostilities, the almost insurmountable obstacles presented by the nature of the country, the climate, and the wily character of the savages.

The sites for marine hospitals on the rivers and lakes, which I was authorized to select and cause to be purchased, have all been designated, but the appropriation not proving sufficient, conditional arrangements only have been made for their acquisition. It is for Congress to decide whether those conditional purchases shall be sanctioned, and the humane intentions of the law carried into full effect.

The navy, as will appear from the accompanying report of the Secretary, has been usefully and honorably employed in the protection of our commerce and citizens in the Mediterranean, the Pacific, on the coast of Brazil, and in the Gulf of Mexico. A small squadron, consisting of the frigate Constellation and the sloop-of-war Boston, under Commodore Kearney, is now on its way to the China and Indian seas, for the purpose of attending to our interests in that quarter; and Commander Aulick, in the sloop-of-war Yorktown, has been instructed to visit the Sandwich and Society islands, the coasts of New Zealand and Japan, together with other ports and islands frequented by our whale-ships, for the purpose of giving them countenance and protection, should they be required. Other smaller vessels have been, and still are, employed in prosecuting the surveys of the coast of the United States, directed by various acts of Congress; and those which have been completed will shortly be laid before you.

The Exploring expedition, at the latest date, was preparing to leave the Bay of Islands, New Zealand, in further prosecution of objects which have thus far been successfully accomplished. The discovery of a new continent, which was first seen in latitude 66° 2' south, longitude 154° 27' east, and afterwards in latitude 66° 31' south, longitude 153° 40' east, by Lieutenant's Wilkes and Hudson, for an extent of eighteen hundred miles, but on which they were prevented from landing by vast bodies of ice which encompassed it, is one of the honorable results of the enterprise. Lieutenant Wilkes bears testimony to the zeal and good conduct of his officers and men; and it is but justice to that officer to state that he appears to have performed the duties assigned to him with an aid, ability, and perseverance, which give every assurance of an honorable issue to the under taking.

The report of the Postmaster General, herewith transmitted, will exhibit the service of that Department the past year, and its present condition. The transportation has been maintained during the year to the full extent authorized by the existing laws; some improvements have been effected, which the public interest seemed urgently to demand, but not involving any material additional expenditure; the contractors have generally performed their engagements with fidelity; the postmasters, with few exceptions, have rendered their accounts and paid their quarterly balances with promptitude; and the whole service of the Department has maintained the efficiency for which it has for several years been distinguished.

The acts of Congress establishing new mail routes, and requiring more expensive services on others, and the increasing wants of the country, have, for three years past, carried the expenditures something beyond the accruing revenues; the excess having been met, until the past year, by the surplus which had previously accumulated. That surplus having been exhausted, and the anticipated increase in the revenue not having been realized, owing to the depression in the commercial business of the country, the finances of the department exhibit a small deficiency at the close of the last fiscal year. Its resources, however, are ample; and the reduced rates of compensation for the transportation service, which may be expected on the future lettings, from the general reduction of prices, with the increase of revenue that may reasonably be anticipated from the revival of commercial activity, must soon place the finances of the department in a prosperous condition.

Considering the unfavorable circumstances which have existed during the past year, it is a gratifying result that the revenue has not declined, as compared with the preceding year, but, on the contrary, exhibits a small increase; the circumstances referred to having had no other effect than to check the expected income.

It will be seen that the Postmaster General suggests certain improvements in the establishment, designed to reduce the weight of the mails, cheapen the transportation, ensure greater regularity in the service, and secure a considerable reduction in the rates of letter postage—an object highly desirable. The subject is one of general interest to the community, and is respectfully recommended to your consideration.

The suppression of the African slave trade has received the continued attention of the Government. The brig Dolphin and schooner Grampus have been employed during the last season on the coast of Africa, for the purpose of preventing such portions of that trade as was said to be prosecuted under the American flag. After cruising off those parts of the coast most usually resorted to by slavers, until the commencement of the rainy season, these vessels returned to the United States for supplies, and have since been despatched on a similar service.

From the reports of the commanding officers, it appears that the trade is now principally carried on under Portuguese colors; and they express the opinion that the apprehension of their presence on the slave coast has, in a great degree, arrested the prostitution of the American flag to this inhuman purpose. It is hoped that, by continuing to maintain this force in that quarter, and by the exertions of the officers in command, much will be done to put a stop to whatever portion of this traffic may have been carried on under the American flag, and to prevent its use in a trade which, while it violates the laws, is equally an outrage on the rights of others and the feelings of humanity. The efforts of the several Governments who are anxiously seeking to suppress this traffic must, however, be directed against the facilities afforded by what are now recognised as legitimate commercial pursuits, before that object can be fully accomplished. Supplies of provisions, water-casks, merchandise, and articles connected with the prosecution of the slave-trade, are, it is understood, freely carried by vessels of different nations to the slave factories; and the effects of the factors are transported openly from one slave station to another, without interruption or punishment by either of the nations to which they belong, engaged in the commerce of that region. I submit to your judgments whether this Government, having been the first to prohibit, by adequate penalties, the slave trade—the first to declare it piracy—should not be the first, also, to forbid to its citizens all trade with the slave factories on the coast of Africa; giving an example to all nations in this respect, which, if fairly followed, cannot fail to produce the most effective results in breaking up those dens of iniquity.

The message having been read,

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD,

Ordered, That the message and accompanying documents be printed; and that five thousand copies of the message, and fifteen hundred copies of the message and accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied by his annual report on the finances, which was ordered to be printed.

REPORT FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, ON THE STATE OF THE FINANCES.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
December 7, 1840.

The undersigned respectfully submits to Congress the following report on the finances:

He has great pleasure in announcing that during the present year the expenditures have been still further reduced; and, though the revenue has not proved so large as usual, all the public engagements have been met with promptitude.

I. The receipts and means for 1840, exclusive of trusts and the Post Office has been as follows: The available balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1840, is computed to have been - $2,246,749 00

The data on which this conclusion rests, connected with the actual receipts and expenditures in 1839, and with the unavailable condition of a portion of the public funds, may be seen in the statements annexed.

During the first three quarters of the present year the net receipts from customs were - $10,689,884 78

During the same period the receipts from lands were - 2,630,217 25

Miscellaneous receipts for the same time - 77,660 98

Estimated receipts for the fourth quarter from all these sources - 3,800,000 00

These make the aggregate of ordinary receipts for the year - 17,197,763 01

Add the estimated receipts of principal and interest in 1840, out of what was due from former deposit banks, but not available on the 1st of January last - $850,000 00

Add also the estimated receipts from the fourth bond of the United States Bank - 2,500,000 00

Do. from the issue of Treasury notes instead of others redeemed - 5,440,000 00

Aggregate from these additional sources - 8,790,000 00

This will make the total means in 1840, as ascertained and estimated - $28,234,512 01

It is proper to remark, that about $700,000 of the sums computed to be received within the year from the banks above described, have not yet been ascertained to be paid; and if, contrary to expectation, there should be a failure to pay any part of them until next year, it will make a difference to that extent in the preceding results.

II. The expenditures for 1840, exclusive of trusts and the Post Office, have been as follows:

For the first three quarters: civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous - $4,113,248 64

For the same time, military - 8,750,784 52

For the same time, naval - 4,620,316 35

Estimates by this Department (though higher by the others) for all expenses during the fourth quarter - 5,000,000 00

These make the aggregate of current expenses for the whole year 22,489,349 51

Add for funded debt and interest for that of the cities of the District of Columbia during the year, ascertained and estimated - 100,000 00

Redemption of Treasury notes, including principal and interest, ascertained during the first three quarters - 3,629,306 61

Estimate of notes that will be redeemed in the fourth quarter - 425,000 00

26TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sen. & H. of Reps.

This will make the aggregate of payments or expenditures of all kinds 26,643,656 12 Leaving an available balance of money in the Treasury on the 31st December, 1840, computed to be 1,590,855 89

$28,234,512 01

The funds on hand, considered not available for public purposes, at the commencement as well as close of the present year, are described particularly in the statement annexed.

Previous to the close of the year, should Congress pass any new appropriations which may be immediately expended, an additional charge to that extent will thus be imposed on 1840; and if amounting to any considerable sum, it might prudently be accompanied by some provision of new means sufficient for its payment.

III. The condition of the public debt next demands consideration.

An exhibit of the particulars of it, whether funded or unfunded, and of the payments made within the year on account of both, is annexed.

Probably none of the former kind of debt exists which is due, except what has been forgotten, or the evidence of it mislaid; as all ever claimed, whether incurred in the Revolution, or since, has been promptly discharged. It is fortunate that no new debt of a permanent character has been recently created by the General Government; and the undersigned, for reasons formerly explained, which need not be here repeated, has uniformly considered it sound policy never to incur one in time of peace. But it will be recollected that Congress, by an act passed in May, 1836, engaged, under special conditions, to make payment of a debt due from the cities of the District of Columbia to certain individuals abroad.

The principal amounted of $1,500,000, and was to be paid in yearly instalments of $60,000 each, beginning the 1st of January, 1841. But the interest was payable quarterly, and, during the last four years, has been regularly discharged by the Treasury.

Within the past year, notice has been received from the agent of the creditors that payment of the first and subsequent instalments of the principal is desired to be made, when due, with punctuality. To insure a compliance with that wish, it will be necessary, besides meeting the interest quarterly, to advance $60,000 of the principal at the commencement of the ensuing year; and the residue must be paid, in like amounts, annually hereafter, till the whole is discharged.

The canal stocks, assigned to secure these payments, can, by the terms of the agreement, be sold to aid in reimbursing them. But, in the first instance, the money is to be taken from the Treasury, under existing laws, which appropriate sufficient to discharge all outstanding debts; and a sale, if able to be made afterwards, must probably be at a great sacrifice. Congress may therefore, in its wisdom, think further legislation on the subject expedient.

This is all the funded debt not due, and likewise all of it not paid, except, as before explained, the inconsiderable portions never yet demanded.

In respect to the unfunded debt: such small parts as were created previous to 1837, and still remain unsatisfied, must, it is presumed, be in that condition from some accident, which has prevented a request to be made for payment.

Nor has any of it, which was incurred since, fallen due, without being discharged whenever claimed.

The whole balance of the four emissions of Treasury notes made since October, 1837, which was outstanding on the 1st instant, amounted only to $4,433,823. This is but $1,675,498 more than at the close of 1839, notwithstanding the great decline in our revenue since, and the unexpectedly large expenditures of old appropriations connected with the Florida war, and the further adjustment of claims in behalf of Indians.

Had these events not happened, less even than that amount of notes would have been issued, and the Treasury might, with ease, have redeemed within the year all that were outstanding.

It could have done the same, also, with most of them, had Congress, at the last session, passed the declaratory act concerning the tariff, modified the system of drawbacks to correspond with the existing duties, and adopted the propositions made for graduating the price of the public lands, as well as forming new land districts.

It must be gratifying to learn, however, that, though incommoded by the failure of those measures, and the unexpected circumstances before enumerated, the Department has been enabled, by other means under its control, to redeem every note presented, and to pay, with punctuality, all debts that have fallen due.

The credit of the General Government has thus thus been preserved so high, that, instead of sacrificing its securities at large discounts, as in this and foreign nations some have been compelled to do with public stocks, the Treasury notes have continued at par during the year, though never bearing an interest higher than 5-2-5 per cent. and subject even to the stoppage of that, after sixty days' notice.

In fine, on a review of the whole subject, our situation respecting a public debt of any kind will be found a most favored one. Regarded as an indication either of the good state of the national credit, or the ample resources of the General Government, or the discreet legislation relative to its fiscal concerns, it will be difficult to discover many eras more prosperous in these respects, whether in the annals of this or any other country.

IV. The exports and imports within the year ending September 30, 1840, exhibit several striking peculiarities. While the foreign commerce of the country constitutes the chief basis of the revenue of the General Government, and is indicative of the extent of our surplus produce, the statistical returns in relation to the subject must excite constant attention among statesmen and political economists, as well as merchants.

The exports during the year are computed to have been $131,571,950. This amount is quite $10,543,534 more than in 1839, notwithstanding the reduced price of some of our great staples, and is larger than ever existed before in our history.

Of the whole exports, only $17,809,333 were of foreign origin. This left those of domestic origin at $113,762,617, being $6,845,937 more than in any previous year.

The imports during 1840 were about $104,805,891. This shows the great falling off from the previous year of $57,286,241. It furnishes, likewise, the principal explanation of the extraordinary diminution which has occurred in the revenue from customs; a diminution, however, which has been caused, in part, by evasions of the laws, new judicial constructions left uncorrected, and the payment of too large sums for bounties and drawbacks, under an omission in the existing tariff to reduce them in a ratio equal to the reduction going on in the duties.

The difference between our exports and imports has usually been in favor of the latter. Several years ago it ranged that way about seven millions of dollars annually; but, of late, the average has risen to near twenty millions annually; the excess of imports having been, in 1836 even, $61,316,995, and in 1839 $41,063,716. But during 1840, the extraordinary occurrence of a reverse in this state of things has taken place. Such a circumstance as the exports at all exceeding the imports, is believed to have happened previously only six times since the Constitution was adopted; and then, never to an extent beyond $7,916,831. Now, however, without any inflation, and in some important articles under a contraction of prices, the excess of exports is not only more than ever was known before, but quite threefold greater, being computed to equal $26,766,059.

This excess having failed to produce the usual corresponding increase of imports, but, on the contrary, having been accompanied by a diminution never previously equalled in amount, except under the influence of the embargo in 1808, the whole matter furnishes another proof of the hazardous fluctuations in the chief source of our present revenue, which Congress has been requested so repeatedly to guard against by some permanent provision.

It is also a strong illustration of the probability of the conjecture expressed in the last annual report, that the country had become alarmingly indebted abroad; in part on ordinary mercantile credit, but chiefly on stocks of corporations and States.

To meet what would soon be due for interest alone, it was then supposed would require twelve or thirteen millions of the exports; and which, in that event, would of course furnish no returns in imports. The same result must follow yearly, till the old stocks are redeemed, unless new ones can, for some time longer, be sold; and the difficulty be thus deferred, though merely at the expense of increasing the whole ultimate indebtedness.

But it is a source of great satisfaction to witness the indications which the unprecedented amount of exports, during the last four years, has given of the continued prosperity of the country.

Notwithstanding some depressions in particular branches of business, or in particular places, the general prosperity has been such as to create a large surplus of products, and to enable us to send abroad immense and increased values of them, however great the complaints have been as to low prices.

These official records are some of the most authentic tests of truth, amidst contradictory conjectures on topics like these. They show that we have been able to spare, in exports of domestic productions during the last four years, quite $408,894,743 in value; while in no previous term of that length, since the adoption of the Constitution, have they exceeded $359,447,622. Except in the last two series of four years, they have never gone beyond $239,576,749; or, not two-thirds as high as from 1837 to 1840. The whole tonnage of the country has also advanced within the four years past, more than 20,000 tons.

Seldom, indeed, if ever, has the navigating interest, one of the great exponents of our wealth and increased commerce, been so prosperous as within the last twelve months.

It is true that a portion of the increase in exports may be attributable to some alteration in the habits of the community, not connected with additional wealth.

The disposition in families to rely less on their own resources, and obtain more by means of mercantile exchanges abroad as well as at home, has, without doubt, grown more rapidly of late years than formerly, and tended to augment both the imports and exports beyond what the real increase in the amount of products would indicate. Yet the great excess of exports during the last few years, over those of previous times, cannot all have arisen from these circumstances. Granting, however, that some of it has; the consequences to that extent, and in another view of the subject, are not so well calculated to excite gratification. The increased dependence which the change of habits, in selling and buying so much more of what is consumed, has occasioned between different countries and those engaged in different avocations, as well as the increased credit thus demanded through many new ramifications, and the greater subjection thus produced of almost every pursuit to the evils attendant on fluctuations in prices, on bank expansions, and revulsions in commerce have probably exercised an influence on the events of the last four years not inconsiderable nor salutary. Combined with other causes, they must certainly have tended to effect a wide and unfavorable alteration in public manners; and may, in time, inflict an injury on the morals and character of the nation, which will more than counterbalance all the gains in wealth.

V. The estimates of the receipts and expenditures for 1841 next demand attention.

The actual receipts and expenditures in that year can, of course, be so regulated by Congress, through new legislation, as to reach nearly any amount it may deem proper. But the undersigned can neither increase nor diminish them; though a duty is devolved on him, in respect to the subject, while at the head of the Treasury, which he now proceeds to perform—of presenting some opinion concerning the amounts to which, under the existing laws, and the calls of the different departments, they are likely to attain.

He will further suggest any general changes which appear to him expedient, as well as any new means deemed necessary to meet all the burdens, which, it is apprehended, may be imposed.

The estimates for the ordinary receipts and expenditures in the ensuing year differ some millions from what will be actually received and expended in the present one.

It is calculated, however, that the difference will be what is always most desirable,—some increase of the receipts, and a further diminution of the expenditures.

The estimates for the latter, in the present year, were made less than those of 1839, and the results have corresponded. Indeed, it is a cause of much gratification that the expectations heretofore cherished, of materially reducing the public burdens, have been verified to so great an extent. Thus, the expenses of 1838 fell below those of 1837; while the expenses of 1839, notwithstanding the continuance of the Florida war, were nearly eight millions below those of 1838; and it is expected that the expenses of 1840 will be from two to three millions still lower, or quite ten millions less than those of 1838.

They would have been nearly twelve millions less, had not that war continued, and unusually large payments been made to Indians, under old appropriations.

It is believed that the ordinary expenses of 1841 ought to fall some millions below those in 1840; as the pensions have diminished by deaths, fewer Indians remain to be removed, several expensive public buildings have been mostly finished, and hostilities with the Seminoles must be nearer to a close.

More details concerning the estimates for the next year will be proper, and will illustrate the correctness of some of the preceding results.

It may be stated, from the best data in possession of this Department, that the receipts, under the existing laws, will probably be as follows:

From customs	$19,000,000
From lands	3,500,000
From miscellaneous	80,000
Add the expected balance in the Treasury, available on the 1st of January next	1,580,855

The aggregate of ordinary means for the next year would then be

There will be nothing more, either of principal or interest, due from banks, which is likely to be made available, except about

A power will exist, under the act of 31st March, 1840, to issue Treasury notes till a year from its passage expires, but not to make the whole emission outstanding at any one time exceed five millions of dollars. This will furnish additional means, equal to the computed amount which can be issued at the close of the present year, being about

Hence, there may be added, from these several sources, so much as to make the whole means for the next year

On the other hand, the expenditures for 1841 for ordinary purposes, if Congress make no reduction in the appropriations requested by the different departments, are estimated at

This would leave a balance in the Treasury, at the close of the year, equal to

But certain payments must also be made on account of the funded and unfunded debt, unless Congress authorize contracts to be formed for extending the time of their payment. Thus, there will be required—

On account of the funded debt, chiefly for the cities of this District

For the redemption of Treasury notes, if all the others be issued which can be under the present law, as then the amount returned within A. D. 1841 will probably not exceed

Estimated balance in the Treasury at the close of the next year, after all payments whatever

Thus it will be seen that if the whole of these charges, both ordinary and extraordinary, should be required to be extinguished in 1841, the estimated means will be sufficient for that purpose, but may not, besides, leave so large a balance in the Treasury as is convenient and useful. The best mode of obviating any difficulty which might arise from that circumstance will soon be considered by itself.

For some further general view of the grounds of the estimate of the expenditures for 1841, it will be necessary to advert a few moments to the new and old appropriations from which those expenditures are to be made.

The new ones, proposed by the different Departments for the service of 1841, amount to $16,621,520 28.

Besides these, certain permanent appropriations under existing laws will become chargeable on the Treasury during the next year, in sums as follows:

For ordinary purposes.

For other purposes.

These would make the new charges, for ordinary purposes, under both new and permanent appropriations, amount to $17,485,520 28. But, including the public debt and the redemption of Treasury notes, these charges would be $22,134,720 28.

It will be perceived, therefore, that the aggregate of actual expenditures during 1841 has been computed to be $1,764,480 higher than the estimated amount of new and permanent appropriations. This is done not only because some small oversights have doubtless occurred in the latter, and unavoidable omissions, as will be seen by the notes, but some new private bills, granting money, may be passed by Congress, and a greater proportion of the outstanding appropriations at the end of 1840 (though reduced as much as three or four millions less than at the end of 1839) may be expended in 1841, than will be left unexpended of the new charges imposed. These last two items are usually computed to equal each other. The Departments calculate that $6,661,123 of the old appropriations will be required to complete the purposes originally contemplated by them.

They propose only to apply about $3,749,904 of them to the service of the ensuing year, without re-appropriation; and the residue, amounting to $138,578, it is expected will go to the surplus fund. They estimate the whole of them at the close of the year to be $10,549,905.

VI. A few more explanations of other grounds for the estimates of receipts and expenditures for the next year may be useful.

It will be noticed that the estimates for both are founded principally on the existing laws. Should Congress, therefore, alter the tariff, so as to increase or reduce the duties, the expected amount of receipts must of course be varied in that proportion.

So it must be if Congress makes any essential change in respect to the public lands, and either passes a graduation bill, and creates new land districts in which surveys are ready for large sales, as this would increase the immediate receipts; or if, on the other hand, it should distribute the proceeds of the sales among the States, as that would diminish the revenue applicable to the purposes of the General Government, and render a resort to new taxation, an increased tariff, or a loan, indispensable, to the extent of the distribution.

The estimates of the receipts from customs have been lessened somewhat, because the importation of certain articles paying a duty will, in 1841, be partially postponed to 1842, in consequence of the great reduction in the tariff on them which will take place in the latter year under the existing laws.

So have they been on account of the greater proportionate bounties and drawbacks which are now returned on several articles, and some beneficial operation anticipated from the Independent Treasury in checking speculation.

On the contrary, the revulsions in business which have occurred since the middle of 1839, and deeply affected the revenue of some other countries as well as our own, and the protracted suspension of specie payments by many of the banks, which has continued over a large part of the United States since October in that year, will probably terminate soon, by the salutary reaction of great commercial principles; and that event must be accompanied by a considerable increase of imports and duties. The amount of the latter, therefore, has been estimated higher than the actual receipts in the present year, but not so high as they were in 1839 by about two millions, nor so high as many anticipate they will be. But if the banks do not speedily resume, it is to be feared that the estimate will prove larger, instead of smaller, than events will verify.

The revenue from lands must continue to be lower under the present laws than might otherwise be expected, because that portion of the vast sales in 1835 and 1836 which were made to speculators, must for some years longer come into the market in competition with the Government; and the emigration to Texas, as well as the continuance of the suspension of specie payments by the banks over much of the West and Southwest, is likely to operate injuriously somewhat longer, though probably with a force much diminished.

In respect to the estimates for expenditures, it need only be observed here, that any considerable addition made by Congress to the new appropriations called for, would require a provision of further means to meet them, corresponding in amount; and any diminution in those appropriations would also reduce, in a similar manner, the amount of means otherwise necessary.

VII. It is proper to advert next to the best mode of avoiding any inequality between the anticipated receipts and expenditures, either in 1841 or 1842.

It has already been shown that the whole amount of receipts in 1841 will probably be sufficient to discharge all ordinary expenditures, and those parts of the outstanding debt, funded or unfunded, which may become due. But the preservation of a suitable balance in the Treasury may require more than what will probably be left after satisfying other purposes. The raising of any sum for that object in 1841 could, however, be obviated by authorizing a contract to be made, under proper restrictions, extending the period of payment for a portion of the temporary liabilities falling due in that year. Yet, in the opinion of the undersigned, the best mode of providing for this case would be, without either an extension of this kind, or a loan, or a further issue of Treasury notes, or a change in the tariff; but merely by lessening the appropriations for the service of 1841 below the estimates, or by passing such declaratory clauses as to the present tariff, and such acts as to the public lands, as have heretofore been urged on the consideration of Congress.

The arguments in favor of some further diminution in our expenditures, and the general items in which the reduction is considered most compatible with the public interests, were so fully exhibited in the last two annual reports as to render a repetition of them unnecessary.

It was then believed that the laws could be altered so as to admit of safely curtailing the appropriations at once, to such an extent that the expenditures need not exceed, in the aggregate, seventeen or eighteen millions yearly. After more of the pensions terminate, and the removal of the Indians is completed, they could be beneficially contracted to even less than that amount. Such a reduction as is first adverted to seems, therefore, proper to be adopted now, since it could be effected without the probability of injury to any useful national establishment, would promote public frugality, and supersede the necessity either of higher tariffs, direct taxes, or permanent debts.

If that be not done, the secondary measures before suggested, such as a declaratory act to enforce the present tariff; a suitable modification of the drawbacks and bounties; and the passage of bills graduating the price of public lands, as well as creating some new districts for the sale of them, would be likely, if taking effect early, to yield a suitable supply in the course of the year.

It will be observed, however, that though, under either of these arrangements, enough might be obtained within the whole of 1841 for the objects contemplated, yet not a due or sufficient proportion in the first quarter; because by that time all the measures are not likely to go into full operation, nor much of the anticipated increase to happen in the actual receipts of duties under existing laws. Unusually heavy expenses will also fall on that quarter in the next year. In addition to a full portion of most of the current expenses, and the whole pension payments for the first half of the year, and one-third of a million, or more, for all the annual fishing bounties, there will be imposed on it most of the charges for the whole year connected with the session of Congress and private bills, as well as large payments for taking the census, and for the first instalment of the debt of this District; several of them as early even as the first day of January.

From these circumstances, and the considerations that all which is due from the banks may not be then paid, and that the balance in the Treasury, under the policy adopted by Congress of late years, will of necessity be small, while the fluctuations and inequalities are very great between the receipts and expenditures in different portions of the year, to which we are constantly exposed from causes that have on former occasions been explained at length, it must be obvious that entire safety requires a conditional power to be seasonably conferred on the Executive to obtain at any time with 1841 such subsidiary means as may be needed for a few months, and as may be sufficient to enable the Treasury punctually to discharge, during that year, all the liabilities imposed by Congress.

There is another contingency under the existing laws, as to duties, which requires attention, with a view to be properly prepared for it; though legislation concerning the subject is not necessary so early as in the other case, because the event on which it depends cannot actually happen till the year 1842.

Thus the progressive reduction of the present tariff, which has been going on since 1833, will, after December, 1841, take effect to a much larger extent than heretofore. Nearly two millions and a half of dollars will then be deducted at once.

On the 1st of July afterwards, at least two millions and a half more of duties will be removed; making an aggregate, in six months, of quite five millions. If the imports then should not differ much from those in 1838, this would leave an income from them, not probably exceeding ten or eleven millions of dollars yearly. It will therefore be necessary to make corresponding reductions in the expenditures of 1842, or seasonably provide otherwise, in some permanent manner, to supply any wants likely to happen from this cause.

Should Congress conclude that such reduction in the expenditures cannot properly be made, and that the imports for 1842 will not increase beyond those in 1838, the amount of the deficiency would, in those events, probably differ but little from five millions. Such a deficiency would, under these circumstances, be likely to become permanent, and may be considered the first of that character which will occur under the tariff act of 1833.

The idea that such a deficiency in time of peace ought to be supplied by issues of Treasury notes, or by a loan, has never been entertained by the undersigned. Nor can it be countenanced by any sound principles either of finance or political economy. The inquiry then recurs, what other mode would be more eligible? When we possessed an extraordinary surplus, it was considered prudent by Congress to make deposits with the States, with a view to be returned in an exigency, rather than to invest a portion of it safely and productively, so as to be realized in such an event. It would therefore be consistent with that arrangement to recall, in 1842, such part of the surplus as may be then needed.

That course, however, appears not very likely to be adopted, since the former power given to this Department to recall these deposits has been taken away by Congress.

Another practicable mode would be to resort to direct taxes. But this is so unsuited to the general habits, and so uncongenial to the opinions of most of our population, that its adoption is not to be anticipated. Some other permanent resource must then be looked to. The choice will probably rest between the large reduction of expenditures, with the other accompanying measures before specified, and some extensive modification of the present tariff. Explanations have heretofore been given by the undersigned in favor of the former course; and it would probably prove sufficient to meet the emergency, if the reduction be pushed vigorously, and especially if the imports after 1841 shall exceed those in 1838, which is regarded as probable.

But Congress may not coincide with him in opinion on these points, and, for covering the contingency, may consider the adoption of some permanent change in the tariff as preferable, and as not too early at the present session, to give full notice of its character, before going into operation, in order that the different interests most affected by it shall have time to become gradually adjusted to its provisions.

In that event, it might be supposed that the undersigned had avoided due responsibility, and a timely discharge of duty, if he were not prepared to offer some views concerning the details, as well as general principles, which he deems applicable to such a change. He has therefore examined the subject, and is ready to present the results at any moment either House of Congress shall express a wish to that effect. But he refrains from submitting them without a special request, because some doubt exist; under circumstances which can be properly appreciated, as to the delicacy of his discussing a measure at this time, which the Legislature may not consider it necessary to act on till a new Congress assembles.

VIII. The mode of keeping the public money recently established by Congress, has thus far answered the expectations of this Department.

The numerous labors, perplexities, and delays of putting a new system into operation, have been mostly overcome, and no losses whatever are known to have occurred under it.

Some of the provisions in the law are deemed objectionable in their details, and are respectfully recommended to Congress for revision. But they are not supposed to affect in the slightest degree any principle involved in the measure.

Thus, the ordinary clerks authorized are numerous enough, yet a principal one is needed at New York city, with such compensation as is usual at a place of so large and important business.

On full inquiry, it has been found also that no site could probably be purchased for the erection of an office at St. Louis, which would be more suitable than a lot now owned by the United States; and it may be, under a further examination which is in progress, that no new building could be erected on that site, which would prove more economical and convenient, than one which can be purchased already erected. A suitable change in the appropriation on that subject is therefore respectfully recommended.

A provision is needed likewise in case of vacancies, from any cause whatever, in the offices of receivers general and treasurers. One has formerly been asked in relation to collectors of the customs, in cases of removals and expirations of the terms of office, to prevent an interregnum in the discharge of the duties. This might properly be adopted as to them, and extended to receivers general and the Treasurer of the United States, as well as of the Mint and its branches, in all instances whatever of vacancy or temporary inability of the principal. Perhaps the least objectionable mode to effect this object would be, to direct that the chief clerk of all these officers should, in such cases, and where no other legal provision now exists, be authorized and required to discharge these duties, at the risk and under the responsibility of the principal and his securities, till the vacancy is filled, or the disability removed.

In consequence of some defects in the phraseology of the penal parts of the act, a new clause extending them to all disbursing officers of every character under the General Government would be judicious. A further provision also, respecting the places of deposit, by disbursing officers, of money not in the Treasury, but drawn out and put into their hands for making payments, appears necessary.

The keeping of such money is now regulated by the act of 3d of March, 1809; and if it is intended to bring it within the operation of the late law as to money in the Treasury, it seems proper to do so by an explicit enactment.

The section requiring disbursing officers to sell their drafts for specie alone, though certain proportions of paper are allowed to be received for all public dues, appears not to be in symmetry with those other provisions. The general influence of the present system is believed to have been thus far salutary. The true standard of value has been rendered more familiar, confidence has been increased in its stability, prices have gradually risen, business improved, and exchanges altered greatly for the better.

If something has been or may be lost in convenience, (which is not unlikely,) by the increasing disuse of a paper currency for public payments, much more will probably be gained by the circumstances before enumerated, as well as by the greater security in the use of specie, the more stable value imparted by the present system to property and labor, and the strong check established by it, not only against defalcations, but against bank expansions, excessive speculations, and commercial fluctuations.

Even any inconvenience attending this change in the currency used, if found particularly embarrassing, can be overcome hereafter, and the system still maintained, should Congress feel disposed to adopt the measure which was suggested for that purpose by the undersigned in September, 1837.

Such a measure would often furnish every advantage of a circulating medium, easy of transportation, of the highest possible credit, and at the same time requiring an equal amount of specie to be employed, (though in deposits,) and without subjecting any of the fiscal affairs of the Government to that legal dependence on corporations for their management, which is so objectionable in many respects, as never to have been attempted in the management of any of its other affairs, civil or military.

The topics of the condition of the banks of the Union; the state of the currency; the proper places of deposit for the public funds, and other matters immediately connected with them, have engrossed a considerable portion of the annual reports from this Department for several years.

But the keeping of the money in the Treasury being now separated from the banks, and the kind of money to be received and paid out fixed by new legal provisions, it is not considered material at this time further to discuss these matters, than to submit the general remarks which will be found at the close of this communication.

IX. Some miscellaneous topics connected with the finances deserve a brief notice.

The various measures heretofore recommended to Congress by the undersigned, and which have not yet been finally acted on, are again respectfully recalled to its attention.

Without recapitulating them, it will be found, on a reference to former reports, that many of the subjects possess much importance in a fiscal view, and every year's experience has strengthened the conviction of the usefulness of early action upon them.

It affords me pleasure to state that, since the last session, the Neapolitan Government, under its treaty of indemnity, has paid promptly another instalment, which this Department has been enabled to have remitted home early, and distributed among the claimants.

The situation of the General Land Office, and its operations within the year, will be submitted separately in a few days.

Six old land districts have been recently discontinued, under the act of June 12, 1840. It is believed that some others might economically and usefully be abolished by Congress, though not coming within the provisions of that law. Such is the office at Greensburg, Louisiana. One district in Indiana, including the capital of the State, is thought, from its peculiar position, to require special legislation to exempt it from the operation of the late act.

This occasion is taken, also, to renew the recommendations, before presented by this Department to Congress and the appropriate committees, for the discontinuance of certain officers now employed in the collection of duties, whose further services, it has been believed, could be safely dispensed with, in consequence of the reduction in business of late years at the different places where they are stationed. They include some collectors and naval officers, and several surveyors, amounting in all to eighteen, but whose offices cannot be abolished without new legislation.

All the subordinate custom-house officers, which it is competent for this Department, without such legislation, to dispense with, and whose situation was in other respects similar, have already been discontinued, including, within two years, more than fifty officers, and, besides those, five vessels and boats, with nearly one hundred men, in the cutter service. In about forty other cases, the compensation of officers and light-house keepers has been reduced.

X. In closing this last annual report of the undersigned, it may be expected that he would advert, for a moment, to the general character of some of our financial operations during the period of his connection with the Treasury Department.

Though employed in different Executive offices nearly ten years, he has been connected with the Treasury only from six to seven of them.

During this term there has occurred much to evince the great fiscal power, as well as prosperity of the Union. Some reverses have, at times, overtaken the rashness displayed by parts of the community in certain branches business, and have extended their adverse influences to the revenue dependent upon them. But the period and the country, as a whole, have been almost unexampled in prosperous developments.

Thus, in respect to our receipts. Notwithstanding the unusual revulsions in imports on two occasions, so sensibly lessening the revenue; notwithstanding any losses sustained in those crises, by the Government, through officers, banks, or merchants; and notwithstanding the biennial reduction in the duties, which has by law been constantly going on, as well as the remission of several millions to railroad corporations, and under new judicial constructions; yet our condition has been so flourishing, as to yield a revenue during that time sufficient, after all those deductions, to accomplish the following important results. It has enabled the Treasury to meet the current expenditures of the Government, as well as the extraordinary ones by Indian wars, treaties, and other costly measures, and, without imposing any new taxes, or higher tariff, and without any new funded debt whatever, but extinguishing considerable remains of the old one, and paying the interest on that assumed for this District, to save the unprecedented surplus of more than twenty-eight millions of dollars, and deposit the same with the States for safe keeping till needed by the General Government.

The only permanent aid in effecting this, beyond the receipts from ordinary sources, has been the debt due from the United States Bank, of about eight millions, and the Treasury notes now outstanding, equal to nearly four and a half millions. But during that period, a sum not far from the first amount has been applied to the discharge of the principal and interest of the old funded debt; so that, towards the payment of all other expenses, only between four and five millions, beyond what was temporary, and what has already been refunded or adjusted, have been received from any extraneous source whatever.

It follows, therefore, that the current revenue, notwithstanding all reductions, has been adequate to defray both the ordinary and extraordinary demands, and, after taking from what is deposited with the States, sufficient to extinguish every kind of indebtedness created on account of the General Government during the same period, to leave on hand the large balance of nearly twenty-four millions.

It is true that the available sums in the Treasury at the commencement and close of the period in question will probably prove different in amount; but if made equal, a surplus would still be left, which is likely to exceed seventeen or eighteen millions of dollars.

Beside this recorded evidence of the prosperity of the country and the fiscal ability of the General Government in those years, it is gratifying, amidst many misapprehensions concerning the subject, to reflect on another circumstance connected with our financial operations, which has also become matter of history. It is this: Though destitute of the aid of a United States Bank as a fiscal agent during that period, and baffled by various unremedied imperfections in the laws connected with the finances, as well as embarrassed by two suspensions of specie payments by many of the State banks—one still continuing; yet the Treasury has been able to make its vast collections, transfers, and payments, with promptitude, and in most cases with specie or its equivalent.

Some correct judgment can be formed of the extent and difficulty of these operations, when it is recollected that the whole sums which have thus been collected, without deducting fractions, added to those sums which have been paid over chiefly by another class of officers, have exceeded the extraordinary aggregate of $360,000,000, and been dispersed over a territory of nearly two million square miles in extent. It is, moreover, ascertained that the whole losses within the same time by defaults, large and small, and in all kinds of offices, will probably not equal half of one per cent. on that amount; and however official delinquencies may, in some cases, have inevitably been aggravated by the unprecedented speculations of the times, and by great revulsions and failures among banks and individuals, those losses will not be one-fourth so large, in proportion to the amounts collected and paid, as in some previous terms, when the system under a United States Bank was in full operation.

A few words may be proper as to the expenditures during the same period. Though they were of necessity augmented by some of the circumstances before mentioned, two Indian treaties only, out of a large number, having already involved us in the expense of nearly twenty-three millions of dollars; yet the aggregate of all has been much reduced since the influences of those causes and the impulses of an overflowing Treasury have diminished. The expenditures have fallen yearly since 1837, till they are now only twenty-two and a half millions independent of any debt and trusts, and are supposed to be in progress to a still lower amount.

The undersigned has earnestly urged a more rapid reduction. He has considered the great safeguard against a too splendid central government, which would constantly threaten to overshadow all State independence, and attract the ambition of most of the friends of State Rights from humbler paths of frugality and principle into the dazzling vortex of higher patronage, honors, and emoluments. While the stimulants to excesses shall continue to lessen, nothing will be necessary to insure the further success of an economical policy, but perseverance in retrenchments, wherever they are practicable without injury to the public interests. The removal of Indians being mostly finished, and the chief causes of frontier wars extinguished, unless new objects of expenditure be selected, or a great enlargement given to some already existing, the whole amount must, of necessity, contract hereafter very rapidly. The same result will be further promoted by the deaths of pensioners, increasing through advanced age, and the completion of many public works, as well as by persisting in a firm policy to avoid the wasteful expense of unnecessary foreign collisions, and to refrain from those lavish expenditures for certain domestic objects, over which the jurisdiction of the General Government is often questionable, and which always open the widest door to extravagance, favoritism, and corruption.

One of the greatest evils to the public service, as well as to the security of private business, during a part of the above period, has consisted in the fluctuations to which both have been subjected.

With only a single year intervening, and without any material change in the tariff, or any whatever in the price of the public lands, we have seen the revenue from ordinary sources suddenly vary from nearly fifty millions annually to eighteen; and, on two occasions since, vibrate to the extraordinary extent of nearly eight and eleven millions yearly.

The transactions of individuals upon which our revenue depends, must, of course, have undergone an unusual change at the same time.

The imports fell within two years, in the case first referred to, from near one hundred and ninety millions to one hundred and fourteen; and in the single year just passed, fell almost sixty millions. Such inflations and contractions must be destructive of all confidence in calculations for the future, while the causes of them shall continue to operate unremedied.

What were those causes?

They will be found to have been chiefly connected with the abuses of banking. On the occasion first referred to, they were the superabundance of a fictitious medium of circulation, with the attendant overtrading and speculations in 1836, and the consequent suspensions of specie payments in 1837, as well as the disasters and scarcity of any medium till the latter part of A. D. 1838. Then another expansion commenced, extending into 1839, and accompanied by another increase in imports of nearly fifty millions, which ended again in the contractions by banks, suspensions, and commercial reverses, which have suddenly reduced the imports of 1840 more than one-third, and in many places augmented seriously the embarrassments before existing from similar vacillations in the paper currency.

How far some imprudences abroad, at the same time, similar to these, though in a country enjoying any advantages which can result from a National Bank, may have augmented the evils here, by means of the intimate moneyed relations between us, need not now be discussed, though probably their influence was large and unfavorable.

The causes first named were, likewise, in full operation here in 1816 and 1817, and were succeeded by many of the same deplorable consequences in 1819 and 1820. One followed the other as inevitably as the ebb of the tide succeeds its flood.

The great principles of trade can never be long violated with impunity; and any fictitious or unnatural excess of credit soon ends in revulsions, as the essence of legitimate commerce consists in an exchange of values for each other, or of values for what truly represents values, and can be readily converted into them.

All business otherwise becomes a mere game of hazard; speculation must enter into every affair of life; riches and poverty will be dependent on the merest bubbles; prices will change oftener than the wind; regularity in receipts and expenditures be impossible; estimates for the future, whether in public or private matters, become mere conjectures; tariffs require yearly alteration to meet the fluctuations of business; and the community be kept under the constant excitement and depression of the hot and cold fits of a violent fever.

The first remedy sought in 1816, by the establishment of a National Bank, was supposed, during a few ensuing years, to have aggravated those evils; and the next remedy, adopted in 1824 by a high tariff, did not prevent the low prices and bankruptcies of 1825, which covered the country with wrecks and ruin.

Undoubtedly, the best relief on such occasions is to be found in removing the cause of the disease. So far as regards the General Government, this was attempted in 1837, and since, by gradually withdrawing from the use of banks and their paper in its fiscal operations, so as neither to stimulate nor contract their issues by other influences than ordinary business; and by urging on those, who might find their employment sometimes useful, a closer regard in doing it, to the safe and sober influences of the universal laws of trade, as well as an inflexible adherence to the constitutional standard of value.

While the General Government shall continue to pursue such a course, it will mitigate and check the evils which others produce, and which they alone, under the limitations in the Constitution, are able entirely to remove. At all events, it will faithfully perform a momentous duty, and exhibit a useful example for imitation.

In a period of peace and comparative exemption from public debt, as well as from serious difficulty in financial operations, it would hardly seem proper to attempt more by assumptions of doubtful powers, and by forced constructions in favor of measures by no means certain, if adopted, not to aggravate rather than diminish existing evils, and not to produce others of a character still more dangerous. Much less can it be considered respectful either to State rights or the people, and certainly not competent, in the opinion of the undersigned, to exercise such powers by creating moneyed corporations among them, which many of their number have repeatedly denounced as unconstitutional, and the authority to establish which was originally refused rather than confided to the General Government by the people and the States that formed it. But some other powers expressly conferred can, without question, be exercised further than has yet been done by Congress, and in such a manner as to produce very beneficial consequences upon the currency. Still, it is hoped they will never be pushed so as to trespass on ground really doubtful under the Constitution, and prevent the States from continuing to exercise all the legitimate authority they now possess as to banks and debt, however much it may be regretted that public opinion has not yet run with more strength against the abuses of both, and led to their prompt correction. It is not proposed at this time to go into the consideration of farther details on these points. But the danger to be guarded against now, seems to be rather of an opposite character from that of overaction by the General Government in the exercise of its express powers. On the contrary, apprehensions exist that it may not continue firm in the support of all which has already been accomplished in connection with the currency. If it should not, and should thus not aid to correct in any degree the rashness of many to force something like a formidable steam power into all kinds of business, without due guards to prevent constant and fatal explosions, myriads of individuals, as well as some corporations and States, are likely to be overwhelmed in still wider ruin, and will ere long probably look to no escape except the application of the sponge of a general bankrupt law to all private liabilities, and the unconstitutional assumption of the public ones by the General Government, so as to tax oppressively those portions of the community who have any thing left to pay for the losses and follies of the rest.

A remedy which has been adverted to by some, and which consists in the creation of more credit, to cure the mischief of an existing excess of credit, or the formation of larger banks with like power of abuses, in order to correct smaller ones, must usually aggravate the evil; and therefore, where it is free from constitutional objections, may, in point of expediency alone, well be discountenanced.

A plan of free banking, adopted by the States, properly guarded and secured by provisions similar to those recommended by the undersigned as long ago as 1836, with such others as reflection and experience may sanction, appears far preferable. But, independent of that, no changes in the present system, as to banks, seem worthy of strenuous exertions, except those whose direct object shall be to make safer, to restrict, control, and regulate better the institutions that already exist rather than to incorporate more. Above all, should public efforts be directed to strengthen the certainty of prompt specie payments as to all notes out, and of a nearer approach to uniformity in the amount of issues in similar states of trade; and of specie on hand, instead of multiplying them for speculation or cupidity, and thus keeping up a succession of expansions and contractions, which will only inflame the existing disorders, and render the continuance of great fluctuations in all public as well as private affairs unavoidable, endless, and ruinous.

With much respect,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

To the PRESIDENT of the Senate of the U. S.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
December 5, 1840.

SIR: Since my report of the last year on the several branches of the public service committed to my charge, the army has been actively and usefully employed in Florida, and on the Northern and Western frontiers.

The design entertained by the Department, of keeping the regiments entire, and concentrating the troops whenever it is practicable to do so, has been persevered in with the most beneficial results. A commencement has likewise been made in establishing depots for the reception of the recruits of each separate regiment, where they may be drilled and disciplined before they are sent off to their respective stations in garrison or in the field. The recruit ought never to be sent to join his company on service, until he is thoroughly taught the duty of the soldier; and this instruction will be better given at regimental than at general depots. By dividing each regiment into two bodies, in the manner proposed, every important station in the country may be occupied, either as a place of depot or a rendezvous of the regiment; and, by a proper distribution of the latter, the intermediate forts may be temporarily occupied by partial detachments, without injury to the discipline of the whole corps. I cannot too strongly urge the adoption of this method of distributing our little army in time of peace. To divide it into small permanent detachments will be to destroy its efficiency and its discipline, and, in the event of war, to expose the posts to be captured, and the whole regular forces of the country to be uselessly sacrificed. Apart from that natural and well-grounded jealousy justly entertained against the existence of a large standing army in our country, sound policy and a due regard for economy render such an establishment altogether inadvisable; and it becomes necessary, therefore, to provide other means of defending our northern and maritime frontiers against the dangers to which they would be exposed at the commencement of a war. None other occur to me, than those I have already recommended, viz: Central positions for the regular forces, from which they could move upon any point of attack or defence; and such an organization of the volunteer or militia forces as would enable them to maintain the posts intrusted to their charge until relieved by the regular troops: a system which ought to be matured in time of peace.

For the Western frontiers, posts, garrisoned by regular troops, cannot be dispensed with. They need not be very large; but they ought to be constructed of fire-proof materials, and in such a manner as to be defensible by a small garrison against any number of men not provided with artillery. A plan which will effect these objects perfectly has been devised by the Chief Engineer, and been adopted. The quarters for the men ought, likewise, to be built of durable materials, and be permanently furnished with iron single bedsteads, in lieu of the double and treble wooden bunks now in use. This change, for obvious reasons, should be introduced into all the barracks in the United States.

The chief and best position for the concentration of troops, independently of the regimental rendezvous, is, for the Northern frontier, near Albany, in the State of New York; and near St. Louis, in Missouri, for the Western—points from which easy communications radiate to every part of those extensive lines of defence, and whence troops may be transported with certainty and rapidity wherever their presence may be required. For the maritime frontier of the Gulf of Mexico, I would recommend, in addition to the permanent fortifications planned for its defence, and now being erected, the establishment of a depot, somewhere below the falls of the Ohio, for armed sea steamvessels. This would seem to furnish the best means of bringing the vast power of the upper country to the defence of the coast, and of using it, when there, in the most efficient manner. A certain number of vessels of war might be kept in constant readiness, strong enough to carry a good battery, and light enough to descend the river at all seasons, and to cross the bars of the Mississippi. These boats ought to be of iron, as combining lightness, strength, and durability; and might be constructed of the requisite size for about fifty thousand dollars each. Materials should be collected for the construction of boats to be built of wood, and stored until wanted; when, with the vast resources in workshops and mechanics along the shores of the Ohio, they might be put together in a very short time, and a fleet, equipped and manned with the hardy boatmen of the Western waters and a few able-bodied seamen, might be floated to the ocean, fully equal, with the existing and contemplated fortifications, to protect the whole Gulf frontier. The very able report on the defences of the country, made by a board of distinguished officers, and submitted to Congress during the last session, proves conclusively the absolute necessity of preserving and continuing our system of permanent maritime works of defence, and exhibits in the clearest manner their superiority over floating batteries of any and every description. In this view of the subject I fully concur, and even think that the facility with which our coasts and harbors may be approached and entered by steam vessels of war renders strong permanent works more than ever necessary. The projectiles which will be used in future wars will, from their size and description, prove destructive to any wooden battery, and give an immense advantage to stone walls over any fabrics that can be penetrated by shells. It may be proper here to remark, that the capture of the castle of San Juan de Ulloa, at Vera Cruz, has led many persons to suppose that stone revetments might be destroyed by shells. This is incorrect. After that event, I caused experiments to be made at Old Point Comfort, by firing, at point-blank range against a stone wall erected for the purpose; the shells broke against it, making very little impression. No doubt, therefore, need be entertained of the ability of our building materials to resist hollow shot. I do not think, however, that the permanent works should be the only defences relied upon, but regard moveable steam-batteries as essential auxiliaries. These ought not, in my opinion, to be large vessels, but of light draught of water, capable of carrying two guns for throwing shells of eight or ten inches diameter, and so constructed as to present a small surface to the fire of an enemy. These steam-batteries should be manned by artillerymen, and be under the command of the officer charged with the defence of the harbor fortifications, so as to secure harmony of action. In order to test the practicability of making bomb-cannon of the calibre of ten inches, the Chief of the Ordnance, Colonel Bomford, was sent to Boston, where he has conducted a series of experiments with the most satisfactory results. I recommend that these guns be adopted into the service, and form part of the armament of our fortifications, and of our steam floating batteries. Some successful experiment have, likewise, been made with war rockets; and a machine constructed for preparing them appears to answer the purpose perfectly.

The great amount of property vested by the Government in arms, amounting to several millions of dollars, no less than the risk to the national safety by adopting any new inventions without being convinced of their superiority, by long-trying experiments in the field, has induced me, generally, to discountenance their introduction into the service. I fear that every attempt to increase the rapidity of firing, such as facilitating the loading by opening the breech, or by multiplying the chambers of the gun, will fail, as they have hitherto done, after involving the Government in great expense. There is, however, one improvement, which has been fairly tested in the field by the armies of Europe, and which presents so many decided and ascertained advantages, that I am constrained to recommend its adoption into our service—I mean the substitution of percussion for flint locks. The alteration may be made on the muskets now in the arsenals; and measures ought to be adopted to construct all new arms, whether rifles or muskets, with percussion locks.

Having repeatedly recommended, without effect, the establishment of a national foundry; and having reason to fear the most serious consequences to the service from the want of proper regulations to govern the contracts with private establishments; with your consent, I sent to Europe the board of officers who had been for some time employed in fixing the patterns, forms, and dimensions of the artillery, in order that they might acquire such information as would enable the department permanently to regulate this important branch of the service. I am happy to state that, wherever they have been, the national establishments have been thrown open to them, and, with praiseworthy liberality, every facility afforded to their researches. They have returned home, after having attained all the advantages which were expected from their investigations; and the knowledge they have acquired will be applied to the practical improvement of our ordnance. A concise report of their proceedings while in Europe is herewith transmitted, in connection with that of the officer in charge of the Ordnance Department.

In the expectation that Congress would sanction the creation of a corps of sappers and miners, (an addition to the army at once necessary and economical,) I sent an officer of the engineer corps to the school for sappers and miners in France, to obtain that practical information of the art which is not possessed, and cannot be acquired, here. The French Government, with its accustomed liberality and kindness, permitted in every instance our officers to attend its schools of practice, and afforded them equal means with its own to pursue their studies there, allowing them privileges not generally granted to foreigners; thereby evincing, as the Minister of War is pleased to remark, the friendly disposition of his Majesty's Government towards the United States. This feeling, you have authorized me to say, is fully reciprocated, and the liberality of French Government duly appreciated. The officers sent to the school of cavalry at Saumur have returned, after a twelve-month's instruction, and are now employed in a manner which I trust will enable the Department very much to improve the cavalry service.

The advantage of separating the staff officers from the line of the army, and the very serious inconveniences to the service from the present system, have been before brought to your view, but cannot be too strongly or too frequently urged. The present organization of the army does not allow a single supernumerary officer in a regiment, and the companies are rendered inefficient from the absence of those officers who are on staff duty. The discipline of the troops is most injuriously affected by this arrangement; and if they are opposed in the field to regular forces, such a deficiency would prove fatal.

I beg leave to bring to your notice once more the expediency of extending the law of March 2, 1837, which provides for the enlistment of boys for the naval service, so as to embrace the army and ordnance corps. Its effect would be equally beneficial to the class of people to whom the boys belong, and to the army. It would secure to the sons of the former a comfortable subsistence, proper moral restraint, and a good practical education, while it would provide for the army well instructed non-commissioned officers, so difficult to be procured by enlistment, and without which an army cannot be efficient.

I am happy to state that experience has proved the correctness of the opinion formerly advanced, that the increase and proper organization of the staff department would produce a more economical administration of its different branches. In the expenditures of the Quartermaster's Department, especially, a very considerable reduction has been made during the last year; in some measure produced by the fall of prices, but arising in a much greater degree from the increased efficiency and better administration of the department, in consequence of the number of officers under the present organization bearing a more due relation to the laborious duties and high responsibilities of this important branch of the military service.

In consequence of the suspension of the application of funds appropriated for the prosecution of the works under the supervision of the Quartermaster General's office during the season for active operation, little progress has been made in them since my last report. I now recommend that the following works should be recommenced and completed as soon as practicable: Fort Gibson, Fort Wayne, and Fort Smith—the two former as soon as healthy sites are determined upon. I am not perfectly satisfied with the reports in relation to the proper position for Fort Gibson; and as it is contemplated to erect permanent works in the vicinity of the old fort, it is important that the site should be selected with great care. That on which the works of Fort Wayne were commenced, proved to be so very unhealthy that it became necessary to abandon it, and to remove the troops to a more favorable position. Pursuing that line, small forts should be constructed at Spring river and Ma-ra-is de Cygne; and west of it, at the head of the navigation of the Kansas river, and northwest of Fort Leavenworth, at Table Creek, on the Missouri, below the mouth of Platte river. To connect this last post with Fort Snelling, a fort ought to be constructed at or near the forks of the Des Moines. From the information I have received, I believe the erection of any works at the western extremity of Lake Superior to be unnecessary; and, for the present, advise that Fort Snelling remain the most northern post.

During your administration, nearly forty-one thousand Indians have been added to those already residing near the western boundary, while the additional securities to the border States have not been commensurate to the additional dangers to which such an increase of warlike and discontented neighbors exposes them. In the act of placing the Indians there, by which the interior States are so largely benefited, the Government has contracted a solemn obligation, not only to defend that people when attacked, but to anticipate the danger, by erecting such works as will ensure their safety, and inspire them with confidence in the means employed for their protection.

It affords me great gratification to be able to report that the Canada frontier has been free from any disturbance since I had last the honor to address you on that subject. Your advice to our fellow-citizens on that border appears to have produced the most salutary effect, and the excitement which existed there has, I am happy to think, entirely subsided; and no further apprehension need be entertained of a violation on their part of our neutral obligations.

Owing to the expenditure of the appropriations for fortifications having been suspended, the works on this frontier have not been much advanced, but they will, it is expected, be completed during the next season. In addition to those already authorized, I earnestly recommend the erection of barracks at Spring Wells, near Detroit, and at a position between Buffalo and Black Rock, in the State of New York; and also a strong work at the outlet of Lake Champlain.

On the Northeastern frontier, until the boundary question is settled, I would advise that the works be confined to the erection of barracks at the junction of the Mattawamkeag and Penobscot rivers. During the past year, the works on the maritime frontier have been carried on slowly, and they still remain in an unfinished state. In relation to the defence of our Atlantic and Gulf coasts, and of our harbors and dock yards, I beg leave to refer to my report of last year, and to that made during the last session of Congress, in reply to a call of the Senate for information on these subjects. Their condition remains unaltered, and the expediency of providing for their completion unchanged. The whole coast from Passamaquoddy bay to the Sabine river is exposed, on every point not defended by nature, to be invaded with impunity; and, in the event of war, the expense of attempting to protect this long line by troops for one year only, would cost more than to erect the works which have been planned, and which are deemed sufficient to defend the several points of attack along the whole coast. It is true that an enemy could retain possession of any portion of our territory only for a short period. But to defend an unfortified point of attack, or to drive an enemy from a position he might occupy, would be attended with great expense of blood and treasure; and while I feel confident that the stout arms and brave hearts of our fellow-citizens would ultimately prevail, and drive any enemy from our soil, I cannot approve the policy which would expose the best and bravest of our artisans and workmen to encounter, without discipline, and without the cover of fortifications, the trained bands of mercenary soldiers they would be opposed to. When we take into consideration the character of our people, and sparseness of the population in proportion to the extent of our soil, it is not wise to rely altogether for our defence on numbers and untaught valor. The battalions that must fight our battles are composed of soldiers taken from every class of the community, and the issue of every contest must necessarily deprive the country of some of its best and worthiest citizens. Every effort ought, therefore, to be made to furnish them the means of protection, and to instruct them them to defend themselves, so that the loss we must suffer on such occasions may be as light as possible.

No appropriation having been made at the last session of Congress for the works of internal improvement which were under the superintendence of this department, they have, for the most part, ceased. I adhere to the opinion expressed in my last report, that the system requires to be revised, both with regard to the principle upon which such improvements ought to be authorized, and the manner in which they ought to be conducted.

The report of the Chief of the Topographical Engineers, submitted to Congress at its last session, contains an elaborate statement of the history and progress of all the works of internal improvement carried on by the orders of Government; to which I beg leave to refer. It is to be regretted that Congress neglected, at its last session, to appropriate the small amount asked for clearing away the timber lately accumulated at the Red river raft, which obstructs the navigation of that stream. The expenditure necessary for this purpose is perfectly legitimate, as all the necessary supplies for the troops stationed at Fort Towson are transported up this river; and the measure is recommended by its economy, the additional cost of transportation by land for one year, when this navigation is obstructed, being greater than the amount required to defray the necessary expense of removing the drift timber. It is recommended that provision be made for the employment of a few laborers and a boat for a short time every season; and it is believed that in a few years the necessity for such a precaution will cease, and this portion of the river remain permanently open.

The survey spoken of in my last report has been completed, and a map constructed, which embraces that portion of the territory of the United States lying between the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, from their confluence to our northern boundary, and limited by the parallels of latitude 39 and 49 north, and the meridians 90 and 100 west of Greenwich. It is based upon numerous astronomical observations, (not less than two hundred and forty-five,) on actual surveys, and on the best information which the exploring party could procure of such small portions of the Indian territory as they were prevented from examining by the inevitable dangers attending the attempt, or from want of means and time. A very extensive series of barometrical observations were also made, and the zealous co-operation of men of science, occupying stations in the several States, who observed at the same periods of time, has enabled Mr. Nicolet to compare his own with those of others made in different quarters of the Union, and thus accurately to determine the relative level of the whole region represented by the map, as well as its elevation above the ocean, thereby indicating the climate and face of the country. The map will be accompanied by a report calculated to give an accurate knowledge of that distant country; and it is believed that the results of this survey will be useful both to the Government and to the people, and prove an acceptable accession to geography. It will serve, likewise, to exhibit the manner in which future surveys of the country are to be made, if, as it is hoped, they should be authorized by Congress. It appears to be very desirable that those remote regions of our country should be known; and the surveys ought, in my opinion, to be extended by degrees to the sources of the Missouri, and across the Rocky mountains to the Pacific ocean. Nor ought that portion of our country which is nearer and more accessible to be neglected. The existing maps do not rest on accurate data. The true courses of our great rivers, and the forms of the magnificent chain of lakes which stretch along our northern border, are yet to be truly defined. The interests of the rising commerce of the West require that hydrographic surveys of these inland seas and great avenues of trade should be made without delay. A small annual appropriation will enable the Government to effect this important object, through the agency of the topographical corps, which is composed of officers fully capable of performing this duty. No survey of any description should be made, in future, without being accompanied with astronomical and barometrical observations. In this manner a series of positions may be determined, and the means gradually furnished of acquiring a more perfect knowledge of the geography of the country; and thus of constructing an accurate map of the United States—objects of vast importance to the interests of their navigation and commerce.

The Military Academy has been conducted in a manner highly creditable to the superintendent, and satisfactory to this Department. Every effort has been made to enforce discipline, and to instil into the minds of the cadets a love of order and a high sense of their moral and religious duties; and it is believed that the standard of discipline, morality, and religion, at this institution, is equal to that of any other college or academy in the United States; while the mathematical and military studies, as far as the theory is concerned, are as complete as those taught in any school in America or Europe. Nothing is required to give our young officers the same advantages as are afforded to those of other countries, but schools of practice, which are about to be established, and to which the graduates are to be sent for one year after they are commissioned, and their destination ascertained, in order to perfect them in the practical duties of that branch of the service to which they may be attached. The new library building is nearly completed; and the mural towers attached to it, for the purpose of making astronomical observations, and teaching practically that important branch of science, are well adapted for that object. The professor of astronomy was sent to Europe, in order to procure some instruments which are needed, and to examine the several great observatories there, ascertain the manner in which they are fitted up, and witness their methods of observing. He has returned with information which cannot fail to be highly interesting and useful.

Whenever the condition of the Treasury will permit, it is very desirable to erect new barracks at West Point. Those at present there are dilapidated buildings, originally badly constructed, and now in a state of decay, which renders them as unhealthy as they are inconvenient. The concurrent testimony of each succeeding board of visitors for several years past shows the necessity of renewing these buildings. With a view to spread generally throughout the country a knowledge of this institution, it has been decided to appoint eighteen visitors from alternate States every year, forming the remainder of the board from officers of the army and navy of the United States.

I must again repeat my recommendation that two of the present paymasters be appointed assistant paymasters general, with the rank of lieutenant colonel. This very important branch of the service is incomplete under its present organization; officers of higher rank are required to superintend the operations of those of the corps who may be on duty in the field. It appears but an act of justice to the latter, to allow them a moderate percentage on the payments they may make to volunteers and militia, to cover the unavoidable losses to which they are exposed from being at times compelled to make these payments in a hurried and informal manner.

No loss or inconvenience has resulted from employing, during the last season, Indian agents to pay the annuities and make the regular disbursements to the tribes over whose interests they have been appointed to watch. These duties have been well and faithfully performed; but, as a system for the final disposal of these important and responsible duties, the plan resorted to on this occasion is incomplete; and I again recommend a small increase of the number of paymasters, and that this duty be permanently assigned to that branch of the military service.

In rendering justice to the character of the officers of the pay department, and to the efficiency with which their duties are discharged, I cannot forbear to bring to your notice the defects of the present system of paying the army, and the evil consequences which result from it. From the remoteness of the posts, the soldiers are paid at long intervals, and the guarantee of soldiers' debts given by the regulations to the sutlers, induces them to give credit to the whole amount allowed; a disposition of which the thoughtless soldier generally avails himself to the full extent, and on pay-day has the mortification to see nearly his whole pay carried off by the sutler. This occasions great discontent; while, on the contrary, those soldiers who happen not to be in debt to the sutler receive large amounts, which they too frequently waste in dissipation; and, until these sums are expended, the post presents a scene of alternate drunkenness and punishment. The only remedy for these evils will be found in the prohibition of credits by the sutlers, and more frequent payments to the troops.

The officers of the medical staff have maintained the high reputation acquired by their zealous attention to their duties in garrison and in the field. The very strict examination to which candidates for this branch of the service are subjected before admission, insures high professional attainments in those of the lowest rank; and that which the officers themselves undergo before promotion, leads them to severe application, for it must appear that they have not only retained the knowledge acquired at college, but also kept pace with the progress of medical science, or they cannot be promoted or retained in the service. It is not surprising, therefore, that this branch of the staff continues to be distinguished for professional attainments and cheerful devotion to their duties.

The report of the board of medical officers, appointed, by your direction, to ascertain the relative advantages of Pittsburgh and Wheeling for the location of a marine hospital on the Upper Ohio, in favor of the former, having been approved by you, the selections under the law for purchasing sites for marine hospitals on the western waters are now complete. The amount appropriated for that purpose not proving sufficient, the officers intrusted with the performance of that duty made conditional arrangements, subject to the ratification of Congress. I respectfully recommend that such an appropriation be asked for, as will enable this Department to carry into effect the benevolent intentions of the law.

Having, in several instances, found deficient the titles to land on which forts and other public works are erected, measures were adopted to perfect them; and I am happy to report that I found, on all occasions, the State authorities willing to convey to the United States the land whereon such works are situated. The Department has not yet succeeded in settling the question of the right of property in the Peapack island, notwithstanding its utmost efforts to do so. This is to be regretted, as its possession is essentially necessary to the defence of the Delaware. The works to be erected there, cannot, from the nature of the soil, be thrown up in haste, but will require much time to complete them; leaving, in the event of war, the approaches to Philadelphia almost entirely exposed.

A new edition of the Army Regulations has been drawn up, and is about to be published, with such amendments and additions as the experience of the last four years has dictated.

It is a subject of great regret to me to be compelled to state that every effort to terminate the contest in Florida has, so far, proved unsuccessful. On General Taylor's retiring from the command of the army there, (which he did, by permission, in May last,) it devolved upon Brigadier General Armistead; who, notwithstanding the advanced season, commenced active operations against the Indians, and, in many instances, succeeded in breaking up their encampments, destroying their fields and crops, and making some few prisoners. In order to render the regular forces available for offensive operations, a brigade of Florida militia was raised for the defence of Middle Florida, and placed under the command of Brigadier General Leigh Read, of the Territorial militia, with instructions to defend the portion of the Territory situated north of a line of posts occupied by the regular troops, extending from the Atlantic, south of St. Augustine, including two stations east of the St. Johns river, Palatka, Wheelock, Micanopy, Waikahootee, Wacassassa, a post between the last and Fort Fanning, and Cedar Keys.

The troops that were in the service of the Territory, in virtue of a law of the Legislature of Florida, were mustered into that of the United States, and form part of General Read's brigade, which has been increased to twelve hundred mounted and five hundred footmen, and may be raised to fifteen hundred mounted and five hundred foot; a force which is considered ample for the protection of that portion of the Territory assigned to General Read's command. Some depredations having been committed in the neighborhood of the Okefenokee swamp, four companies of Georgia militia have been mustered into the service of the United States, are charged with the defence of the Georgia frontier.

Certain of the hostile chiefs having signified to General Armistead their desire to treat, they were invited to meet him at Fort King on the 7th ult. and, from the circumstance (deemed fortunate) of the presence there of a delegation from the Western Seminoles, hopes were entertained of terminating this protracted struggle by the peaceful removal of the remaining Indians. After some days spent in negotiating, and after giving reiterated assurances of their desire to emigrate and rejoin their brethren west of the Mississippi, the Indians suddenly disappeared, without any assignable cause for this abrupt rupture of the negotiations. Hostilities have, in consequence, been renewed, and will be prosecuted vigorously.

The regular troops now in Florida amount to about 4,500 men, and the militia in service to about 2,000. I recommend that authority be given the Executive to engage the services of this description of troops for a twelvemonth, or during the continuance of hostilities in Florida. The term of three months is much too short to ensure efficiency; and frequent enlistments are a fruitful source of insubordination, as well as of great additional expense.

The number of Indians emigrated from the interior to the West, since the year 1836, amounts to very nearly 41,000, of which about 5,000 were removed during the past season; and I am happy to add, that the condition of those who are settled in their new homes continues to be represented to us as prosperous and happy. The differences which unfortunately sprung up between the Western Cherokees and the late emigrants of that tribe, upon their first arrival on the Arkansas, have been happily adjusted; and I have accordingly directed that their annuities, and other moneys due to them, should be paid, and placed them upon the same footing as other emigrant tribes. From the character of this nation, and the advance made by many of their number in civilization and in the arts of life, it is hoped, now that they are removed from the evil influences which heretofore beset them, their progress in moral culture and physical comfort will be rapid and lasting. Convinced that, if any great and general reform is ever to be effected among the Indians, it must be by means of education, every exertion has been made to promote it; not by disjointed efforts, but by adopting a system intended to embrace the establishment of primary schools over the whole Indian territory, and of institutions of a higher order at suitable points, designated with a view to the convenience of the Indians, and of easy access. Fort Coffee, on the Arkansas river, which has been abandoned as a military post, has been selected for one of these establishments. This situation possesses very decided advantages; and the system by which it is proposed to improve them has my full approbation. For the details of the plan, I refer to the accompanying report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and particularly to his instructions for carrying it into effect, addressed to the Superintendent of the Western Territory.

While on this subject, it affords me great gratification to be able to speak in terms of merited praise of the Methodist manual labor school in the Shawnee country. The labors of that sect, so distinguished for their Christian zeal in the cause of Indian civilization, are likely to be crowned with success; and there is reason to hope that the high expectations raised by this extensive establishment will be fully realized under its present pious and competent instructors. The Department would be happy to promote similar establishments on the part of other religious sects, equally zealous, no doubt, in spreading the light of the Gospel among the Indians, and equally disposed to advance their moral culture. It is convinced that, to produce durable beneficial effects by education, it must be made practically useful; and that those domestic arts which are imparted to our youth by the example of their parents and associates, and form, as it were, a part of their nature, must be taught the Indian in the schools, and instilled into him by education.

Perseverance for one or two years longer in the policy of removing the Indians from the baneful and destructive influences which surround them within the States and Territories, will unite the remnants of tribes, still within those limits, to their brethren in the West; offering, as it is believed, the only chance, not only of civilizing the red man, but of perpetuating his existence.

By the accompanying report of the Commissioner of Pensions, it will be seen that the number of pensioners of every description now on the rolls in all the States and Territories, and in the District of Columbia, (except those paid out of the navy pension fund,) amounts to forty-four thousand three hundred and ninety-four; of which two thousand and seventy-two cases have been admitted since the period of the last annual report. The number of deaths of pensioners that have occurred during the last year, and been reported to the Department, is sixteen hundred and five. From the number of unclaimed pensions, it is believed that many more have died, of whose decease we have no information. The number of invalid pensioners is now four thousand two hundred and eighty-nine, having increased four hundred and fourteen since 1833: this increase is to be attributed, principally, to the hardships of the service in Florida. The number of Revolutionary pensioners under the act of March 18, 1818, has decreased from above twenty thousand to seven thousand nine hundred and forty-seven. Under the act of June 7, 1832, thirty-one thousand eight hundred and eight have been admitted on the pension roll; of which number, twenty-three thousand two hundred and seven yet remain. Eleven hundred and eighty-six pensioners were admitted under the law of May 15, 1828, for the benefit of officers and soldiers of the continental army who served during the war; only six hundred and five are now borne on the rolls. The number of widows pensioned under the act of July 4, 1836, is three thousand four hundred and sixty-eight, of whom two thousand seven hundred and sixty survive. Five thousand nine hundred and twelve widows have received the benefit of the act of July, 1833; but the list is now reduced to five thousand five hundred and eighty-six. All of those now on the rolls will be dropped on the 4th of March next, when the term of their pensions expires by law. From the number of applications, the Commissioner is of opinion that not less than fourteen hundred will be added to the year 1841.

The total sum drawn from the Treasury during the past year, to pay pensions, amounts to two million forty-eight thousand six hundred and sixty-three dollars, exclusive of navy pensions.

The experience of two years confirms the opinion I formerly expressed of the vexatious operation of the law of the 6th of April, 1833, which fixes the short period of eight months for the return to the Treasury of unclaimed pensions. The intention of the law, no doubt, was to withdraw that sum from the pension agent; whereas its operation, on the contrary, draws that additional amount from the Treasury at Washington, while it produces disappointment, inconvenience, delay, and expense to the poor pensioners.

By the fourteenth article of the Cherokee treaty of December 29, 1835, ratified May 23, 1836, it was agreed on the part of the United States that such warriors of the Cherokee nation as were engaged on the side of the United States in the last war with Great Britain and the Southern tribes of Indians, and who were wounded in such service, shall be entitled to such pensions as shall be allowed them by the Congress of the United States. I respectfully suggest that Congress be asked to act upon this section of the treaty. There are not many Cherokee warriors who come under that description, but they are very destitute; and the good faith of the Government is pledged in their favor.

I cannot forbear bringing to your notice the exposed condition of the important archives of this Department. Many of them are kept in small buildings, at an inconvenient distance from the War Office, and surrounded by combustible materials. A plain fire-proof building, capable of containing all these detached offices, might be constructed for a sum, the interest on which would not exceed the amount now required for paying the rents of those now occupied for the purpose.

All which is respectfully submitted.

J. R. POINSETT.

The President of the United States.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

NAVY DEPARTMENT.

December 5, 1840.

SIR: In the performance of a duty annually devolving on this Department, I respectfully submit the following report:

The squadron in the Mediterranean remains the same as it was at the date of my last report, and consists of the Ohio 74, the Brandywine (first class frigate,) and the Cyane sloop of war—the whole under the command of Commodore Isaac Hull. This force has been found fully adequate to the protection of our commerce, which has remained unmolested in that quarter.

The squadron on the Pacific station is composed of the frigate Constitution, the sloop of war St. Louis, and the schooner Shark, under Commodore Claxton. Since the date of my last report, the schooner Enterprise, then on her way home, and the sloops of war Lexington and Falmouth, which had been directed to return, have arrived in the United States, and have been replaced by the sloops Yorktown and Dale, now on the eve of sailing for the Pacific. The squadron, when joined by these vessels, will consist of a frigate of the first class, three sloops of war, and a schooner. Commodore Claxton has been directed to dispatch the Yorktown on a cruise to the Sandwich and Society Islands, New Zealand, the coast of Japan, the Gulf of California, and the Ladrões and Marquesas, for the general protection of our whaling interests, and other commercial purposes.

The squadron on the coast of Brazil under Commodore J. B. Nicholson, at the date of my last report, was composed of the razez Independence, and the sloops of war Fairfield and Marion. Two former have returned to the United States, Commodore Nicholson having been relieved in the command of that station by Commodore Charles G. Ridgely, whose force now consists of the Potomac, first class frigate, the sloops of war Decatur and Marion, and the schooner Enterprise. The difficulties between the French Government and that of the Argentine Republic still subsisting, and the blockade continuing to be rigidly enforced, it has been thought expedient to augment this force, and the sloop of war Concord is now on the eve of sailing for that purpose.

The squadron employed in the Gulf of Mexico and the West Indies, under Commodore William B. Shubrick, at the date of my last report consisted of the frigate Macedonian, and the sloops of war Ontario, Erie, Warren, and Levant. The Ontario has been ordered to the North for repairs, and the Erie, being found unfit for service, has been detached from the squadron. The remaining vessels, with the exception of the Warren, were directed to leave the station during the hurricane months, and proceed to the North. Commodore Shubrick accordingly left Pensacola in July last with the Macedonian, Levant, and Erie, and arrived at Boston in August. Thence he proceeded to Eastport, and on his return visited the principal ports on the coast as far south as Norfolk, where, in conformity with his instructions from the Department, he delivered the command of the West India squadron to Commodore Jesse Wilkinson, who had been appointed to relieve him, and who has proceeded to his station. The command of Commodore Wilkinson now consists of the Macedonian frigate and the sloops of war Levant and Warren, which force is deemed sufficient for the protection of our interests in that quarter in the present state of things.

The frigate Columbia and corvette John Adams, employed in a cruise in the Indian and China Seas, under Com. George C. Read, for the protection of the commerce of the United States in that quarter, have returned home. The frigate Constellation, and sloop of war Boston, have recently sailed for Rio de Janeiro, where they will replenish their supplies, and receive Captain Lawrence Kearney, now in command of the flag ship on the Brazilian station, who will hoist his pendant on board the Constellation, as commander of the East India squadron, and proceed with that vessel and the Boston to carry out his instructions.

The Exploring Expedition, as stated in my last report, was at Callao, whence Lieutenant Wilkes sailed on the 6th July, 1839. Since that period he has visited the Society Islands, Navigator's Group, New Zealand, and various detached islands, with whose inhabitants he held the most amicable intercourse, and with the ports and harbors of which he made himself particularly acquainted. On the 26th December, 1839, he left the port of Sydney, in New Zealand, and proceeded to penetrate the Atlantic sea. On the 19th January following, the Vincennes discovered land in latitude 66.2 south, longitude 154 27 east, and had soundings in thirty fathoms water. The same day the Peacock made a similar discovery in latitude 66 31, longitude 153.40, and obtained soundings at a depth of three hundred and twenty fathoms. Lieutenant Wilkes coasted along this land, and had sight of it at various times for a distance of eighteen hundred miles, and has denominated it the Antarctic Continent. It is to be regretted, however, that the vast masses of ice, with which it is every where defended, prevented a nearer approach than fifteen miles, and rendered it impossible to land. It is described as presenting one vast mass of snow and ice, apparently rising almost perpendicularly from the sea, and will probably forever baffle the efforts of man to explore its interior, or convert it to any useful purposes.

After repeated and persevering efforts to approach the coast and effect a landing, Lieutenant Wilkes, his officers and men, having suffered severely from intense cold and the exposures incidental to this hazardous enterprise, returned to Sydney the 11th of March, 1840, where he was joined by the Peacock and Porpoise, the former of which had been in imminent danger from coming in contact with an island of ice. Lieutenant Wilkes speaks in the highest terms of the conduct of the officers and crews of the Expedition. At the last dates, the 6th of April, he was at the bay of islands, New Zealand, whence he was shortly to proceed to carry out his instructions.

The steam frigate Fulton has been employed during the past season in experimenting with Paixhan guns and shot, under the direction of Captain Perry; and with a view to afford as many officers as possible an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the practice of gunnery, as large a number of supernumeraries have been attached to her as she could accommodate. The reports of Captain Perry present very interesting results, and it is contemplated to continue the experiments for the purpose of demonstrating the relative advantages of the Paixhan guns and those in ordinary use, as well as affording a useful practice to our naval officers, by attaching them in succession to this vessel.

The surveys on the Southern coast of the United States, directed by the act of the 3d of March, 1837, have been completed under the superintendence of Lieutenant Glynn, and it is expected that the Department will be enabled to lay before Congress either at or shortly after the commencement of the session, complete charts of all the ports and places which have been surveyed.

The brig Consort, under the command of Lieutenant Powell, is now occupied in surveying the coast from the bay of Apalachicola to the mouth of the Mississippi, as directed by the act making appropriations for the naval service, approved July 20, 1840.

The sloop of war Preble, Commander Preese, has been employed on the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador, during the late fishing season, in protecting the rights and interests of American citizens engaged in the fisheries. On the termination of the cruise she returned to Portland, whence she was ordered to Boston for examination previous to being sent on foreign service.

The brig Dolphin, Lieutenant Bell, and the schooner Grampus, Lieutenant Paine, have been employed on the coast of Africa, in the suppression of the slave trade. They returned at the commencement of the sickly season, and have since sailed in pursuit of the same object. The presence of these vessels on the slave coast, during the season in which this disgraceful traffic is carried on, will in all probability in a great degree arrest its progress, so far as it has been prosecuted by the assumption of the American flag, and do much to relieve the nation from the unmerited stigma of participating in a trade equally in violation of the laws of the United States and the policy of their Government. From the report of Lieutenant's Bell and Paine it appears that the traffic in slaves is now carried on principally under Portuguese colors, through the medium of slave stations, as they are denominated, established at different points of the coast, under the protection of the neighboring native chiefs, who furnish the slaves and receive in return goods manufactured in England expressly for this purpose. Here the slaves are collected until an opportunity offers for the slaver to approach the land under cover of night, and receive them on board. Both officers are of opinion that so long as these stations are permitted to exist, and this barter carried on, all attempts effectually to arrest the traffic in slaves will end in administering only partial remedies, which will but aggravate the disease. There can be little doubt that the number of slaves transported from Africa is now greater than it was previous to the adoption of measures for its prevention and punishment, which it would seem have served no other purpose than to excite the cupidity of unprincipled adventurers, by increasing the value of slaves, and thus presenting temptations which overpower all apprehension of consequences.

During the past year three small schooners, the Flirt, the Wave, and the Otsego, which had been previously procured and employed by the War Department, under the act making appropriations for suppressing Indian hostilities, approved 3d March, 1839, having been placed under the direction of this Department, were employed on the coast of Florida, under Lieutenant McLaughlin. That officer lately returned to the North in the Flirt, bringing with him the men whose terms of service had expired, together with the sick and disabled attached to the expedition. He has since sailed with men sufficient to complete the complement of all his vessels, as well as for boat service. An additional number of marines has also been attached to his command, with a view to operations on land against the Indians, as well as the protection of the lives and property of the citizens, and the prevention of the introduction of supplies for the use of the enemy.

The two steam frigates commenced under the second section of the act approved 3d March, 1839, one at New York, the other at Philadelphia, have been so far completed that the former will be ready for launching in a few days, and the latter in the ensuing spring, as soon as the Delaware is free from ice. The engines and boilers are also in a course of speedy completion, and when finished, will be placed on board, and the vessels prepared for service without delay.

The apprentice system continues in operation; and thus far, its results are highly satisfactory. The conduct of the young lads is generally exemplary, and such is their rapid progress in the art of seamanship, that by the time they are of age for a service, our commanders generally prefer them to older seamen. I take this occasion to recommend that this system be fostered to the utmost extent of which it is susceptible, being fully opinion that it presents one great means of of partially, at least, remedying that increasing scarcity of competent petty officers and able seamen, which greatly embarrasses the operations of the navy, delays the sailing of our public vessels, and places the defence of the honor and interests of the United States under the protection of crews, a great portion of which are foreigners.

This scarcity of seamen for the uses of the navy is, I apprehend, owing to the high wages they receive in the merchant service, and the comparatively short periods of their engagements in commercial voyages; to the absence of an apprentice system in the mercantile marine; and the discharge of seamen when their terms have expired on foreign stations, where the seductions of climate and the allurements of pleasure attach them to the soil, and whence many of them never return, or return so enervated as to be comparatively unfit for active service. The inquiries I have instituted result in the fact that many of our seamen are now scattered among the islands of the Pacific, and on the coast of South America; and though directions have been given to reclaim them whenever it may be found practicable, there can be little doubt that a large number are thus irretrievably lost to their country. I have also sufficient reason to believe that the modification of the navy ration, which was proposed to Congress, but which has not been definitely acted on, would, if adopted, contribute materially to attach our seamen more permanently to the service; and I take this occasion earnestly to request that the early attention of Congress may be invited to this subject generally, as one of vital importance to the well being of the navy.

The accompanying report and letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, exhibit the number of pensioners, the amount of their pensions, and the means now remaining at my disposal to meet those which may become due the 1st of January, and 1st of July, 1841. From these documents it will appear that under the operation of the navy pension laws, and most especially that of the 3d of March, 1837, the navy pension fund, which at the period of its passage amounted to upwards of a million of dollars, the annual interest of which was sufficient to meet all demands, now consists of one hundred thousand dollars in Cincinnati five per cent. stock, greatly depreciated, fourteen thousand dollars of stock of the Bank of Washington, in the same situation, thirty-three thousand three hundred and thirty-nine dollars five per cent. stock of the city of Washington, and eleven thousand four hundred dollars of stock of the Union Bank of Georgetown, the latter totally unsaleable at this time.

By the same statement it appears that the sum of one hundred and fifty-one thousand three hundred and fifty-two dollars and thirty-nine cents, will be required in the course of the year 1841, to meet demands arising out of the present pension list, and that consequently, either an appropriation of that sum, during the present session, must be made, or the pensioners will remain unpaid, and the faith of the nation, which was pledged to make good any deficiency in this fund, remain unredeemed.

The estimates which accompany this report have been prepared with a due regard to economy on one hand, and the protection of the honor and interests of the United States on the other. The number of vessels now in commission is fully equal to those employed in preceeding years, and it is believed that during the past year, neither the persons or property of our citizens have any where suffered outrage or wrong for want of due attention in affording the means of protection and redress.

It will be perceived that the Board of Navy Commissioners have again presented an estimate for additional clerks, which I am satisfied are indispensable to the prompt performance of the duties of that office, which are daily increasing, and which there is no reason to believe will suffer any diminution in future.

Respectfully submitted.

J. K. PAULING.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States.

REPORT FROM THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
December 7, 1840.

SIR: I submit a report, showing the service of this Department the past year, its present condition, and future prospects.

The extent of the post routes in the United States covered by mail service, on the 30th June last, as near as can be ascertained, was 155,739 miles. The annual transportation on these routes, at the rate existing on the 30th day of June last, was about 36,370,776 miles.

The annual cost of transportation, estimated at the rate of pay existing at the close of the year, was $3,296,876, viz:

	Miles.	Cost.
By horse and sulkey,	12,182,445	$789,668
By stage and coach,	20,299,278	1,911,855
By steamboat and railroad,	3,889,053	595,353
Total,	36,370,776	$3,296,876

In addition to this service, the mails by steamboats and other vessels, under the 5th and 6th sections of the act of 1825, are estimated to have cost, the last year, about $9,000; and there has been paid for ship and way letters, about $26,000.

The resolution of Congress of May 14, 1836, authorized the Postmaster General to extend the term of the then existing contracts for six months, so as to have them terminate on the 30th of June, instead of the last of December. In pursuance of this authority, the contracts which would have expired with the present year were extended to the 30th June, 1841; in consequence of which, the lettings that would otherwise have fallen into the year 1840 will not take place until the spring of 1841. The advertisement for this service has been prepared, and will soon be published.

The new routes, amounting to about seven hundred, established by the act of the 7th July, 1838, have been put into operation during the past year, and have made considerable addition to the expenditure for the transportation service. This extension, with the belief that the usual increase of revenue would not be realized, has indicated a policy of retrenchment rather than general improvement; but, since I took charge of the Department, some improvements have been effected on some of the most important routes which the public interest seemed to demand, and where little additional expense was incurred. I have also executed contracts for additional service on a few railroad and steamboat routes, where retrenchments could be made on other routes nearly equivalent to the new liabilities assumed. These changes have given some additional expedition to the great North and South mail, as well as to several large mails connecting with it at important points.

The number of contractors in the service during the last year was about 2,100. The number who had been fined, or had deductions made from their pay for delinquencies in the performance of their engagements, is 628. The fines and deductions during the year, exclusive of the remissions, amount to $60,685 60.

In general, the transportation service has been performed faithfully, and in a commendable spirit of energy, perseverance, and devotion to the public interest. The obstacles which, for a time, occasioned irregularities in the large mail south of this city, it is believed, have been removed.

The number of post offices, on the 1st day of July, 1838, was 12,519; the number on the 30th day of June, 1839, was 12,780; on the same day of the present year, the number was 13,468, showing an increase, during the year, of 688. There have been established, during the year, 959 post offices; and 271 discontinued. The number this day is 13,638. There have been, during the year, 3,231 postmasters appointed, of whom 959 were for new offices.

The revenue of the Department, for the year ending June 30, 1840, as appears from the settlement of the accounts of postmasters in the Auditor's office, was:

Letter postage	$4,003,776 07
Newspapers and pamphlets	535,229 61
Fines paid to postmasters for violations of law	260 00
	$4,539,265 68

The expenditures of the Department for the same period were—

For compensation to postmasters, $1,028,925 92

For wrapping paper, office furniture, advertising, mail-bags, mail-locks and keys, and stamps, mail depredations, and special agents, blanks, clerks for offices, and miscellaneous . . . 441,778 96

For ship, steamboat, and way letters . . . 35,410 81

For transportation . . . 3,252,995 16

4,759,110 85

Excess of expenditures . . . $219,845 17

The revenue, as compared with the preceding year, shows an increase of $61,651 64, being a fraction over one per cent.

The average annual increase of revenue from 1832 to 1839, inclusive, has been about 10 per cent. But as this period includes the two years ending June 30, 1837, of extraordinary augmentation of revenue, amounting to 15 per cent. the first year, and 20 per cent. the second, 10 per cent. is considerably above the ordinary annual increase, which may be estimated at about 6 per centum. The decline in the revenue, therefore, the past year, may be estimated at about 5 per cent. or $225,000.

Statement of the revenue and expenditures of the Post Office Department for the eleven years ending 30th June, 1839.

Year ending,	Revenue.	Expenditure.
June 30, 1829	$1,707,418 42	$1,782,132 57
1830	1,850,583 10	1,932,707 95
1831	1,997,811 54	1,936,122 87
1832	2,258,570 17	2,266,171 66
1833	2,617,011 88	2,930,414 87
1834	2,823,749 34	2,910,605 08
1835	2,993,556 66	2,757,350 08
1836	3,408,323 59	2,841,766 36
1837	4,100,605 43	3,303,423 03
1838	4,235,077 97	4,621,837 16
1839	4,477,614 04	4,654,718 42

From this tabular statement, it appears that while the expenditures of the Department have been steadily advancing, with few exceptions, its revenues have been very fluctuating, varying from a mere nominal increase to an advance of 20 per cent. in a single year.

The extension of the mail service, and the advance in the population and business of the country, are the causes of the ordinary increase of the revenue. But temporary and extraordinary circumstances often counteract these more permanent sources of increase, so far as to prevent any material advance. This has been the case the past year; during which a combination of causes have operated to impair the revenue of the Department to nearly the extent of the average annual increase.

But the present unfavorable condition of the finances of the Department is not wholly to be attributed to the decline of the revenue the past year; it is, in part, the result of the too sudden and large extension of the service during the years 1837, 1838, and 1839, occasioned by the extraordinary surplus which accrued in 1836 and 1837. This surplus, on the 30th June, 1836, was $641,842.

The Postmaster General, in his annual report of that year, recommended a reduction of the rates of postage. Congress did not sanction that measure; but, by the act of the 2d July, 1836, established about seven hundred new post-routes, which it became the duty of the Department to put into operation. The action on this subject by Congress was considered as indicating its desire that the surplus which had accrued, and which might accrue, should be expended in providing additional mail accommodations. The causes which had produced the above surplus on the 30th June, 1836, continued to operate during the remainder of that year, and a part of the year 1837; and, as the new contracts did not go into operation until after the 1st of February, 1837, the revenue continued to exceed the expenditure; and, on the 30th June, 1837, the surplus amounted to $756,208. During the session following, Congress, by the act of the 7th of July, 1837, established about seven hundred additional routes, which were to be put in operation on the 1st of July, 1839, or before, if the revenues of the Department would justify it. The second section of the same act provides "that every railroad within the limits of the United States that now is, or may hereafter be made, shall be a post-route; and the Postmaster General shall cause the mail to be transported thereon: Provided, he can have it done on reasonable terms, and not paying therefor, in any instance, more than 25 per centum over and above what similar transportation would cost in post coaches."

The very liberal construction given to this act by the Postmaster General, favorable to the interests of the railroad companies, did not satisfy the spirit of cupidity which belongs to corporate monopolies; and it was found impracticable to obtain contracts from several of the railroad companies. And Congress, by the act of 25th January, 1839, extended the maximum rate of compensation for railroad service to three hundred dollars per mile.

The new routes established by the act of 7th of July, 1838, were mostly put into service in 1839; and contracts have been made for service on the railroads then in existence, and most of those which have since been completed, at rates of compensation, varying from twenty-five to three hundred per cent. above what had been paid for coach service on the same routes. In England, the average rate of compensation for railroad service is about ninety dollars per mile; and the highest sum paid on the most important routes is one hundred and seven dollars per mile; and the contractors are required to convey mails as often, and at such times, as may be ordered by the Postmaster General. Here, with a rate of compensation nearly two hundred per cent. higher, it has been found impracticable, on many of the routes, to obtain that control over the time of the departure and delivery of the mail, which is so essential to the service, and is exercised on other routes. In addition to the compensation paid to the railroad companies, there are considerable incidental expenses incurred for travelling agents on the more important routes, for conveying the mail to and from the cars at the ends of the routes, and for supplying intermediate offices, not on the line of the roads. The substitution of railroad for coach service, has borne very heavily on the revenues of the Department.

The new routes established in 1836 and 1838, being, many of them, in sections of the country where the roads are bad and the settlements sparse, have yielded an income bearing but a small proportion to the expense of the transportation.

This great extension of the service, and the substitution of a higher and more expensive for a cheaper grade, under the acts of Congress referred to, and the improvements on other routes, which the public interests seemed to demand, since 1836, have carried the expenditures of the Department, for three successive years, beyond its accruing revenue.

In the year ending on the 30th June, 1838, the expenditures were $4,621,837 00
The revenue which accrued was 4,235,077 00

Excess of expenditure over the revenue . . . $386,760 00

The expenditures in the year ending June 30, 1839, were $4,654,718 00
The revenue which accrued was 4,477,614 00

Excess of expenditure . . . $177,104 00

The excess of the expenditures for these two years was met by the surplus funds which had accumulated in 1837, and nearly exhausted all that surplus which was available.

In the annual report of my predecessor, made in December, 1838, he says: "The general financial disasters of last year have not reduced the revenue, as might have been expected, but have prevented most of the anticipated increase, and thrown the Department upon its surplus, to sustain most of its extensions. The indications now are, that there will be a slight improvement in the revenue of the current fiscal year, over the preceding; but not enough to produce any material effect. An advance somewhat greater may be reasonably expected, next year, but not great enough to meet the increasing cost of mail service, and put into operation the new routes established at the last session of Congress. It will hence be seen that, for more than a year to come, the curtailment, rather than the extension, of service on routes now in operation, is to be expected."

The anticipated increase during the year 1839, was realized, and amounted to 5½ per cent. producing $241,560. But the greater increase looked for in 1840, has essentially failed; and the quarter ending 30th of September last, exhibits an actual declension in the revenue, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, of about 5 per cent. This unfavorable result has been occasioned mainly by the second suspension of the banks in a large section of the Union, followed by a general depression of the commercial interests of the country; which appears to have been apprehended at the close of the last year, as the Postmaster General then said: "It is possible that the recent suspension of specie payments by the banks, in a large portion of the Union, may again check the increase in the revenue of the Department, so as to make retrenchments necessary; but, in any event, they will be inconside-

But the present apparently unfavorable financial condition of the Department need occasion no anxiety. It can be sustained upon its own resources, and soon placed in a safe and prosperous condition. Yet, to afford it temporary relief, curtailments of service, to a limited extent, are necessary. This has already been commenced, and will be continued as far as may be found requisite to place its finances in a sound condition. The curtailments or suspensions of service will be made so as to occasion as little inconvenience to the public, or injustice to the contractors, as such an operation will admit of. As periodical retrenchments are unavoidable, it deserves consideration, whether it would not be wise for Congress to prescribe some rule by which all general curtailments are to be effected, so as to remove executive discretion, and secure an equal apportionment of the reduction of service among the different sections of the country,

In examining the causes which have placed the Department in its present condition, we discover its resources, and its ability not only to sustain itself, but probably, with the aid of some remedial legislation, to admit of a prospective reduction of the tariff of letter postage, which public sentiment seems to demand.

These causes are to be found in the unexampled fluctuations since 1834 in the financial interests and commercial business of the country. The period of unprecedented overaction in trade, from the fall of 1834 to the spring of 1837, occasioned an extraordinary increase of revenue, which produced the large surplus that existed in 1836 and 1837. This surplus formed the basis of the great extension of the mail service since 1836, which so far exceeded the limits to which it could have been carried by the ordinary increase of revenue, as to absorb nearly the whole of this surplus in two years. When the reaction came on, which, under any circumstances, would have depressed its revenues, the Department had to sustain itself with an extent of service beyond its natural limits; which had originated from the extraordinary increase of its revenues in 1836 and 1837. But the unusual increase of revenue over the expenditures during those two years, was not entirely owing to the great activity of trade. The contracts for transportation, during that period, had mostly been made when prices were low, and the revenue accruing from their performance was received when prices had advanced from fifty to one hundred per cent. The Department, therefore, enjoyed the advantages of an excited state of business, without the drawback which, under other circumstances, the advance in prices would have occasioned.

On the other hand, the excess of the expenditures over the receipts for postage the last three years, is not more to be attributed to the depression of the revenue from the state of the times, than to the circumstance that all the existing contracts were made during the high state of prices, and at an average advance of about fifty per cent. above the rate of compensation paid prior to 1836.

Should prices not vary essentially from their present standard, it is reasonable to suppose that the future lettings can be made at greatly reduced rates of compensation. This is an important resource, which, in a few years, without any retrenchment of service, could hardly fail of placing the finances of the Department in a prosperous condition. But it cannot be made immediately available, so that a suspension or curtailment of service, to a limited extent, becomes necessary.

The restoration of commercial activity, so confidently anticipated, may reasonably be calculated to produce a considerable improvement during the two last quarters of the current fiscal year, and a much greater increase the next year.

With a reasonable expectation of a reduction in the expenses of the transportation, and nearly a certainty of a considerable increase in its revenues, the future prospects of the Department are highly satisfactory.

The present is a peculiar crisis in its financial affairs, resulting from the operation of causes which I have endeavored partially to explain, and which are not likely, in the same degree at least, again to occur.

There are other causes of a more limited influence which have contributed to impair the revenue the past year. The greatly enhanced expense of the transportation of the mail upon railroads is not the only way in which they affect the revenues of this Department. The great facilities which they afford for the transmission of letters and newspapers out of the mail, have evidently diminished the receipts from postage. This is proved by the sudden falling off of the revenue at points where these facilities have recently been provided. Information has also been received from the agents of the Department, showing that letters, packets, and newspapers, were extensively conveyed out of the mail on the railroad and steamboat lines, and on many of the stage and coach routes. So far as these practices, so detrimental to the income of the Department, were believed to be in violation of law, I endeavored to suppress them, regarding it as my highest duty to enforce the laws. And in respect to letters carried by carriers and drivers, these efforts, it is believed, have been generally effectual; but there is no prohibition against persons conveying letters and packets who may pass over mail routes in the same vehicle which transports the mail, and the railroads afford great facilities for sending letters in this way.

For fifteen years preceding the introduction of the new system in England, the postage tax had rather declined, notwithstanding the increase of population and business. This was, by many, ascribed to the high rate of the tax, but the better and more prevailing opinion attributes it to the numerous railroads which have gone into operation.

The practice of carrying newspapers out of the mail, without having secured the privilege in the contract, I found to be so general, that it could not be suppressed without great inconvenience to the public; and, as the ambiguity of the law admitted of doubts in regard to the restriction, I concluded that I should best discharge my duty by permitting these practices to continue, and leave it for Congress either to remove the prohibition or to make the law more explicit for its enforcement. As it is probable that the enforcement of the prohibition would have the effect of stopping the carrying of newspapers on the mail routes, rather than causing them to be conveyed in the mail, it would seem both just and politic to abolish the restriction entirely.

Another source of detriment to the revenue the past year, has been the exercise and abuse of the franking privilege to an unprecedented extent. During the last three quarters, the free matter constituted a very large portion of the entire mails. As the contracts had been made without reference to this extraordinary addition to the bulk and weight of the mails, the burden of the transportation was thrown upon the contractors. The free matter is not only conveyed without compensation, but the Department is subjected to the charge of two cents for every free letter or sealed packet delivered at offices where the postmaster's commissions do not exceed five hundred dollars per quarter. At some offices this allowance to the postmaster has absorbed his whole quarterly balance.

The books of the Department furnish no data for determining the number of free packets conveyed in the mail, as a large portion of them are not entered on the post bills. At the post office in this city an account was taken of the number and weight of free letters and packets during three weeks ending the 21 day of May, the 2d day of June, and the 7th day of July last. There were 22,038 free letters and packets from the Executive Departments; 20,363 free letters from members of Congress; and 392,268 public documents and other franked packets—making in all 434,669. The public documents and packets from Congress, exclusive of the letters, weighed 32,639 pounds—nearly sixteen and a half tons. Taking this as the average of the session of thirty-three weeks, it would appear that the free letters and packets sent from the office in this city during the late session of Congress amounted to 4,781,359; and the two cents allowed to postmasters for the delivery of free letters would be $95,627. This is probably above the average of the session; and the two cents are not paid at offices where the postmaster's commissions exceed five hundred dollars per quarter.

It may be estimated that there has been abstracted from the revenue the past year, in the allowance of the two cents to postmasters for the delivery of free letters and packets, and the two cents paid for advertising free letters, the sum of $150,000.

And there are facts that have come to the knowledge of the Department, which show that great abuses have been practised by those enjoying the privileges, in the highest as well as the lowest stations, in covering the correspondence of others, to the great injury of its revenue. This and other abuses of the privilege appear to be rapidly increasing, and imperiously demand a remedy, either by its entire abolition, or such restrictions upon it as could be enforced by the Department.

The provision in the act of 1825, allowing two cents to postmasters on free letters should be abolished, as it is unreasonable that those enjoying an exclusive privilege should derive a revenue from the same privilege possessed by others. Postmasters might be properly restricted in sending and receiving free letters, to their own office. It is in the nature of all exclusive privileges to run into abuse; and hence we find that, of the twelve acts of Congress relating to the franking privilege of its members and officers, all, with one exception, have served to enlarge the right.

The collection and disbursement of the revenues have been conducted with success and convenience by the agents of the Department, with little trouble to them, and without charge upon its means. The act of the 4th July last has occasioned no material change in the financial system of this Department, except substituting the receivers general for the postmasters, at some important points, as the depositories of its funds. But the penal provisions of the act, which make the using or loaning the public moneys a conversion and embezzlement of them, and punishable as a criminal offence, are applicable to postmasters, and cannot fail of having a salutary influence in promoting prompt payment of the quarterly balances, of which there has been great improvement the last few years, and in preventing defalcations.

The revision of the tariff of postage, with the view to reduction and convenience, has, for some years past, attracted the public attention, and, on several occasions, been brought under the consideration of Congress without any definite action. At the second session of the twenty-fifth Congress, the House of Representatives adopted resolutions calling on the Postmaster General to state "what, in his opinion, would be the effect on the revenues of the Department, of the establishment of the following tariff of postages of letters: On letters conveyed 80 miles and under, five cents; over 80 miles and not exceeding 200, ten cents; over 200 and not exceeding 400, fifteen cents; over 400 miles, twenty cents; and to state what other tariff, fixing the rates in federal money, and having in view the greatest reduction consistent with the necessary means of the Department, if any, in his judgment, would be more just than the above. And that he also state what alterations, if any, may be made in the present rates of postage on newspapers, pamphlets, and periodicals, so as to promote the circulation of information without detriment to the revenues of the Department."

It is supposed that this resolution, in connection with the prevailing interest then felt in the success of the experiment making in England by what is called the penny system, induced the late Postmaster General to commission George Plitt, esq. one of the special agents of this Department, to visit Europe for the purpose of collecting such information concerning the new system in England, and the mail establishments in other European countries, as might conduce to the improvement of our own system.

Mr. Plitt left the United States on this special service in June, 1839, and returned in August last. The results of his inquiries are contained in the report prepared by him, which is herewith submitted. It contains extensive details tending to show the condition and management of the mail establishment in several of the most important countries in Europe, and many interesting facts and valuable suggestions for the improvement of the system in the United States. Many of the reforms and improvements recommended are deserving of consideration. It will be seen that he recommends an entire change in our tariff of postage, and to have all mail matter taxed by weight; letters not weighing over half an ounce to be rated at five cents for any distance less than 500 miles, and ten cents over that distance; and the same rates for every additional half ounce when prepaid, and double those rates when not prepaid. As such a change would give great relief, not only to the commercial interest, but to the whole community, it is to be regretted that neither the present condition nor future prospects of the establishment seem to justify so great a reduction in the postage tax.

It is apparent that no essential change in the rates of postage should be made without great consideration. The post office establishment is different from any other branch of the public service. It is a fundamental principle in its organization, that it is to be sustained by its own revenues. This principle not only avoids any charge upon the Treasury, but serves to limit and regulate the action of the Department. Should its expenses, in whole or in part, be thrown upon the Treasury, even for a single year, it might be difficult to return to the present principle; and such are the temptations to enlarge the circle of its action, that it would not be easy to prescribe any reasonable limit to it. And such a change in the principle of the Department, embracing, as it does, such a vast extent of private interests, both in number and amount, would open a door to extensive abuses, wasteful to the public revenue, extending its patronage, and at the same time removing the checks upon it which now exist. Without enlarging upon this point, it is believed that no one will be disposed, either partially or temporarily, to throw the Department for its support on the National Treasury.

Any sudden and material reduction of its revenue, therefore, would render it necessary to make a corresponding curtailment of the mail service, which all must see would be attended with the most serious inconvenience to the whole community. And as the present revenue, with the reasonable increase that may be anticipated, is barely sufficient to support the Department with the existing service, and such necessary improvements and extensions as will be required, it is evident that there can be no reduction of its aggregate revenues.

The question therefore of the reduction of its revenues is excluded from consideration; and the only matter for inquiry is, whether the same amount of revenue can be collected with the proposed or any other reduced rates of postages? There may be cases in every branch of indirect taxation, in which the reduction of the tax will increase the amount of revenue. But this result can only be realized, when the duty is so exorbitantly high as to either occasion gross evasions of the law, or to check the business on which the tax falls. And although the reduction of the rate of postage would increase correspondence, there is, in my judgment, no reason to believe that the addition of revenue from that source would equal the loss from the reduction of the rates. The experiment now making in England, appears to afford little support to a contrary opinion, for, if unofficial information can be relied upon, the revenue there has fallen off more than 50 per cent. or about 840,000 pounds sterling, on a revenue of less than 2,000,000.

Shall we then be forced to the conclusion that the present high rates of letter postage are to be permanently maintained?

This would seem to be the case, unless there be a change in the system, by which the expense of the transportation may be reduced, the correspondence increased, and the postage on newspapers and printed matter be equalized and raised. All these objects are practicable, and their united influence would probably admit of a greater reduction in the rates of letter postage, than is proposed in the resolution of the House of Representatives.

Such a reform in the system, in my judgment, is demanded by views of public policy, and the higher considerations of private justice. The institutions of this country are based on the principles of justice and equal rights, and any legislation, and more especially any system of taxation, which is a manifest violation of those principles, can only be sustained by the forbearance of public opinion, in subjecting it to that test by which all public measures must stand or fall.

A slight examination of our tariff of postage, in comparison with the expense of the mail establishment, is sufficient to show its manifest injustice.

The quarterly returns of postmasters furnish no data for determining the relative proportions of the different kinds of matter conveyed in the mail. During one week in the month of June, 1839, an account was taken of the number and weight of the letters, and the weight of the newspapers and other printed matter received to be conveyed in the mail, at the offices in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington City, and Richmond. The tabular statement containing these facts is herewith submitted. There were some omissions, and, no doubt, some inaccuracies in the process, but the results are sufficiently correct for the present purpose.

The whole weight was 55,241 pounds; of which 44,463 pounds consisted of newspapers; 8,837 of periodicals and pamphlets; more than five-eighths of which being public documents or other free packets, deposited in the office at Washington city; and the letters, both taxable and free, amounted to only 1,922 pounds, being something less than four per cent. The proportion of printed matter received at these offices, and especially during the session of Congress, may have been something greater than that of the whole mails in the United States.

It will not be far from the truth, to estimate the printed matter as constituting ninety-five per cent. of the whole mails, whilst it pays but about twelve per cent. of the whole gross revenue, and but about eight per cent. of the nett revenue, the commissions on the postage from newspapers and pamphlets being more than on that from letters.

In the transportation, constituting the principal expenditure of the establishment, there are three main elements of price:

1. The bulk and weight of the mail.
2. The expedition with which it is conveyed.
3. The mode of conveyance when not controlled by the bulk and weight of the mail, but in reference to accommodating the public travel.

As the expense of expedition depends mainly on the weight of the mail, these two elements of price are, essentially, resolved into one; so that the expense of transportation depends on the bulk and weight of the mail, and the mode of conveyance, where it has reference to the public travel, and is of a higher and more expensive grade than the mail service would require.

The services of postmasters depend on the amount of mail matter; the number of packets which are received, distributed, or delivered, at their respective offices. But the letters, being made up into mails, require some more labor than the newspaper and other packages not sent in that form.

From this analysis, it is apparent that nearly the whole expenditure of the mail establishment is thrown upon correspondence; it pays the whole expense of the free matter, the greater portion of that of newspapers, periodicals and pamphlets, and the entire additional expense incurred for accommodating the public travel.

With all these burdens, not properly belonging to it, thrown upon correspondence, the high rate of postage on letters cannot be surprising; nor can it be reduced, and keep up the present extent of the mail service, with the improvements and additions which will be required, without some portion of those burdens are removed by a change in the system.

Nothing can be more apparent than the palpable injustice of our present system of postage tariff.

The objections against a high protective tariff on importations apply with still more force to our tariff of postages, both in respect to principle and the degree of injustice. In the former, the whole community are indirectly taxed for the benefit of a particular class, and the whole interests of the country are burdened to relieve a particular interest, but the tax being indirect, those on whom it falls may, in some way, derive an incidental advantage from it. This, at least, is contended by its advocates. The postage tariff is a direct tax on one man for the benefit of another—a direct burden on one class for the relief of another class.

What principle of justice or public policy can sustain a law which taxes a correspondent in New York, who has occasion to send a letter by mail to New Orleans, two hundred and fifty per cent. more than the service is worth, or costs, to enable a subscriber in New York to a newspaper in New Orleans to have it conveyed to him by mail, eighty-eight per cent. less than the actual cost of the service? And what adds to this injustice is the fact that the mail establishment is a Government monopoly, which, by prohibiting private posts, compels the correspondent to send his letter by the public conveyance.

Our system of postage tariff was derived from England, where postage was a tax for revenue analogous to the stamp tax, as, like that, it was a tax on business. Here, it is not a tax; but in the nature of freight, or a charge for the service performed. The injustice, therefore, is much greater where the postage is levied, not for revenue, but for defraying the expense of the mail service.

The low rates of postage on newspapers and other printed matter, originated in considerations of public policy, and were designed to promote the general dissemination of intelligence among the people. But the reasons for this policy, if admitted ever to have been just, have in a great measure ceased to exist. When the mail establishment was first organized, printing was confined to the large cities, and there were few other channels for conveying newspapers but the mails. Now there are printing establishments in almost every village; and railroads, steamboats, and other lines of communication, afford cheap and convenient channels for conveying newspapers and others publications, the greater portion of which are distributed among the people without the agency of the mail.

With the view to remove many of the growing evils of the mail establishment, and secure the reduction of letter postage, I respectfully propose a change in the system, on the following bases:

1. The entire abolition of the franking privilege, as an exclusive personal right, with the exception of the Executive and the heads of departments.

2. A limitation by law of the maximum rate of compensation for all steamboat, railroad, and coach service.

3. The equalization of postage on newspapers and other printed matter, with an advance of one hundred per cent.

4. A revision of the tariff of letter postage, with a reduction of twenty-five per cent.

The effect of the first of these changes would be to greatly diminish the bulk and weight of the mails, and to increase the postage. Probably two-thirds of the mail matter now going free would be excluded, and what remained would be charged with postage; and the two cents paid for the delivery of free packets would be saved.

The newspapers received by printers in exchange might be exempted from postage, with a limitation by law of the number. Letters addressed to a postmaster exclusively on the business of his office, it might be reasonable to except from the postage tax; and also all letters written by postmasters exclusively on official business, provided they are unsealed, (except when addressed to another postmaster or agent of the Department,) so that the office of delivery may be enabled to decide whether the letter is legally and properly entitled to go free. The postage on letters received by members of Congress might be paid from the contingent fund of the two Houses, and on those sent by them during the session, limited to a certain number daily; or such limited number per day, sufficient for their official correspondence, might be permitted to go free of postage; and public documents, printed by the order of either House of Congress, to possess the privilege they now do, when sent by a member with his certificate that they were public documents.

Such a modification of their privilege would relieve members of Congress from much correspondence very burdensome to them, and, in general, of very little public utility. It would tend to arrest the concentration at the seat of Government of those influences which, for some time past, appear to have directed and controlled the politics of the country, and to add to that stimulus which aggravates political excitements. The unlimited extent of the franking privilege is among the causes which have produced the centralization of political influence, by enabling it to exert its power, with a view to a definite purpose, over the country.

The effect of the second change would be to reduce the expense of transportation, and on many routes to substitute a lower and cheaper grade of service, as wagon, sulkey, or horse; in the place of stage or coach service.

The effect of equalizing and raising the postage on newspapers and other printed matter, would be to diminish the bulk and weight of the mails, and increase that branch of the revenue about one hundred per cent.

The revision of the tariff of letter postage on the basis of a reduction of twenty-five per cent. would increase correspondence, yet add little to the bulk or weight of the mails, and the postage on the additional letters conveyed would supply, in part, the loss to the revenue from the reduction on the rates.

The effect of the whole would be to lighten the mails, and render their bulk and weight more uniform; to cheapen the transportation, and secure more regularity in the service; and, by reducing the tax on correspondence, relieve the commercial interest, and benefit the whole community.

The tariff of postage on newspapers, periodicals, and pamphlets, is almost as unequal and unjust as the comparative rates of postage upon letters and printed matter. This inequality and injustice have arisen from the great changes which have taken place in the manufacture of paper, whereby the former distinctions as to dimensions have been lost, and a corresponding change in the forms of publications introduced.

All newspapers now pay the same postage, although some are ten times the dimensions and weight of others. This is not only unjust to those who pay the tax, but equally so to the publishers. It gives an undue advantage to the large establishments in the commercial cities over the penny papers in the same places, and the country newspapers, which are more removed from sinister influences, and, in general, are the most independent channels of sound public opinion. There seems no good reason for the difference in postage between periodical and non-periodical pamphlets, and the distinction, in fact, is often difficult to determine. By the present law, all printed matter, except newspapers, is taxed by the sheet; and, from the change in the forms of publications, the postage is not and cannot be collected with any uniformity, from the difficulty experienced by postmasters in classing the various publications. Sixteen pages of octavo constitute a sheet, and twenty-four a duodecimo, although it is often nearly impracticable to distinguish between them.

To remove all these difficulties, and establish a uniform rate of postage on printed matter, the best rule would be to tax it by weight. But if there should be objections to so great a change, newspapers could be divided into three classes, according to their dimensions, on the plan recommended by the late Postmaster General in his annual report in 1836. To tax other printed matter by weight, it is believed, there can be no objection. Whether the other more important reforms which have been recommended be effected or not, the tariff of postage on newspapers and printed matter urgently demands a radical revision. The advance on the postage of newspapers and other printed matter, although regarded as eminently just, is not deemed indispensable to the object in view; as a revision and equalization of the tariff, taking a common sized newspaper of about 550 square inches as the basis, would make a large addition to this branch of the revenue of the Department.

The tariff of letter postage proposed in the resolution of the House of Representatives would occasion a reduction in that branch of the revenue, without reference to the increase of letters, of from twenty to twenty-five per cent. This reduction, therefore, would amount to about $900,000. The increase of revenue, from the modification and restriction of the franking privilege, may be estimated at $250,000; and that from an increase of correspondence at an equal sum. The saving in the transportation cannot well be estimated; but it would no doubt amount to several hundred thousand dollars. The increase of gross revenue from postages on newspapers and other printed matter, with the advance on the postage as proposed, would probably amount to $500,000. Without the advance, the revision and equalization might be estimated to produce half that sum.

These changes in the establishment could therefore be made not only with safety to its finances, but they could hardly fail of placing them in a more flourishing condition.

The full benefit of these improvements could not be realized under four years; that period being requisite to enable all the contracts to be made with reference to them.

It may be deemed an inauspicious time, when the finances of the Department are low, to revise the tariff of postages on the basis of a reduction. It is believed, however, that it can be most safely and judiciously done at such a period. It attempted when the revenue is rapidly increasing, the new tariff would unavoidably be in some degree based on a state of revenue which would be found to be only temporary. But from the present condition of the finances, it would be necessary to postpone the reduced tariff of letter postage until the 1st of July, 1842. And by the other changes taking effect immediately, less retrenchments would be required, and the finances of the Department placed in a prosperous condition at the period the new tariff was to go into operation.

These changes in the system, when their benefits shall have been fully realized, with such improvements as will naturally suggest themselves, it is confidently believed, will admit of a still further reduction of the rates of letter postage, and ultimately bring them down fifty per cent.

The great inconvenience in the transaction of its business to which, for several years, this Department has been subjected, for the want of a public building adapted to its uses, and the constant exposure of its books and papers, will soon be removed by the completion of the building now erecting for it. I have adopted such measures as were within my control to protect the present building and public property from fire. The building now erecting for the Post Office Department, if the contractors do not obtain from Congress a further extension of the time for the performance of their contracts, will be fit for occupation in the course of the ensuing autumn.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOHN M. NILES.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, JANUARY 4, 1841.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands; who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up.

MR. CLAY of Alabama said a brief explanation of the principles and enactments of this bill might, perhaps, be proper from him, as he had reported it from the Committee on the Public Lands; but, in this era of good feeling towards "log cabins" and the tenants of "log cabins," which had recently been manifested all over the country, he presumed a very brief statement would be sufficient. They lived, he said, in what might emphatically be called the era of good feeling towards those rude places of habitation, and their humble occupants; for, during some months past, they had been the especial and constant theme of high praise and eloquent encomium, not only in the region where they were almost exclusively to be found, but even in our cities, and in more refined parts of the country. Nor, (said Mr. CLAY,) was this confined merely to political discussions—it had been made to enter into every thing else—even the jewellery worn by many of our most fashionable ladies, and the ornaments which decorated their persons, bore the impress of the "log cabin" of the wilderness.

He (Mr. CLAY) congratulated the great West, and more especially the tenants of the "log cabins," and all others, wherever they might be situated, who stood in need, and were desirous to possess a freehold, on the favorable auspices under which this important bill had been introduced. Looking to all these favorable indications, and thus sustained by public sentiment throughout our country, he would not permit himself to doubt the success of the measure; and he hoped there would not be found one solitary opponent of the bill, to interrupt the apparent unanimity.

He said he might here allude to the very different state of feeling and sentiment which had heretofore prevailed upon the subject under consideration. On all former occasions there had been strong, decided, and he might almost say violent opposition to every measure intended to protect the settlers on the public lands, and favor their interest. Even during the last session of Congress, Senators would recollect what strong opposition was encountered by the pre-emption bill then in progress, and which ultimately passed both Houses, and received the President's approval on the 1st of June, 1840. It would be recollected that that measure passed both Houses, almost by a strict party vote—the friends of the present Chief Magistrate supporting it with great unanimity, as one of the favorite measures of his Democratic administration, whilst those opposed to him resisted the passage of the bill with at least equal unanimity. He was rejoiced at the apparent change which had since occurred. Shortly after the strenuous opposition which the bill alluded to had encountered in both Houses, almost entirely from those opposed to the Administration, those same gentlemen (the Whigs) had become the most ardent in their professions of attachment to "log cabins" and their occupants. He repeated his congratulations to the meritorious class of citizens whose interests were so deeply involved in this measure, that, from the manifestations of the six months which preceded the late Presidential election, the Whig party had now become their most zealous friends; and that henceforward there would be a generous rivalry between the two great political parties which divided the country, in the support of the privilege of pre-emption, the reduction and graduation of the price of public land, and every other measure of liberality to the new States, and the humble cultivators of the soil.

He said he might here take occasion to remark that he was no new convert to the policy proposed by this bill. It was one which he had labored to advance, at least with earnest zeal and persevering assiduity, for the last twelve years, in one branch of Congress or the other, except for a brief interval of absence; and even then he was not wholly inactive. It had long been a favorite policy with him, through the medium of pre-emption laws, and other kindred measures, if possible, to make every freeman a freeholder. In favor of such a policy he had often before raised his voice, and expressed his strong convictions. But heretofore he had been the representative of a people who were immediately interested in the passage of bills of this description. When he first took his seat in the other branch of Congress, a considerable district of country, which had been settled for some years, was ready to be brought into market; and since that period, other large portions of the State of Alabama had been acquired by treaties with the Indian tribes, and almost simultaneously covered with a hardy and industrious population. Hence, always heretofore, his constituents were to be benefited by the passage of pre-emption laws, and the support he had given them might, perhaps, have rendered him liable to the imputation of interested motives—as, although he was not personally interested, and never obtained a pre-emption in his life, he might have been supposed to pursue the course he did to ingratiate himself with his constituents. But now he had the good fortune to occupy a very different position. Every acre of land in Alabama, not owned by individuals, had become the property of the Government; there was no portion of the territory within that State subject to the claim of any Indian tribe. The Indian title to the last remnant of their territory had been extinguished several years ago; and he believed there was none that had not been surveyed for the last twelve or eighteen months. It had been settled still longer, and, consequently, was subject to be claimed under the pre-emption laws of 1838 and 1840. Hence, so far as regarded pre-emption, all his constituents were provided for, and he was now as disinterested as any other Senator in that chamber. Alabama had no special interest in the bill, except as it embraced lands subject to private entry, commonly called refuse lands. But he was glad to have this opportunity to give disinterested evidence, as he should by his vote on this occasion, of his approbation of the principle and policy of the measure. He was satisfied it was the true policy. He had hitherto maintained, and he now maintained with equal earnestness, that Government ought to extend favor to those who will settle and improve the public lands. He would go further, and say, if the public lands were sold under the pre-emption laws for less money than when sold at auction, even for half price, it would be the policy of this, as it had been of every other Government, to confer peculiar privileges on those who settle and improve them; for thereby the wide-spread domain of the United States was rendered productive, and the resources of the country enlarged and improved.

He (Mr. C.) contended that it was not wild and uncultivated land, however extensive, that constituted the wealth or strength of a country. He contrasted the present condition of the valley of the Mississippi—the great West—with a dense, numerous, and enlightened population, in a high state of improvement and cultivation, yielding annually the most abundant supplies of every thing necessary to the subsistence, comfort, and enjoyment, of civilized man—with what it would have been, had it remained a wilderness till the present day. He asked, how different it was now, either in furnishing resources for the support of Government, or the men and means for the national defence, compared with what it would have been, if it had remained unsettled, unimproved, and uncultivated? Was it not obvious, that it would have been better to have given away all that portion of the public domain to have brought about the present prosperous condition of things, than to have retained it till now, if ten or twenty times the Government price could be realized from its sale? He thought these views could not be well controverted; and if true in regard to the settled part of the country, was it not equally so as regarded the portion of the public domain which still remained unoccupied? If we had derived all the advantages, at which he had hastily glanced, from the occupancy and cultivation of one portion, it was fair to presume, that we should derive corresponding benefits from the improvement and cultivation of another.

But, (said Mr. CLAY) in point of fact, there is no sacrifice of pecuniary interest on the part of the Government, even at the time of sale, on the plan proposed by this bill—at least none worthy of consideration. He said it would only be necessary for gentlemen to turn their attention to a report made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, on the 8th of January, 1838, with the accompanying table, and to a similar statement made by him on the 16th of January last, to satisfy them of the correctness of this position. The cash system commenced on the 1st of July, 1820; the report first alluded to, showed the average prices from that time to the 30th of September, 1837; and the last gave the average prices from the 22d June, 1838, (when the pre-emption law of that year was approved,) up to its date, in January last—embracing a period of about nineteen years. The cash system had been in operation about ten years before the passage of the first general pre-emption law—which was on the 29th of May, 1830. Let gentlemen examine the average prices before the passage of that act, and compare them with the average prices since received, and they will be satisfied I am correct in saying the pre-emption laws result in no material loss to the Government. Mr. CLAY then read from the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, showing the average prices paid for public lands, in each year, since the commencement of cash sales, as follows:

The average price paid in 1820 was $1 40 per acre.

Do.	1821	1 50	do.
Do.	1822	1 23	do.
Do.	1823	1 30	do.
Do.	1824	1 27	do.
Do.	1825	1 35	do.
Do.	1826	1 33	do.
Do.	1827	1 42	do.
Do.	1828	1 26	do.
Do.	1829	1 26	do.
Do.	1830	1 26	do.

Now, (said Mr. CLAY) up to the 29th of May, 1830, there was no general pre-emption law. For the two years preceding (1828 and 1829) the average price in each was but $1 26 per acre, and it continued the same during the year 1830, in only the last half of which did that law operate. Here was an excess, in two consecutive years, before the passage of the act, of only one cent per acre, above the minimum price; and in the following year, during half of which the first pre-emption law was in operation, the price remained the same.

Now, (said Mr. CLAY) what has been the result under the pre-emption policy? The official report will answer the question. For the year 1831, (during the first half of which the first pre-emption law continued to operate,) the average price was $1 28 per acre—two cents higher than it had been either of the three preceding years. In 1832, when no pre-emption law was in force, the average price was but $1 27 per acre. In 1833, the average price was $1 29 per acre. In 1834, when a new pre-emption law was passed, to continue in force two years, the average price was $1 31 per acre; and in 1835, (throughout which the same law was in force) the average price was $1 27 per acre. In 1836, during the last half of which there was no pre-emption law, the average price was but $1 25 per acre; and again in 1837, (still no pre-emption law,) the average price was but $1 28 per acre.

It also appeared (said Mr. C.) from the statement of the Commissioner, made in January last, exhibiting the result of sales from the 22d of June, 1838, (when another pre-emption law passed,) up to the then latest returns, that the average price received for nearly seven millions of acres, was but $1 26 18 100 per acre; and on the part sold at auction, exclusively, only $1 29 33-100 per acre.

Now (said Mr. CLAY) is it not apparent that the prices received for the ten years before the commencement of the pre-emption system, and those received for the nine years since, during a long portion of which pre-emption laws have been in operation, are not materially different, if at all? Do not these official statements establish that we receive as much money from the actual settler and cultivator as we would receive from the speculator or landmonger? And is not the question distinctly presented, whether we will sell the public domain, in small quantities, to men of small capital, who will immediately occupy, improve, and render it productive, or whether it is our better policy to sell at auction to bands of speculators and capitalists, in large quantities, to lie idle and unprofitable till they can extort the desired profit from those whose necessities compel them to have it? Yes, sir; this is the question for our grave consideration. And can an American Congress hesitate as to the answer we shall give it by our legislation? He hoped the period when there could be any doubt upon this question had gone by, and that now a favorable response would come from all quarters.

He said he had omitted to mention one fact connected with the sales of the public land, which was worthy of consideration—that was the greater expense incurred by the Government, in sales at auction, than in those under the pre-emption laws, or by private entry. In the latter, the Government was at no expense whatever, beyond the regular and established salary and commissions of the registers and receivers; while the sales at auction involved additional expenses, in the employment of auctioneers, extra compensation to registers and receivers, and expenditure for additional clerk hire—he had not made any precise estimate—but probably amounting to at least four or five per centum. And this amount of additional expense was to be deducted from the small excess above the minimum, which might appear to be gained by sales at auction.

But (said Mr. CLAY) suppose the Government were to profit even to double the amount of the average excess which may be supposed to appear by the reports from the General Land Office, to which he had referred, would the paltry difference of two or three, or even ten cents an acre, be a sufficient inducement with American statesmen to jeopard the peace, the safety, and the interest of the numerous families which are annually settled on the public lands? No, sir; the Government would lose infinitely more by such a course, in paralyzing the energies, and crippling the resources of those hardy and enterprising pioneers, than could be compensated by any pecuniary gain.

Sir, (said Mr. CLAY) money is the smallest, and about the last, consideration, that should enter into or influence our policy in the management of the public domain. It is a consideration which has never controlled the policy of other Governments, over which it is our pride to boast a superiority. It was not the policy of Great Britain, still less, perhaps, of France and Spain, in the disposition of the lands claimed by them at an earlier period of our history. Occupancy, cultivation and improvement of the resources of the country, were the considerations upon which they granted the lands of the Crown.

Nor was money the consideration which induced the original States to cede positions of their territory, except, perhaps, so far as to aid in the payment of national debt, contracted in the war of independence. They had much more exalted purposes in view; to put down controversies about territorial limits; to quiet jealousies between the different members of the confederacy; to build up prosperous communities; to create new States, and thereby add new stars to the bright constellation of our glorious Union. These were the bright and laudable motives which operated upon all the States which made cessions of territory; it was apparent in all the compacts between those States and the General Government, especially in that of Virginia, the mother of States; and not the sordid consideration of making money for themselves, or the General Government.

He further remarked that the bill under consideration might be fairly regarded merely as a measure to change the mode of sale from auctions to private entry. He thought he had sufficiently shown that it would not materially affect the amount of revenue derived from this source, even if the quantity sold should be the same. But he said the sales would undoubtedly be greatly augmented, and consequently, much more money would be brought into the Treasury within a given period, than under the present system.

This bill, too, was free from the objections which had been urged against the other pre-emption laws of the last twelve years. It had been urged that, by those pre-emption laws, rewards were given to persons who were trespassers on the public property, who were worthless in character, and who set the law at defiance, by settling upon the public domain, with no more right than they had to seize upon the public Treasury, upon our vessels of war, and our forts and arsenals. Now such was not the bill under consideration. Here the bill was prospective, unless it was in respect to those who had become settlers since the date of the last pre-emption law. The main object of the bill was not to protect those who were called trespassers and violators of the laws, but to say to the hardy cultivator of the land, who gave an earnest of being a cultivator, that he should be safe in the possession of the fruits of his labor. Nor was it confined, as was said by another class of objectors, to the inhabitants of the valley of the Mississippi, or to the great West. Heretofore it had been urged that the bills were partial—it was objected, not only that they were rewarding the violators of the law, but that they were confining its advantages to them and to the settlers within the limits of the new States and Territories; but this was broader in its provisions, and it held out the same inducements to the industrious and enterprising of the old States, that it held out to the new States. Now, he regarded this as an important feature in this bill, and one which, with due deference to those who differed from him in opinion, it seemed to him should silence all objectors, leaving out of view the enthusiasm in favor of log cabins, and their occupants, which had been prevailing for some time past. But by this law the poor man of the old States had it placed within his power, if industrious and enterprising, to go forward to the new States with the guarantee held out to him of a title to the land on the payment to the Government of $1 25 per acre. It seemed to him that by the old States it should be regarded with more favor than by the new States. In the new States they had learned by experience, and the practice of enterprise and industry, that they could be independent. There were in those Territories few wealthy landlords, with crowds of tenants around them; but he should be pleased to know what number of freemen there were in the older States who were not freeholders, but who were dependent on their daily labor for the support of themselves and their families. They were doubtless very numerous—and to all such this bill held out the promise of relief.

A citizen of an old State, if he stands in need of a permanent home, to subsist, rear, and educate his family, is here guaranteed one, if he has the enterprise to seek it. Now was there any objection to this? It was the principle of a free Government that every citizen should have the power of free locomotion—that every one should have the right to remove from one part to another, and even to abandon his country if he thought proper. Let not, then, this be any longer called a new State measure, or one that is partial in its operation; it was no longer calculated to benefit the new States or Territories, but to benefit every one, from one end of this wide-spread confederacy to the other, and at the same time to be just to the Government; it only required that a man should become a cultivator of the soil—that he should place himself on any part of the uncultivated lands, and pay to Government the minimum price. It was equal in its operation—holding out the same boon to citizens of the old as well as the new States—and requiring the same price from all.

This measure, then, not only recommended itself to the favor of all those who supported the pre-emption projects of the last twelve years, but it assumed higher ground: instead of being partial in its operation—instead of being confined to the new States and Territories, it extended the privilege alike to the citizens of all the twenty-six States; while it was liberal to the people, it did no injustice to the Government; and he trusted it would pass with a unanimity with which no other measure ever has passed in regard to the public lands.

He deemed it unnecessary to say more; for he did not believe it possible there could be any well founded objection to this bill. Indeed, in saying as much as he had said in explanation of the provisions which it contained, he had rather adhered to form, than spoken from any conviction of the necessity of that course; and he should now content himself with voting for this bill, without saying more in its favor.

Mr. BENTON said the two bills standing together on the special orders, in relation to the public lands, the one for graduating the price, and the other for establishing a permanent pre-emption system, were bills upon the same subject, mutually connected with each other, and very fit and proper to be discussed and passed together. It would be difficult to discuss one without discussing the other; and, as it would save time, and be within the rules of propriety and order, he should avail himself of the discussion of one to speak of both.

It would be recollected, that he had heretofore spoken of the sentiments of the present President of the United States, (Mr. Van Buren,) as being favorable to the principles of both bills—as having presented his opinions to that effect in official messages—and he had taken it upon himself to say that he was entitled to more credit for the sentiments he had expressed, and the part he had acted on this subject, than any public man in the United States; and he, (Mr. BENTON,) had said these things with a full knowledge of what he was saying, and with a full determination to prove what he said when the proper opportunity presented itself. That opportunity had now arrived. The two bills were before the Senate; the discussion had commenced upon them; and the officially expressed opinions of the President were fit and proper matter to be presented to the Senate. He would, therefore, present the recommendations of President Van Buren on the subject of pre-emptions and graduated prices of the public lands, as he found them in his annual messages, and he would afterwards say something in justification of his assertion, that Mr. Van Buren deserved more credit for his conduct on the question of the public lands, and was entitled to more gratitude from the cultivating and farming interest, than any other public man in America.

The first extract to which he would call the attention of the Senate, was from the President's Message of December, 1837, which was in the following words:

"A large portion of our citizens have seated themselves on the public lands, without authority, since the passage of the last pre-emption law, and now ask the enactment of another to enable them to retain the lands occupied, upon payment of the minimum Government price. They ask that which has been repeatedly granted before. If the future may be judged of by the past, little harm can be done to the interests of the Treasury by yielding to their request. Upon a critical examination, it is found that the lands sold at the public sales, since the introduction of cash payments, in 1820, have produced, on an average, the net revenue of only six cents an acre more than the minimum Government price. There is no reason to suppose that future sales will be more productive. The Government, therefore, has no adequate pecuniary interest to induce it to drive these people from the lands they occupy, for the purpose of selling them to others." * * * * *

"A policy which should be limited to the mere object of selling the lands for the greatest possible sum of money, without regard to higher considerations, finds but few advocates. On the contrary, it is generally conceded, that, while the mode of disposition adopted by the Government should always be a prudent one; yet its leading object ought to be the early settlement and cultivation of the lands sold; and that it should discontinue, if it cannot prevent, the accumulation of large tracts in the same hands, which must, necessarily, retard the growth of the new States, or entail upon them a dependent tenantry, and its attendant evils."

In the message of December, 1838, he found the following passage:

"Our experience under the act passed at the last session, to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, has as yet been too limited to enable us to pronounce with safety upon the efficacy of its provisions to carry out the wise and liberal policy of the Government in that respect. There is, however, the best reason to anticipate favorable results from its operation. The recommendations formerly submitted to you in respect to a graduation of the price of the public lands, remain to be finally acted upon. Having found no reason to change the views then expressed, your attention to them is again respectfully requested."

The message of December, 1839, contained these observations:

"On a former occasion your attention was invited to various considerations in support of a pre-emption law in behalf of the settlers on the public lands, and also of a law graduating the prices for such lands as had long been in the market unsold, in consequence of their inferior quality. The execution of the act which was passed on the first subject, has been attended with the happiest consequences, in quieting titles, and securing improvements to the industrious; and it has also, to a very gratifying extent, been exempt from the frauds which were practised under previous pre-emption laws. It has, at the same time, as was anticipated, contributed liberally during the present year to the receipts of the Treasury."

"The passage of a graduation law, with the guards before recommended, would also, I am persuaded, add considerably to the revenue for several years, and prove in other respects just and beneficial."

"Your early consideration of the subject is therefore once more earnestly requested."

And lastly, from the message of December, 1840, he made the following quotation:

"The available balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January next, is estimated at one million and a half of dollars. This sum, with the expected receipts from all sources during the next year, will, it is believed, be sufficient to enable the Government to meet every engagement, and leave a suitable balance in the Treasury at the end of the year, if the remedial measures connected with the customs and the public lands, heretofore recommended, shall be adopted, and the new appropriations by Congress shall not carry the expenditures beyond the official estimates."

Now these were extracts from the four different messages from Mr. Van Buren during the four years that he had filled the Presidential chair. The extracts spoke for themselves; they showed the sentiments of the President; and they showed him to be what a patriot President should be—the uncompromising enemy of speculators, and the frank and thorough friend of the settlers and cultivators. The President was for pre-emptions, and graduated prices; and these were the two things which the speculators abhor, which the good of the country required, and what every settler and cultivator had been demanding for many years. The sentiments of Mr. Van Buren were made clear on these two great points. He had spoken for himself, and that not once, or twice, but four times; not in a private conversation, or in a letter, or in electioneering harangues, but officially and publicly, in his high character of President, and under the responsibility of the constitutional injunction to recommend to Congress the measures which he deemed proper for their consideration. These were the sentiments—this the conduct of President Van Buren; and for the manner in which he had taken these sentiments up, and expressed them—the candid manner in which he had taken them up, and the responsible manner in which he had expressed them—he had placed himself at the head of the list of the friends of the graduation and pre-emption policy, and had entitled himself to the gratitude and confidence of all the friends of these measures.

He accorded this high praise to Mr. Van Buren without any reservation, and without any exception whatever. He excepted nobody—not even any one from the new States—and least of all did he except himself. He (Mr. BENTON) and others from the new States, who had supported the pre-emption and the graduation policy, had done their duty in a good cause, but their merit could not be equal to that of statesmen from the Atlantic States, who had renounced unfounded prejudices against these important measures, and became their ardent supporters, and that against a powerful adverse interest. This was the case of Mr. Van Buren. He was a member of that Senate when these measures had but few friends there, and when the settlers on the public lands, the pre-emption bills for their benefit, and the graduation bill, were all accustomed to be denounced, and that by Western men, in terms of unmeasured condemnation. Mr. Van Buren was a member of this body when he, (Mr. BENTON,) almost solitary and alone, pleaded the cause of the Western pioneer—claimed protection for the meritorious settler—and argued the justice of reducing the price of the public lands according to its reduced quality and value. His solitary voice was overpowered at that time, and his bills were treated as preposterous, absurd, and impracticable measures, and were said to be repudiated by the people of the West themselves. This was what Mr. Van Buren, in common with other Senators from the Atlantic States, was accustomed to hear; and it was natural that such representations, coming from Western men, should have its influence upon a stranger to the West, and prejudice his mind against the settlers on the public lands, and against all the measures intended for their relief. It was natural that such should be the effect produced; and accordingly Mr. Van Buren, with almost the whole body of Atlantic Senators, voted against pre-emption bills, and graduation bills, during the time that he was a Senator on this floor; but his mind, though misled, was just and candid, and open to the convictions of truth; and during the four years that he presided over this body—during the four years of his Vice Presidency that he sat in the chair of the President of the Senate, and gave such punctual attendance and such respectful attention to their debates—during these four years his prejudices became entirely removed, and he became favorable to the bills which he had formerly opposed. This change took place under the progress of discussion and under circumstances which proved that it was as disinterested and as fearless, as it was enlightened and equitable. It took place during the progress of an adverse measure—the land revenue distribution bill—a measure calculated to enlist all the old States against the settlers, against pre-emptions, and against reduced prices of the public lands. It was in the face of this antagonist measure—it was during the progress of this adverse bill, so hostile to the settlers and the new States, and so well calculated to array all the old States against the new ones—it was during the progress of this measure which presented so much to the hopes of a calculating politician, and when some former friends of the new States were faltering and going away before it—it was in this crisis that Mr. Van Buren became sensible of the correctness of the graduation and pre-emption policy; and from that time he only waited the appropriate opportunity to manifest his sentiments. That opportunity presented itself when he became President of the United States, and in that character had to discharge the constitutional duty of recommending to Congress the measures which he deemed proper for their consideration. In his first annual message, he recommended the graduation and pre-emption policy; in his second message he did the same; in the third he repeated the recommendation; and in his fourth and last, he has adhered to it. This has been his conduct in relation to these important measures; and upon this statement of facts, as concisely as they were correctly stated, he (Mr. BENTON) rested the assertion, that Mr. Van Buren stood at the head of the list of the meritorious friends of the graduation and pre-emption policy, and was entitled to the gratitude and confidence of all who believed, as he did, that that policy was the true policy of the country, combining in the highest degree the interest of the individual with the interest of the public.

Having done this justice to Mr. Van Buren, and availed himself of the advantage of his arguments in favor of the two bills referred to, he (Mr. BENTON) would go on to give his own testimony, derived from experience, in their favor. It was now thirty-one years since he had first been called to act in a legislative capacity on the subject of pre-emptions, and fourteen years since he had first moved the graduation policy on this floor; and all experience had confirmed him in his opinion in favor of the wisdom and justice of both measures. As far back as the year 1809, he had been a member of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee—a member of the Senate of that State—and in that capacity, had given his cordial support to the pre-emption policy, extended by that State to the settlers on the public lands of the State south of the Holston river. He had seen the operation of the pre-emption law then passed by the Legislature of that State, and he had seen the operation of all the pre-emption laws since passed by Congress. He had seen all—literally seen it; for his residence in the West enabled him to see it; and he could truly say that the operation of these laws had been equitable and beneficial—good for the individual settler—good for the public Treasury—good for the country. He was, therefore, confirmed in the policy by the test of experience, and should continue to give it an ardent support. He was for the settler—for the man that went forward amidst every danger, under every privation, and against every hardship, to build his log cabin in the depth of the wilderness, and to provide by his labor and his courage for the support and defence of his family. The soil should go to the cultivators, was his doctrine; the first comer having the first choice; the second comer the second choice; and so on to the end of the list, speculators and general purchasers taking their choice after the first settlers were provided for. Thus, experience had tested the benefit of the pre-emption system: it had done the same with the graduation principle, for this principle had been tried in the State of Tennessee, and had worked well there: it had been tried in the State of Mississippi, on the Chickasaw lands, and by virtue of a clause in their treaty, ratified by the Senate of the United States, and had worked well there. The graduation principle had worked well in both these instances, and the public mind of all the new States, and in all the Territories, was entirely in favor of it. It was as necessary in the old counties as the pre-emption bill was in the new ones; and the current of public opinion was now so strong in its favor, that those who ridiculed it when he (Mr. BENTON) first brought it forward, now eclipsed him in their zeal for it, and laid hold of the graduation bill as a passport to popularity, and as a ladder to promotion.

He had pleasure in saying that the public mind throughout the Union had shown itself favorable, during the late Presidential canvass, to the policy of these two bills: the actual President was known to be favorable to them from his public messages to Congress; the President elect was argued to be so from his past votes in this body; and to neither were his sentiments on this point objected in any part of the Union. Mr. Van Buren received near four hundred thousand popular votes more than he had received in 1836; General Harrison received more than one hundred thousand above him; and that after having voted for a pre-emption and a graduation bill far more liberal in their provisions than the bills now before the Senate. He voted, in 1828, for a graduation bill down to 25 cents per acre, and for a pre-emptive right of purchase graduated down to 5 cents an acre; and had the full benefit of these votes in the new States, without the least diminution of public favor in the old ones.

He (Mr. BENTON) here adverted particularly to the provisions of the bill for which General Harrison voted in 1828, and which, for the sake of precision, on a point so important, we insert entire.

A BILL to graduate the price of the public lands, to make donations thereof to actual settlers, and to cede the refuse to the States in which they lie.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the public lands as have been offered heretofore at public sale, and which may remain unsold on the first Monday of November next, and shall then be subject to entry at private sale, shall, thereafter, be offered at private sale, in parcels, conformable to sectional divisions and subdivisions, until the sale thereof shall be effected, at the following graduation of prices: For two years next ensuing the first Monday of November, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, at one dollar per acre; for two years next ensuing the first Monday of November, 1830, at seventy-five cents per acre; for two years next ensuing the first Monday of November, 1832, at fifty cents per acre; and for two years, from and after the first Monday of November, 1834, at twenty-five cents per acre.

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for any head of a family, young man over the age of twenty one years, or widow, not having received a donation of land from the United States, and wishing to become an actual settler on any parcel of public land authorized by this act to be sold, and not exceeding in quantity the amount of one-quarter section, to demand and receive from the proper register and receiver, as soon as thirty days shall have elapsed after the said parcel shall have fallen to either of the graduated prices by this act established, a written permission to settle on the same; and if the person so applying shall pay down to the proper receiver the sum of seventy-five cents per acre for land offered by the first section of this act for one dollar per acre; or fifty cents per acre for land offered at seventy-five cents per acre; or twenty-five cents per acre for land offered at fifty cents per acre; or five cents per acre for land offered at twenty-five cents per acre, and shall forthwith settle thereupon, and cultivate the same for five consecutive years, and shall be a citizen of the United States at the end of that time, the said person, on making proof before the proper register and receiver, of such settlement, cultivation, and citizenship, shall be entitled to receive a patent therefor from the United States. Add if two or more persons, entitled under this act to the privileges of actual settlers, shall apply at the same time for the same parcel of land, then the register and receiver shall immediately decide the right of preference between them, according to the equitable circumstances; and, where these are equal, by lot: Provided, always, That no sale, or assignment of any settlement right shall be valid, and in no case shall the patent issue to any person but the settler himself, if living, or to his heirs or devisees if dead.

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That the registers and receivers, for services done under the third section of this act, shall have a right to demand and take, from the party applying for such services, the following fees: For a written permission to settle upon a quarter section of land, the sum of twenty-five cents each; for taking the proof of settlement, cultivation, and citizenship, and granting the final certificate, the further sum of fifty cents each.

Mr. BENTON then resumed. He said this was the graduation and pre-emption, and also donation bill, which he brought into the Senate in 1828—which was amended by that body until it took the shape which it now wears, and for which General Harrison voted. He voted seven times on yeas and nays, as the journal will show, in majorities, fixing the features and details of the bill: he then voted in a respectable minority of twenty-one in favor of ordering the bill to its third reading: and he showed himself to be a firm friend to the bill of 1828, which reduced the price of the public lands as low as twenty-five cents per acre, and which gave the settlers twenty-five cents advantage in the purchase. All this was duly made known to the American public during the canvass, and no where gave rise to any objection to him. It did not prevent him from receiving a great majority of the votes of the people and of the States. It was fair, then, to conclude that the people of the United States are satisfied with the pre-emption and the graduation policy; and that, in passing the two bills now before the Senate, the rare felicity would be experienced of conforming to the sentiments of the actual President, of the President elect, of the people of the new States, and of the people of the old States.

He (Mr. BENTON) had referred to the votes of the President elect on the graduation and pre-emption bill of 1828, in no invidious or unfriendly spirit. He had done it for the precise purpose which he had avowed—for the purpose of showing that the new President had gone infinitely further in support of such bills than the present propositions go; and that, for this, he had received the greatest applause in the new States, without losing a particle of popularity in the old ones. It was for this purpose that he had quoted the votes of General Harrison; and he conceived that the argument which he drew from these votes, and the public satisfaction with the gentlemen who gave them, was perfectly fair and parliamentary.

He would conclude what he had to say on this subject with recalling to the recollection of the Senate the fact that both the pre-emption and the graduation bills were now presented as revenue measures—that both the President and the Secretary of the Treasury presented them as such—presented them as bills which would accelerate the sales of the public lands, and increase the income from that branch of the revenue,—while adding to the strength, wealth, cultivation, and compact settlement of the States and Territories in which the public lands lie. That was a most material feature in the character of those bills at present. It should recommend them to all sides of that chamber—particularly to the anti-Democratic side, who were calling out for new taxes to defray the current expenses of the Government, and to pay a national debt, which they allege to exist. To that party these two bills must come as welcome visitors—as fountains of supply—as the exact thing which they want—as a means of augmenting the revenue without disturbing any branch of commerce—as most happily combining the interests of individuals with the supply of the Treasury, and the accommodation of the public.

Mr. PRENTISS spoke, as was understood, in opposition to the bill, but in so low a tone of voice, as to be inaudible at the Reporters' desk.

Mr. MANGUM rose to make some inquiry respecting certain provisions of the bill. He said there was a provision that from and after the passage of this act, every head of a family, etc. should be entitled to certain privileges therein mentioned; and he wished to know whether it was intended that there should be a limitation to color, or whether blacks were intended to be included, as well as white persons.

What the precise object of the clause was, to which the Senator referred, did not reach the Reporters' desk; and as the Reporters are not permitted to have the use of any Congressional bill or document, it is necessarily left in obscurity.

He also inquired whether the bill was intended to comprehend aliens as well as free citizens. It appeared to him, some of the terms used in the bill were exceedingly comprehensive, and yet indefinite. He wished further to know how long a person would be required to occupy the public land, before he would be entitled to the privileges proposed by this bill; and he was desirous of being informed what guard or security there was that one person would not settle on ten or twelve successive sections of land in the same year.

He saw no provision respecting the length of occupancy, nor any to prevent a settler entering half a dozen or more sections at the same time; and he would be glad if the friends of this bill would give him the information which he desired before he voted on the bill. He further observed that it appeared to him, if this bill passed it would revolutionize the whole land system of the country, and confer the power on the register and receiver of the district, and the Commissioner of the Land Office—higher judicial power than was known to be bestowed to any officers in this country; in truth, the whole land would be subject to a central system, and the existing land system might be dispensed with. He further complained that the bill would be unequal in its operation, and consequently unjust towards some portion of our citizens, who could not by possibility derive the slightest advantage from this law. He insinuated that those "boys" of eighteen years of age, who, by this act, would be entitled to pre-emption, would be twenty-one four years hence; and after stating that he did not propose to go into a discussion of this bill, concluded by observing that he was opposed to its whole policy.

He afterwards again rose, and moved the amendment of a section to which he had referred, by introducing the word "white" before "persons," thereby limiting the right to pre-emption, so as to exclude persons of color.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky called for the ayes and noes thereon, which were ordered, and the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 37, nay 1, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Mangum, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Roane, Robins n, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Surgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Young—37.

NAY—Mr. Porter—1.

Mr. MANGUM then moved the insertion of the words "being a citizen of the United States" after the words "single man," so as to exclude aliens from the right of pre-emption.

Mr. CALHOUN inquired whether, in point of fact, any but a citizen could hold land; and he was informed that aliens could hold land in Ohio.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama was also understood to say that aliens could hold land in many of the new States.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that the law in this particular should conform to the laws of the respective States.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said this was no new question; but no bill of this description ever did contain a provision like that now proposed to be inserted; and yet no evil was known to grow out of them. This ought to be satisfactory to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. CALHOUN said this was with him a question of principle; and he had merely made the inquiry, that he might have a knowledge of the fact.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said this was a bill of great importance; and as he was of opinion that it would require many amendments, he would suggest, as it was past three o'clock, the usual hour of adjournment, that the bill should be passed over.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that we ourselves soon forgot what had passed in this body. It is not yet three years since this very question was argued at considerable length, and solemnly decided by the Senate. When the last pre-emption bill was under consideration, in January, 1838, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] had moved to exclude foreigners from the benefit of its provisions; and after much debate his motion was negatived. From the investigation which then took place, the fact was established, that from the very beginning of our land sales, foreigners had always been permitted to purchase the public lands in the same manner as if they were our own citizens. No inconvenience had ever, to his knowledge, resulted from this practice. No person even now proposed to change it. This was the established policy of the country. The attempt now made was not to prevent foreigners from purchasing the public lands, but from acquiring the right of pre-emption. For his own part, he thought that the alien who came to this country, traversed the Atlantic States, and made a settlement with his family in the wilderness of the far West, ought not to be excluded from the privilege of purchasing at the minimum price, in preference to all other persons, the small tract of land which he had improved, merely because he had drawn his first breath in a foreign land. In this particular he ought to be placed on the same footing with our own citizens.

The uniform practice of selling the public lands to foreigners interfered with no right of any of the States, no matter whether aliens were permitted to purchase lands under their laws or not. The title thus acquired by the alien would be good against all mankind except the sovereign State within whose limits the land was situated. If under its laws aliens could not hold real estate, the State might forfeit it by the common law process of escheat. None of the new States had ever adopted this course. On the contrary, they were all glad that emigrants from other countries should purchase and cultivate these lands. He was, therefore, prepared, both on principle and on policy, to vote against the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM.]

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said it was very true that this question, as had been observed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, had been raised some years ago; and he also believed, beyond the mountains, aliens were allowed to hold land, but he also believed that there was some condition required in almost all the States—in some of them, a residence of two or three years. Now it might be a question whether they should extend the privilege except to those holding by State authority—and aliens who hold were not entitled to a vote—but he (Mr. CLAY) was opposed on principle to the proposition that aliens should be invited from every portion of the habitable globe, to take possession of the public lands on terms so peculiarly favorable as were proposed by this bill.

Whilst a man is an alien, owing allegiance to any foreign power, he ought not to exercise the right of franchise in our country; nor ought either the serfs of Russia, or the subjects of Austria, or of England, or France, bound by their allegiance to a foreign potentate, to be allowed, until they renounced their fealty to their original potentate, to enjoy the privileges of American freemen. On this question he hoped, neither there nor elsewhere, would there be any diversity of opinion, whatever there might be of the necessity of a greater or less restriction in the acquisition of the rights of an American citizen in the different stages of the national progress, in its infancy and maturity. There was another point on which there ought not to be any diversity of opinion. Though it might be the practice of our Government to sell the soil of our country alike to aliens as to citizens, there should not be extended an invitation to aliens to come and purchase our lands; and yet such would be the effect of this bill. It was a question of sound policy whether they would hold out to all, without or within this country, these peculiar privileges of pre-emptioners. He (Mr. CLAY) should conform his vote to that which he had given this question three years ago.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that like the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY] he would most cordially adhere to the vote which he had given on this question three years ago. He agreed with the Senator, that until a foreigner became a citizen, he ought not to be permitted to exercise the elective franchise. But the present case was far different. What, after all, was this privilege of pre-emption about which we had heard so much? Was it a gift of the land? No. Was it a sale of the land below the ordinary price fixed upon it by the Government? Certainly not. What then was it?

We had ascertained by long experience that the public lands, from some cause or other, do not command at public sale on an average more than two or three cents per acre more than the minimum price. The reason of this, we may easily conjecture? The bands of speculators who attend these sales, combine for the purpose of keeping down the price to the minimum standard. They are thus enabled to obtain the choice tracts at but one or two cents above one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. Now what is the great privilege which we confer by this bill? It is nothing more than this;—that the man who goes into the wilderness—selects a quarter section of land—erects his log cabin upon it, and brings it into a state of cultivation, shall not be turned out of house and home by any greedy speculator who may have cast his longing eyes upon it. This spot of land is not offered at public sale, but is reserved for the actual settler, provided he pays for it in cash at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. The Government may thus, by possibility, lose one, two or three cents on each acre, in securing to this poor man his selected home. This is the sum total of the benefit to him and the loss to the Treasury; without bringing into the account the advantage which the country derives from having its vacant lands settled and cultivated by a brave and hardy population.

Now, in regard to aliens. The Senator has admitted that, from the origin of the Government until the present day, they have been permitted to purchase the public lands of the West, either at public sale or by private entry. This fact is incontrovertible. Then why make an odious distinction against foreigners in this particular case? If you permit them to purchase in every other form, why deny to them the privilege of purchasing as pre-emptioners. The alien who flies from oppression at home, and makes his way into the far West, and there fixes his habitation, at the same time places his body as a barrier against the attacks of the savage foe which your policy has collected on that frontier. Such aliens thus furnish stronger evidence of their fidelity to the country, and of their intention to become citizens, than they could do by a mere declaration to this effect, under the naturalization laws, though, he presumed, such a declaration was made by them in almost every instance. A man who merely does this, may change his intention before he becomes a citizen; but the man who makes a settlement on the public land, and purchases it from the Government, thus identifies his own fate and that of his family, for weal or for woe, with our Government. From such men we have nothing to apprehend. And shall we suffer even the alien speculator, who has no intention of ever becoming a citizen, to purchase the humble dwelling of this poor man, and drive him out of possession? Such might often be the case, if it were not for your pre-emption laws. For my own part, I shall always most cheerfully, as long as I shall be honored with a seat in the Senate, grant this trifling privilege to the actual settler, whether he has emigrated from the old to the new States, to improve his condition, or has fled from oppressor in the old world, to live under the protection of our Republican institutions.

Mr. BENFON said there were no restrictions in Missouri upon the acquisition of lands by aliens—that it was the policy of the State to encourage emigration, and she had therefore placed foreigners on a level with citizens in what relates to the rights of property.

With respect to the present motion to exclude aliens from the benefit of the pre-emption laws, he said it was the repetition of a motion which had been made two years ago, and which had been then rejected; and he saw no new reason for bringing it forward now. It was, in his opinion, an impolitic and an unwise motion, and the reasons given for it were unfounded and unenforceable. What were those reasons? Why, that it gives a right in our soil to emigrants from foreign countries, before they have abjured allegiance to their native country, and encourages the refuse of the European population to come to our country. Now this bill could offer inducements to no one to come but such as meant to live by their labor, and by the most useful and honorable of all pursuits—that of agriculture. To such only could the pre-emptive privilege be an inducement to leave their own country and remove to the United States; and all such must be most welcome accessions to our population. To receive the benefit of the bill, the emigrant must go and settle on the public land—he must clear it and cultivate it, build a log cabin upon it, and inhabit it. This was a real pledge of fidelity to the country—a better one than an oath of abjuration of foreign allegiance could give. The settler, under such circumstances, became at once a meritorious inhabitant; he attached himself to the soil; he began to add to the mass of the national wealth, by adding to the mass of the national production; he took his place among the farmers, and from the first moment felt his attachment to the country in which he was instantly elevated to the class of freeholders; and his feelings were communicated to his children, and love of America grew up in their hearts, and predominated in their affections. For himself, he (Mr. BENTON) could say that his own experience was entirely in favor of the measure. He had seen the effect of the pre-emption privilege in Missouri in favor of foreign emigrants; it drew a vast many of them to the State, and instantly converted them into meritorious cultivators of the soil. Germans, especially, came in vast numbers, and were continuing to arrive, and the country deeply felt the benefit of their labors. They were forming large settlements, and towns, and villages, and were incorporating with the population and becoming part of its mass. The passage of this bill, and its twin brother, the graduation bill, by which the inferior lands will be reduced in price, will greatly augment this emigration; and he (Mr. BENTON) should rejoice to see it. Emigrants who came here to deal in money, found no restrictions upon their acquisitions; alien merchants or bankers may acquire millions, and carry them away. To this none of the gentlemen objected. Then why should they object to the acquisition of a few hundred dollars' worth of land by an alien, when he must remain and cultivate that land for the general good as well as for his own individual benefit, for he could not carry it away from the country? This was absurd; and he (Mr. BENTON) was astonished to see the difference which was made between the acquisition of real and personal estate. The alien banker or merchant may acquire unlimited millions, and exercise vast influence over the policy and elections of the country; the solitary cultivator who would work his little field in the woods, having no power to influence any body, is objected to as a dangerous character. This was preposterous, and the objection could not hold. The motion to exclude aliens had been rejected heretofore by a decided vote of the Senate, and he trusted it would be so rejected again.

The question on adopting the amendment proposed by Mr. Maugum being taken, it was decided in the negative—ayes 12, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Huntington, Knight, Maugum, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, and Rugles—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—30.

And the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 5, 1841.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama offered the following amendment, which was agreed to:

And be it further enacted, That, prior to any entries being made under the privileges given by this act, proof of the settlement and improvement required by its provisions shall be made to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the land district in which such lands may lie, agreeably to the rules which may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office for that purpose; which register and receiver shall, each, be entitled to receive fifty cents for his services therein; and all assignments or transfers of the right of pre-emption given by this act, prior to the issuance of patents, shall be null and void.

Mr. TAPPAN proposed to amend the bill by an amendment which declared that the settler should be entitled to the benefits of the pre-emption right only once, which was agreed to.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he had an amendment to propose, as a proviso, to the last clause, as follows:

Provided, That no person being an alien shall be entitled to any privilege or right of settlement or pre-emption granted by this act, except only such as shall previously have made, in due form of law, the declaration of intention, required by the naturalization laws of the United States, to become a citizen of the said United States.

And provided further, That no person shall take any right or benefit under this act, who shall not make oath before some proper officer authorized to administer oaths, that his whole estate was not, at the time of his settlement, worth as much as five hundred dollars.

He said he had supposed yesterday, when the Senate decided that aliens should be admitted, that the Senate proceeded on the supposition, that foreigners settling on our public lands, of course intended to become citizens; but it appeared to him it might still be proper to require of them some legal evidence of that intention. He did not see what possible objection there could be to this.

Mr. ANDERSON. There is no objection to the first part of the resolution.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. If, indeed, they were going to legislate on the plan proposed yesterday by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] and were not only to welcome all foreigners, but in our expansive philanthropy to grant them privileges, refused to our own native born citizens, then, to be sure, there would be no necessity of such a proviso as he had proposed; but if Congress legislated on any thing like a principle of nationality, if it proposed to recognize any distinction between foreigners and natives, then surely the amendment was proper and reasonable. Else, what was there to prevent foreigners actually to form colonies in the midst of our country? to avail themselves of all the benefits extended by our laws without the least thought or intention of ever assuming the responsibilities of American citizens? There were already many foreigners of this description in our country; there were many merchants in our great cities who were ever ready and on the alert to grasp at every privilege our legislation would permit to them; but who were not citizens with us, and never intended to be. Before he would grant to a foreigner the privilege provided by this bill, he would record evidence of the man's intention to become naturalized. Was this too much to require? The Senate had been told that to all those who fled from oppression in the old world we were to grant—what? Our own lands? That was the amount of it. But this was what he was not prepared to do. It had been urged that we were under obligation to do this to foreigners, because they presented their breasts as a bulwark to guard us against the savage foe upon our frontier. When, and where, had we made foreign breasts the bulwark of our safety? What! and was it come to this, that our citizens had to rely on the breasts of foreigners for their protection? No, no, no. Things had not come to that pass. The American people were not yet reduced so low as to be forced to offer pecuniary rewards to strangers and foreigners to expel their bosoms as a rampart to defend us—against whom? Not against a world in arms would he seek such a bulwark for protection, much less against a horde of naked savages. This might do to be used in argument; it made a very pretty figure in a speech; but he could not think that gentlemen were quite in earnest when they urged such a consideration as that on the Senate. No, no; we wanted no such equivalent for our lands; what we chose to grant we would grant freely, and not encumber it with a condition of defending us against the Indians on our border. All he would require was a simple pledge of intention to become one of ourselves; to share the rights and responsibilities of American citizens. Could less be asked than this?

As to the second branch of the amendment, viz: the requirement of an oath that the estate of the applicant for a pre-emption did not exceed $500—what objection could there be to it? The authors of the bill had thrown the "log cabin" feature into it expressly to show, as he supposed, that the bill was to be enacted for the benefit of the poor man. He wanted it to be so in fact and in truth. He did not want a law to make rich men richer, but to furnish a home to the industrious man who wanted to live and to work. It was important that there should be some limitation to the operation of the bill; otherwise, under the pretext of giving a home to the poor and laboring man, the law would operate in fact for the benefit of the grasping and speculative. By a curious coincidence enough, it had happened yesterday, that while the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] was advocating and urging the bill upon the Senate, he (Mr. CRITTENDEN) received a letter from an old friend and constituent, inquiring with evident anxiety whether there was not a great pre-emption bill to pass this session; the letter stated that throughout that country there was a great movement among the people; men of substance were quitting good houses and settlements, and removing, with the hope of getting richer, on to new lands. This was under the idea that now, as heretofore, the pre-emption law would require actual residence and settlement. The writer added that he made the inquiry more particularly, because there lay near his present residence a piece of very good land, and if he was sure such a bill was to pass, he would at once break up and remove to this new tract. The letter stated that the removals were very numerous—in fact, that there seemed a general movement throughout all that part of the country. Not only log cabins of the best description, but in some cases good brick houses, were abandoned that their owners might avail themselves of the expected pre-emption law to enrich themselves and their children. Now it never, surely, could be the intention of the Senate to grant pre-emptions to men of this description; and if not, the bill ought to be limited and guarded, in order that it might effectually exclude those who waited for such a law, that they might use it as an engine to increase their wealth.

Mr. TAPPAN said if the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky failed, he should propose an amendment to remedy the evil by preventing the acquisition of a pre-emption right, by any person who should be the owner of any land, and should quit it to live on the public lands.

Mr. BUCHANAN could not have supposed that the few incidental remarks which he had made on the question which was yesterday decided by the Senate, would have brought out the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN] or any other Senator, in reply to-day. He had no right, however, to complain of this, and was only sorry that he (Mr. B) was now compelled, in self-defence, to make a few observations in reply to his remarks. It had been his purpose not to utter a single word on the general subject of pre-emptions, which had been so often discussed by him before; but to content himself by merely giving his silent vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. B. should neither vote for the first nor the second clause of the Senator's amendment. He went against the whole and each of its parts. In relation to the first clause, he held that the foreigner who penetrated to the Western frontier of our vast country, and there settled upon and cultivated a tract of land, presented the clearest proof, and that by the most decisive action, of his intention to become a citizen of the United States. How can it be contended that this was no proof of such an intention? The whole conduct of such a man manifested that he was determined to live and to die by the soil. In what other manner could he give stronger proof of his devotion to our institutions than to have transferred his home from his native country to the far West, and there to have felled the forest and erected a dwelling (he would not say a log cabin, for he had no reason to be remarkably partial to that name,) for himself and his family? He thus acquired, not the title to the tract of land which he had selected, but merely the right to purchase and pay for it at the Government price, in preference to all other persons. If he should prove unable to do this, his labor was all forfeited. Mr. B. could assure the Senator, that from such aliens as these, he need apprehend no danger of foreign influence. These pioneer farmers were not the men from whom we had any thing to dread. He should never consent to destroy the title of such a man, after he had paid for his land, and thus to render all his toils and privations unavailing, merely because through negligence he might not have gone to a court of justice, and made a formal declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, before his actual settlement commenced. No, never! His judgment and his feelings would equally revolt against such an act.

He (Mr. B.) could not understand the opposition which had been manifested in certain quarters to foreigners, who had sought a refuge and a home in our country. Had they not materially assisted in achieving our independence? In the days of the Revolution no such jealousy was felt towards the brave Irishmen, Frenchmen, and Germans, who, side by side with our native citizens, had fought the battles of liberty. On the contrary, he had no doubt, it was from a grateful sense of these services, that it had ever been the settled policy of the Government to allow them to purchase our vacant lands upon the same terms with American citizens.

Was there no reason for pursuing the same policy at the present day? Was it not clearly our interest as a nation to permit such emigrants to purchase, and possess our vacant lands, and thus establish a line of defence on our frontier against the incursions of the savage enemy? This was a wise policy which he trusted might never be abandoned.

But the Senator [Mr. CRITTENDEN] made light of the danger from the hordes of savages, which, wisely or unwisely, had been collected on our Western frontier; and he thought it was degrading to American citizens to be protected and defended by any foreigner not yet naturalized.

Mr. B. believed that the danger was one which might well be apprehended even by the bravest men. Some twenty or thirty thousand Indian warriors, he did not recollect the number exactly, now occupied the country along the Western line of the States of Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana. There they were, and there they must remain, or the national faith must be violated. They had been almost literally driven to that frontier from their native homes in the interior of the States, with all the hostile feelings and wounded pride which our conduct towards them naturally inspired. At any time, at all times, there was danger of a united war being waged by these savages against our frontier settlements. We all know that it is the nature of the Indian to brood over his vengeance, and to strike the most dreadful blow when his enemy least expects it. Was it not then clearly the policy of the Government to increase the number of inhabitants on that frontier? And if an Irish, a German, or a French emigrant thought proper to settle there, was he (Mr. B.) to be censured for having declared that their bosoms would become bulwarks against the incursions of our savage enemy? These brave men would always be ready to die in defence of these possessions which this Government had permitted them first to improve and then to purchase.

But the Senator thought it would be degrading to Americans to resort to such a defence. Mr. B. well knew that "the blood of Douglas could protect itself." He knew that our own citizens could defend their country: but how they could be degraded by fighting in the same ranks with foreigners, as our Revolutionary forefathers had done, he was utterly at a loss to conceive. This was a species of exalted pride which he could not understand. And this, too, when these foreigners, united with our own citizens, were defending their common possessions and their homes. It was certain that such men would become citizens as soon as they could under our naturalization laws; but if any of them, either ignorantly or from negligence, had omitted to make a formal declaration of their intention to this effect, he would never deprive them of their privilege of pre-emption, and drive them from their homes for this reason. He could not, therefore, give his support to the first clause of the Senator's amendment. On the second clause of the amendment, he should say nothing, as he did not deem it necessary, and would not, therefore, protract the debate, into which he had entered with much reluctance.

Mr. CRITTENDEN would offer but a few words in reply, rather to what the Senator had insinuated, than to what he had actually said. The gentleman seemed greatly surprised that there should be manifested in certain quarters so great a hostility to foreigners. He did not really understand what the Senator meant. He had not said one word derogatory to foreigners; he had neither said nor insinuated any thing like it. It was his idea that the Constitution, by the liberality of its provisions, offered an asylum and protection to the oppressed of all countries; but it was reversing the whole matter, and changing our entire attitude, when we offered to grant them a pre-emption title to land among us that they might come and be our bulwark against the Indians. Such a position was against our national pride; it was degrading to tell all the world that we would grant them privileges in the hope that they would present their breasts as a bulwark to defend us from danger. Was this language for Americans? Not that it was degrading to us that foreigners should mingle with our own people in defending the country from a common enemy—not at all, there was nothing degrading in it. But he would not hold this out as a motive to invite them to our shores. He would not offer them land for being our rampart against our foes. He entertained no spirit of hostility toward them; far from it: but he made a distinction between them and our own home-born American citizens. Did the Senator hold them both alike? Did he feel no greater affection, did he acknowledge no greater obligation to our own citizens than to foreigners? If not, why had we passed naturalization laws? Did they recognise no difference between the two? Was it not the policy of every Government and every nation upon earth to draw such a distinction?

But it was said by the Senator that actual settlement on the public lands was better evidence of an intention to become an American citizen than any forms prescribed by our naturalization laws; if so, would it not be better at once to repeal all our present laws touching naturalization, and substitute this "better evidence?" Would the gentleman from Pennsylvania think it good policy to declare that if any foreigner would go upon our public lands and go to work cutting down trees, he should forthwith be declared an American citizen? He (Mr. CRITTENDEN) supposed he would hardly advance such a position. It was particularly surprising to him that there should be in certain quarters such extreme sensitiveness and such a strong dread of interference in our concerns by foreigners who held a petty interest in some petty bank among us, when, at the same time, there was nothing at all of that feeling at the idea of granting landed privileges in our country to foreigners who would not even express an intention to become American citizens. If a foreigner, an alien, could, with his foreign character never cast off, and without recording an intention to become naturalized, obtain privileges not granted to our own native born citizens, did this involve no danger of foreign influence? It seemed not. The gentleman could view this with perfect composure; but let a foreigner, residing far from our limits, hold a share in one of our banks, and it excited at once a mighty alarm! Now, he did not hold that the privilege proposed to be conferred by this bill, if extended even to foreigners, would present any just cause of alarm; but he was opposed to it on principle. The soil of the United States belonged to the citizens of the United States. Did it not? It was their own property out and out. The right of holding it had been conferred upon citizens, native and naturalized, but it was no part of our policy to grant the same right to foreigners, and especially to such as refused even to declare that it was their intention ever to become naturalized amongst us. He would put a case by way of illustration. We possessed a widely extended country. It spread from sea to sea, and there was a portion of it under the more immediate care of his friend from Missouri near him, [Mr. LINN;] he meant that part of it which lay beyond the Rocky mountains and round about the mouth of the Columbia river, a region represented by some gentlemen as a terrestrial paradise. Now if the bill should pass in its present shape, what should prevent foreigners from coming there, erecting their log cabins, claiming the right to the soil, and selling it to whom they pleased? This might certainly be done. As to the probability of such a event, there might be a difference of opinion. But under the bill it might be done. But the gentleman says that this is log cabin doctrine. Ah, the gentleman did not understand what the log cabin doctrine meant. These foreigners who do not intend to become American citizens, are not the sort of log cabin men we wish to provide for. The bill, indeed, makes it a condition that the settler shall build a log cabin; but it does not define what sort of a log cabin it shall be. Now, the sort of log cabin which a good Whig or Harrison man would put up for his dwelling is one thing, and that log cabin which a foreigner would erect as a mere pretext to obtain a color of title is a very different thing. The one must be some thirty or forty feet square, and comfortable as that. The other is a hovel, a den just big enough for a man to creep in on all fours. If we adopt the amendment, we surely do the foreigner no injustice. The moment he sets foot upon our soil we welcome him at once to all the privileges of an American citizen, provided he will simply declare, and put the declaration on record, that he means to become such. This is all we ask. Let him do this, and "without money and without price" we give him at once all the privileges and advantages of our own native born citizen. He has at once the right to acquire lands and to engage in all the pursuits conducive to his happiness. Where else under the sun can he obtain such rights on such terms? Nowhere. But all this is not sufficient. The gentleman wants to go further, and to invest him with these rights without his making so much as a declaration that it is his purpose to become a citizen. The gentleman fears that his foreign friend may have omitted this through mere inadvertence, or from not knowing that it is necessary, but surely, before a man gets land by virtue of a pre-emption law, he will at least read the law on which he depends for his title. It might perhaps be complained of as a hardship to the foreigner if we withheld this right from him during all the years he is required by law to reside within the United States before he can obtain the privilege of naturalization. But this I do not propose to do. All I require is the legal evidence that the man intends to become an American citizen. Let him give me this, and I am willing at once to instate him in all the privileges we ourselves enjoy. This surely is as little as we can do in justice to our own citizens.

Mr. BUCHANAN would say a few words in reply. The Senator from Kentucky is a good logician, and, unless he were closely watched, would get the better of his antagonist even in a bad cause. His sophistry up to the present occasion consists in attempting to infer from my argument that I was in favor of substituting an actual settlement upon a tract of the public land for the declaration of intention required from every foreigner before he can become an American citizen. It would be very easy for the Senator to triumph, if he were permitted to substitute his own forced inference, for my express declaration to the contrary. With this view, he triumphantly asks if I would be willing to change our naturalization laws by rendering a residence on our vacant lands equivalent to the declaration of intention which these laws require? Now, I ask him in return, have I ever said that I would? Have I ever intimated any such intention? On the contrary, have I not expressly declared that I would not grant to any foreigner the elective franchise until he had become a naturalized citizen under our laws? Whilst I should not, with the Senator from Kentucky, deny to the foreigner the right of the pre-emption which he has fairly acquired by the dangers and privations encountered in making a settlement on your remote frontier, I would not, for this reason, confer upon him the high political privileges of an American citizen. The Senator's argument, therefore, in this particular, fails to the ground. It has no foundation, in any thing which I said, to rest upon. The right of pre-emption is one thing; but the high privilege of becoming an American citizen is another and entirely different matter.

And what, after all, is this great privilege of pre-emption? To what does it amount? What is its intrinsic value? It is merely a contest between the speculator and the actual settler, as to whether the former shall be permitted to purchase the spots of land improved and rendered valuable by the toil of the latter. Our experience has demonstrated that the average excess of the price of the public lands advertised and sold at public sale, in pursuance of the President's proclamation, is not more than two or three cents per acre above the fixed price of the Government at private sale.

What, then, is the privilege granted to the settler who goes into the wilderness, clears away the forest, and there establishes his home? Does this bill offer such a man a donation? Not at all. Does it give him the land as a bounty? No such thing. The privilege it confers is that he shall not be driven from his humble home by the speculator. This mighty privilege is that he shall pay for his land the price fixed by law, which may be less, by two or three cents per acre, than it would command at public sale; and that after he has paid for it, he shall hold it. And why, at this late day, for the first time in your history, should you make an odious distinction, in this small matter, between the settler, who had drawn his first breath on the other side of the Atlantic, and the American citizen? No such distinction had ever existed heretofore, and no complaint had ever been uttered by those directly interested, that this trifling privilege had been conferred upon foreigners. If the Senator had carefully read the history of his country—I mean on this particular point—I myself have not, but the fact has been furnished to me by one who has—what would he have found in relation to these now despised foreigners?

[Here Mr. CRITTENDEN denied that he had spoken of them as "despised foreigners."]

Mr. BUCHANAN said I know he has not; but if he had understood the honorable Senator correctly, he had spoken with indignation against using the bodies of foreigners as a barrier on our frontiers against the incursions of the savage foe, and considered it a degradation to our own citizens to invoke the aid of such defenders. If the Senator had read the history of his country, he would have found that the Revolutionary Congress, "in the times that tried men's souls," had invited those foreigners to enlist under our banners, and had offered them not a mere pre-emption right, but a bounty in lands, with the privilege of at once becoming American citizens. Here Mr. B. read the acts of Congress of August 14th, and August 27, 1776, from the first volume and first page of the land laws. These acts manifested the estimation in which foreigners, who were willing to fight in the cause of independence, were at that day held by the Revolutionary Congress. He could not be mistaken in believing that it was far different from the estimate now placed upon them by the Senator from Kentucky. Now, said Mr. B. I desire to make no political capital out of any question of this nature. I wish only to act towards those foreigners who may have settled or shall settle upon our public lands, upon the principles of eternal and immutable justice. Nothing more.

From the beginning it has been our policy to permit foreigners to purchase and settle upon the public lands, and I shall not now, for the first time, establish an odious distinction against them, in a pre-emption bill. I will not now, at this late day, repeal the established policy of the country, but in this particular shall pursue the system adopted by the wisdom of our predecessors.

But the Senator has asked me why I am so willing to accord these privileges, and yet am "so jealous of foreigners holding a little stock in a petty little bank." This question I shall endeavor to answer. Sir, said Mr. B. this is the class of foreigners who do produce alarm in my mind,—they excite my terror. [Mr. BENTON: "Yes, the millionaires."] These are not the men who fly from poverty and oppression abroad, and settle in our country to share in its toils as well as its advantages. They are not the poor pre-emptioners of the West, who have indissolubly fixed their fate with ours, and have no other human hope but to live and die upon our soil. No sir, no. Very far from it. The foreign stockholders in our banks have no intention of becoming American citizens. Their object is to increase their own fortune by the spoils of our land, to suck our young life blood for the purpose of strengthening and invigorating the decaying institutions of other countries. They seek to acquire a political influence over us, that they may turn it to their own advantage and our destruction. Of such a foreign influence I confess that I am jealous. I firmly believe that the day on which you shall establish a new National Bank in this country, with a capital of one hundred millions of dollars, and with the power of spreading its branches over every portion of the Union, and more especially if you shall permit foreigners to hold the stock, will be the darkest and most portentous which has ever shone upon the Republic. From that day we shall most probably forfeit not only our liberty but our independence. You will then concentrate and fortify a central money power, foreign and domestic, in this country, which will exercise a controlling, an overwhelming influence over its destinies. Senators themselves may live to rue the day when they called such a vast, such an irresponsible power, into existence. It is such a foreign influence that I dread, and not that of the "log cabin men" of the far West, (I thought I never should have used the expression,) whose fortune and whose fate are necessarily identified with that of the country. It is the foreign millionaire, who seeks to control the politics of the country for the purpose of promoting his own interest and increasing his own fortune, of whom Republicans here and every where ought to be jealous.

The Senator had said, and he appeared to place some stress on the argument, that our vast country beyond the Rocky Mountains might be settled by foreigners under this law, and they might sell it out to every body and any body they thought proper. But this country could not be settled under the provisions of the present bill, until the Indian title should be extinguished; and when the Indian title shall be extinguished in that region, Congress may then establish such laws for its settlement as may be suitable to its condition. The Senator has gone far away for this argument. It will be a long time, notwithstanding the sanguine expectation of some Senators, before this can become a practical question. Before that day, it is probable that both the Senator and myself will have passed from the theatre of public action. In regard to this remote question, which has been invoked as an argument to affect the present interests and policy of the country, he would answer, in the words of the other Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY] on a late memorable occasion. When he was appealed to a few days ago to inform the country what he intended to introduce as a substitute for the Independent Treasury, in case he should succeed in repealing it, his answer was, "sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." We must not look too far ahead. When the time shall arrive for considering the Oregon question, I hope there will be sufficient wisdom in Congress to settle it aright. We are yet far on the eastern side of the Rocky Mountains; and hordes of Indians occupy the intervening space.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said of course it must be natural for him to desire to escape as soon as he could from any contest with the Senator from Pennsylvania; it was one in which of course he could hope to gain but little. Yet he did not admit it to have been such very bad logic that he should have imputed to him the sentiment of preferring a settlement on the public lands to a written declaration before a magistrate as a test on the part of a foreigner of an intention to become an American citizen. True, it was not said in terms that he proposed so to alter the law, but the Senator certainly did insist that the one act afforded better evidence than the other; and if so, why not substitute the one for the other? The Senator would not, of course, oppose the obtaining of the best evidence; and as he esteemed the cutting down of some trees on the public lands, and the erection of a log cabin; that thereby a pre-emption right might be obtained, as better evidence of Americanism than all the forms which our naturalization could furnish, why should not the weaker evidence be dispensed with, and the stronger established? That the difference between the Senator and himself was simply this: the Senator was willing to put the foreigner who made no declaration of a purpose to be naturalized on the same footing with one who did—on the same footing with one who had actually become naturalized, and even with the native-born citizen. He (Mr. CRITTENDEN) did not. He was ready to give to a foreigner who should become a citizen, according to law, all the rights and immunities of one born in the land. He would allow to one who had signified his intention to become such, greater consideration than to one who had not. The Senator was for giving every thing to a foreigner who had made no such declaration. He knew that in time of war we did employ foreigners in our armies; nor was there in this the least degradation. He was willing they should mingle with us in battle, but he was not willing to invite them here that they might protect us. Oh, no; this was not the bulwark on which he would rely for protection. We had other and stronger defence to rely on; and not until we were reduced to the last extremity would he consent to tell the world that we looked to foreign aid as the bulwark of our safety. The Senator was of opinion that our protection against foreigners getting possession of the country beyond the Rocky Mountains was the unextinguished Indian title. Would the honorable gentleman tell him that all that country was actually under the Indian title? He was not aware that such was the fact; he had not till now supposed that these regions were covered by even the vaguest Indian title. We had heard of some entire tribes being exterminated by disease and other causes, and certainly the whole country was not occupied by Indians. The gentleman, however, imagined Indians to be our bulwark against foreigners, and in the same breath was for granting to foreigners the right of pre-emption.

The gentleman had told the Senate that this was not the sort of foreign influence which he feared. Neither did he fear it. It was not from fear that he had introduced his amendment; but as a matter of principle and sound public policy. The Senator, however, was terribly afraid, indeed, of those formidable European millionaires who came among us only to drain our strength and suck our blood. While the Senator was speaking so feelingly on this subject, he could not but be reminded of the Spanish proverb: "Many a man who comes for wool goes away shorn." He thought that some of these European capitalist could perhaps tell him so. The gentleman was much terrified at the thought of the millionaire who sat in his splendid place in London the owner of some stock in an American bank. The Senator seemed to apprehend that, like an electric rod, this little amount of American bank stock might prove the conductor to such amount of foreign influence as would electrify the whole land, and threaten to blow up all our institutions; and yet the honorable Senator was going to vote for a bill which would place an Englishman, a proud and haughty Englishman, who considered that allegiance to Queen Victoria was his chief glory, and her authority the only one to which a Briton ought to bow, on the same footing with the native born American citizen. Of the influence of such men here on our soil the Senator entertained not the smallest apprehension, but seemed, on the contrary, rather disposed to cherish and increase it, to fortify it by privileges, and nurture it with all aids and appliances which law could supply. Such men he invited to enter the bosom of our land to become lords of the soil; but the man, who, kept at three thousand miles distant, with all the broad ocean between him and us, him the Senator feared greatly. Well, he (Mr. CRITTENDEN) would not dispute the matter. Some men were so constituted that that appeared very formidable to them which gave other men no uneasiness at all, and one might as well dispute about tastes as to argue with men's fears.

As to the question of a National Bank with a capital of a hundred millions, which the Senator told them was to subvert American liberty, and make us all the slaves of a great moneyed power, he would not now enter; but he might as well tell the gentleman at once that he should rejoice in the day, and he believed the day had come, when a great and overwhelming majority of the people of United States had become satisfied that a National Bank was the only effectual remedy against all those sufferings under which they had been groaning for the last twelve years. He (Mr. CRITTENDEN) was for a Bank of the United States; not for a Bank with a capital of a hundred millions, governed by English millionaires, but a Bank made and constituted by the people of the United States, owned, regulated, and influenced by themselves; but he repeated that he would not now go into that subject. The question, and the only question at present to be decided was, whether we would put the foreigner, who made no declaration of his intention to become an American citizen, on the same footing with our own citizens. He required some evidence, and he asked for only the smallest modicum of evidence of the man's intention to become an American citizen. Give him but this preliminary requisite, and he was willing at once to include that man in all the benefits of the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the Senator from Kentucky should not transfer this battle to the west of the Rocky Mountains. With his good leave we shall keep for the present on this side of them. The present contest was on the Indian frontier, and regarded the rights which foreigners ought to acquire by settling and cultivating lands within the limits of our existing States and Territories, and not beyond the Rocky Mountains. And now, after all this discussion, what was the difference between the honorable Senator and himself? Why, sir, he has come more than half round. He has now become a good pre-emption man, and is in favor of granting the right of pre-emption to all foreigners, provided they have declared their intention to become citizens. But suppose the case of a poor ignorant foreigner, not acquainted with the laws of his adopted country, who has gone upon your public land, cleared away the forest and erected a home for his wife and his children—I ask, would you deprive such a man of all the benefits of this bill, merely because he had omitted to make a formal declaration of his intention to become a citizen? I ask the Senator to say whether such a man, for such a cause, should forfeit his right to become the purchaser of this tract of land in preference to any hungry land shark who was ready to pounce upon it as his prey? The question between us has been narrowed down to this point at last. Now I appeal to that gentleman's own heart, to say whether he would not decide it in favor of the foreigner. I know and feel that he would. He can entertain no serious purpose that such a settler should forfeit his right. I am sure he does not. And what, then, is all the mighty difference between us? After all our replies, and rejoinders, and surrejoinders, the whole argument dwindles down to a mere question of tweedledum and tweedledee. Can the Senator make more of it? He is willing to place the foreigner upon the same footing with our own citizens, and grant him every right of pre-emption which they enjoy, provided he has gone through the form of placing upon record the declaration of intention required by our naturalization laws. I go one little step further, and hold that the foreigner, by making his way to the far West, and settling upon the public land, manifests, by actions which speak louder than words, even a stronger intention of becoming an American citizen, than if he had merely made the formal declaration required; and in such a case, I ask, should he forfeit his privilege on account of this omission? Sure I am that if the honorable Senator from Kentucky were constituted the judge, and this question were left to his decision, he would answer, emphatically, no! He would never decide that the foreigner who has settled on the public land since June, 1840, upon the faith of your past legislation, or who shall settle upon it hereafter, shall forfeit his privilege of pre-emption, and be driven with his wife and children from their home.

The Senator has done me injustice in another respect. I never either said or insinuated that I would proclaim to the world that we wanted foreigners to come and settle amongst us, that they might protect us from danger. What I did say was, that it had long been the national policy, and one which I considered sound and wise, to encourage the settlement of our frontier as speedily and as densely as possible; and if this should be done in part by foreigners, then, in the hour of danger, their bodies would be our bulwark against a savage foe, just as surely as the breasts of our own citizens. I cannot vote for his amendment, because I am unwilling that an ignorant man, who may have acquired an equitable title to a pre-emption, shall forfeit it for want of having gone through a legal form.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I am anxious to escape from any further participation in this controversy; but, according to the usages of the Senate, as I have offered an affirmative proposition, it is necessary and proper that I should have the last word. The only disingenuous thing which the honorable Senator has said is contained in his last remark, that I am coming round, and, if my amendment prevails, shall vote for the bill. No; I am not committed to vote for granting a pre-emption to any body.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I did not say that the Senator would vote for the bill, for I am sure he will not. I said he would put foreigners on the same footing with American citizens, if they would only declare their intention to become such.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Yesterday I was in favor of confining the benefits of this bill to American citizens. The Senate have voted to extend them to foreigners. I now move an amendment requiring a simple declaration of an intent to be naturalized. The Senator opposes it, and is for putting those who have no legal or legitimate claim to this benefit at our hands on the same footing with our own citizens, and he says the difference between us is a mere matter of tweedledum and tweedledee. The Senator thinks it hard to make a distinction against one foreigner merely because he has omitted to make any declaration of his purpose to become a citizen. Why not agree at once that it is a shame to make a difference between a foreigner and our own citizen simply because he has happened to be born in another country, and under different allegiance—a matter over which he had no sort of control? The difference between such a man and a native American is, in the Senator's estimation, a mere matter of tweedledum and tweedledee. Yet this is the gentleman who is so terribly afraid of foreign influence. He is for making no difference between an Englishman, a Russian, a Frenchman, and an American. Now, the honorable Senator may excuse me, while I have all proper respect for foreigners, if I love my own countrymen a little better than them, and if I do make a difference between the foreigner who comes and grasps me by the hand, and solemnly records his declaration to cast in his lot with me, to make my county his county, my Government his Government, and to seek an inheritance in the soil for himself and his children—and the foreigner who is very willing to receive any and all the benefits we may have to bestow, but who refuses to give us the slightest pledge of his desire to become one of ourselves. To the gentleman this may all be tweedledum and tweedledee—to me, I confess, it is matter of strong and high American feeling.

On motion by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the question was divided so as to be put first upon the first part of Mr. CRITTENDEN's amendment.

Mr. PORTER inquired whether the mover would not modify it so far as to allow a previous declaration made before applying for the pre-emption to be a valid fulfillment of the condition proposed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN assented to the modification proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. ALLEN said he should vote against the amendment because such a provision would be utterly useless if incorporated in the bill. The declaration of the intention of an individual to become a citizen, might be made with great truth; the individual might then occupy land, and obtain a title thereto, and then with great sincerity change his intention. He was opposed to all distinctions of this description, and when a foreigner reached our shores he was willing to take the chain from his neck—every link of it.

Mr. WRIGHT said it seemed to him they were making themselves active about a question which should not be entertained by them; and as it appeared to be the intention to take the question tonight, he would state his views respecting it. Now, after what was said yesterday about peculiar and exclusive privileges, he would ask what was the privilege proposed to be conferred by this bill? It was, as he understood it, the privilege to the settler of paying that price for the land he occupied, which the Government had chosen to fix as the minimum price of the public land; and he made these remarks that he might not be misinterpreted or misunderstood in what he designed further to say upon this subject. Was there, then, reason that they should change all their legislation in reference to the public lands? Had not every foreigner, every where, the perfect right to go to our land office to purchase lands? and who would inquire whether he was a citizen, or intended to make himself one? Who would make such an inquiry? Where was the law proposing or authorizing it? Two years ago he knew such a proposition was made here, but it was rejected. Why should they make such a distinction between the foreigner and the native citizen, in the purchase of the public land? Yesterday, in the course of the debate, he heard an apprehension expressed that they were about to violate the laws of the States, and to force upon them citizens against their institutions; but could they do that? Was it in their power to do it? Suppose they made a grant or sale of land within a State to a foreigner, did it prove that the foreigner could hold or transmit that property to another. In his own State, (New York,) any foreigner could take the title to land, but he could not hold it as against the State; he could not convey it by deed, and he could not transfer it by inheritance. His title was good against all the world but—what? That very sovereign power which, it seemed to him, gentlemen were endeavoring to protect. The United States had yielded to the States all sovereignty over this domain by their admission into the Union, and they only held the title like a private individual, and they had the right to convey in the same manner; but suppose a foreigner should purchase from them, and the law of the State did not enable a foreigner to hold, or transmit, the title; did their patent override the law of the State? No, the foreigner took the title at his peril. If he chose not to become a citizen what was the consequence? He took title for the benefit of the State. The lands would escheat, if he did not qualify himself to hold and convey. Was it desirable then to the States, that we should prohibit such purchases? So long as the title remained in the General Government, the power of the State in which it lay did not reach it; but the moment it was conveyed to any foreigner, or to any body—to an infant, a femme couverte, or any body else, there was an end of the Federal power, and the question of title was with the State. And were they called upon to say who should or who should not purchase? The States have established their own institutions to please themselves, and should the Congress attempt to interfere? Was there a State in the Union in which a foreigner cannot take the title to land? If there were, he knew it not—he never heard of such an instance. In England a foreigner can take the title to land, but as far as the Government is concerned, he takes for its benefit, if it chooses to interfere. It was not a question, then, so far as Congress was concerned, who shall hold and convey land; but the question with which they had to do was, who shall be permitted to take the title? It was for the benefit of the Treasury they sold the land, and when it was sold it fell within the power and jurisdiction, and was subject to the taxation, of the State in which it was situated. If the State choose to say that a foreigner may hold and convey, would they arrest that regulation? And if the State should choose to say a foreigner shall not hold and convey real estate within it, they could not say he shall. The moment the title was transferred to a foreigner, it was in the State, if the State choose to avail itself of its technical right. Were they not, then, agitating a question which did not belong to their legislation, and with which properly they had no concern? An intimation was thrown out yesterday, that, to make a foreigner a freeholder, was, in substance and effect, to make him a voter. Had they power over that? He thought they had not. He believed it was in the power of every State in this Union to prescribe the qualifications of its own voters, and even to permit that man to vote, if its people choose, who is not a citizen of the United States; and he knew of no power in the Congress of the United States to control the State in the matter. He remembered well the occasion when he examined this subject—the admission of Michigan into the Union—and he sought in vain for any authority in any branch of this Government to prescribe who shall or who shall not vote in the States. He was sure it would not be found in the Constitution, and he denied the existence of any such power; and so he denied any authority in the Congress of the United States to determine who shall hold, convey, or transmit the title to real estate within the States. It was enough, then, that they offered the land in the market, and to any person who would pay the money and take the patent; and when it was sold it was subject to the State institutions. These had been his views since the commencement of the debate; and, with them, he should vote against the amendment then under consideration.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he should like to understand how the amendment stood; for, as he understood it, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] by accepting the proposition of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PORTER] had substantially yielded the point in discussion to them.

Mr. CRITTENDEN then said he would prefer taking the question on the amendment as he had originally presented it.

Mr. PORTER said he should vote for this amendment, because he was anxious to hold out to foreigners the additional inducement it would present to them to become citizens of the United States. The declaration of such intention was, in many cases inadvertently, but in few designedly, omitted. It surely was the policy of this Government not only to encourage, but to stimulate these people, by every laudable inducement, to change their allegiance and become what every free white man in the country ought to be—an elector. He did not desire to see the soil of Michigan in the permanent possession of foreign subjects, averse to taking on themselves the duties and obligations, and to enjoying the political immunities and privileges of American citizens. He desired to see them become Americans, and when they were so, in virtue of the naturalization laws, he would be as ready to welcome them to all the rights appertaining to them as such, as if they had drawn their first breath among us. The disabilities of foreigners in relation to real estate, alluded to by the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] as existing in that State, did not obtain in Michigan. Foreigners there could take and hold land free from all restraints on the power of alienation, either by deed or by devise; and in cases of intestacy, it descended according to general laws. It was only the political disabilities of having no voice in elections, and of ineligibility to office, under which aliens in Michigan labored. Those disabilities he wished to see removed; and because such was his desire, he should offer the inducement presented by this resolution, so far as his vote in its favor would go.

He then asked the permission of the Senate to make a short explanation of the vote he gave yesterday on the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM], which confined the pre-emption right to "free white persons." He asked it on account of his peculiarly delicate position, he being the only Senator who gave a negative vote, and because of the unusual precipitation with which the question was disposed of.

By his vote on this amendment, he was called on to decide, as a Michigan Senator, whether this distinction ought to be recognised. It would be observed that this was the first instance in which it had ever been made in the framing of a pre-emption law. Not one of the previous acts contained it, and the question might, therefore, well be asked why it should now be established. But there was not found his objection to this amendment. He was admonished by the tone and character of the civil institutions of the State he represented, not to sanction it. The black man has there no political power, except for enumeration as the basis of representation. He cannot, by any accumulation of property, however great in amount, become an elector or hold an office. But here all his disabilities end. He enjoys all the "civil rights" conferred by our Constitution and laws on the white man, without restriction or limitation. He may take and hold, as he does take and hold, real and personal estate. He may convey and sell it, and direct its descent by will and testament; and if he dies intestate, it descends according to the laws in force regulating dower, inheritance, and the rights of creditors of deceased persons. In short, the color of the skin is no passport to an exclusive enjoyment of personal liberty or the rights of property. The right proposed to be conferred by this pre-emption bill, being strictly a civil one, and as no political power can be incident to its enjoyment by the black, he might well have hesitated to be the first to create a distinction, and the only one, as to color, in the facilities for the acquisition of property, afforded alike to all by the framers of our State Constitutions.

He could well imagine that this question was liable to be viewed in different lights by the representatives of different States. He was wholly unacquainted with the domestic details which regulate the institution of slavery at the South, but he took it for granted that a slave cannot hold lands. It would be a strange anomaly if he could.

[Mr. MANGUM here remarked, "No, certainly he cannot."]

The absence of this amendment then, would be wholly inoperative as to him, and he could not, therefore, be suspected of a wish to connect this bill with that subject to the injury of Southern rights or Southern feelings, voting, as he wished it to be understood it was his design to vote, in accordance with what he believed to be the spirit of Michigan institutions. Indeed, he could not feel at liberty to vote otherwise.

The question was now put on the first branch of Mr. CRITTENDEN's amendment, and decided, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Graham, Huntington, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, and Smith of Indiana—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Surgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—29.

The question then recurring on the second branch of the amendment, viz: that requiring a declaration from the applicant that his whole property was not worth over $500—

Mr. BENTON expressed his hope that Mr. CRITTENDEN would not insist upon this, but would accept, in lieu of it, the amendment which had been read by Mr. TAPPAN.

Mr. CRITTENDEN declined doing so, as he did not consider the latter as at all covering the same ground.

Mr. TAPPAN then formally moved his amendment, which was to add to the first section a proviso, in the following terms: "Provided further, That no person being the owner of land in any State or Territory, who shall quit or abandon his residence on his own land, to reside on public land in the same State or Territory, shall acquire any right of pre-emption under this act."

Mr. CLAY of Alabama hoped the friends of the settler would vote against both propositions, on the ground that it was entirely a new feature in the system, and one wholly unnecessary; for who would think of making a speculation on 160 acres of wild land?

The question being taken on the latter branch of Mr. CRITTENDEN's amendment, by yeas and nays, it was rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Graham, Huntington, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Surgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, White, Wright, and Young—26.

And then the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 6, 1841.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up, the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. PRENTISS, of Vermont, as a substitute for the whole bill, as follows:

"Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following: That every actual settler on any of the public lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished, except such as are hereinafter reserved, being the head of a family, or over twenty-one years of age, who was in possession and a house-keeper, by personal residence thereon, at the time of passing this act, and for four months next preceding, shall be entitled to a pre-emption in the purchase of the land so settled upon, not exceeding one quarter section, of the minimum price now established by law."

Mr. TAPPAN urged his amendment to exclude from the right to pre-emption such persons as were the owners of land, who should quit or abandon it, to reside on the public land.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama suggested a slight modification of the amendment, thus: "being the owners of land in any State or Territory, who shall quit or abandon his residence on his own land, without selling the same, to reside on public land," &c. He preferred the introduction of these words.

Mr. NORVELL was opposed to all these amendments, and he demanded the yeas and nays thereon, which were ordered.

Mr. LINN said the object of the bill should be to secure a home for the poor laboring man, who has not a home, and if he could see any practical way of carrying it out, he should vote for it. Nevertheless, he thought he should vote for the bill as it was. The only difficulty with him was as to the result: he did not wish them to pass a law that could not be carried out. They could not restrain the people from going on the public lands—they might as well attempt to restrain the course of the winds—and therefore the law would, in point of fact, be a dead letter. If the provision of the gentleman from Ohio could be carried out, he should be glad, but he feared it could not.

Mr. FULTON said it was wrong to encumber the bill with amendments of this kind; and he should vote against them. Their true policy was to secure the improvement of the public land, and to get every foot of it into cultivation; and this bill was intended to enable the poor but industrious man to procure it at one or two cents per acre lower than it could be purchased at by others; and could this be really a matter of so much moment, as to call forth an opposition, when the welfare of the poor man would be secured by the trifling sacrifice? Now the question in reality was whether an individual who has improved one quarter section, shall go on to improve others, and obtain a pre-emption right thereto. To this he (Mr. FULTON) could see no objection, as the settler might thereby first cultivate a quarter section for himself, and then others for and with the aid of his children, thereby making provision for them, and accomplishing what was desired by all, the cultivation of the land.

Mr. TAPPAN's amendment was then adopted by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Huntington, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Pierce, Prentiss, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tappan, Wall, Webster, Williams, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Walker, White, and Young—17.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he should call for the ayes and noes on the question of the adoption of the substitute which was proposed for the entire bill; which were ordered.

Mr. PRENTISS said as the bill was prospective in its operation, it would hold out an invitation not only to our own citizens, but to foreigners, to come and take possession of our public lands. Now to this he was opposed. This proposition was by far too extensive; it would entirely supersede the whole of the present land system; it was at variance with public policy, and it was incompatible with the interests of the country.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky now rose and addressed the Senate nearly as follows:

The amendment now offered by my friend from Vermont, by drawing a line between the legislation heretofore pursued with relation to pre-emptions, and the new, comprehensive, and interminable legislation proposed by the present bill, opens the whole question for discussion; and I avail myself of the opportunity thus afforded, to present to the Senate some of the general views I have taken of this subject, and I invite, in the outset, the serious, and, I would say, the solemn attention of the Senate to the bill before it. Before, however, I proceed to examine its provisions, allow me, in passing, to notice a most novel and surprising doctrine advanced yesterday by the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT:] not that I purpose to discuss at this time the position he assumed, but that I may here enter my public protest against it, lest, should I remain silent, it might be thought by any that I yield my assent to it. The Senator's position is, that it is competent to a State under the Constitution to admit an unnaturalized foreigner to vote in our elections. I wage no war against foreigners. I respect them when their character entitles them to respect. I well know especially the value of the German yeomanry; a better set of husbandmen does not exist on the face of the earth; honest, industrious, economical, admirable judges of the soil, the best judges of land in all the country, devotedly attached to their families—that is the character of our German population as I have become acquainted with it in my own immediate neighborhood. I will not now stop to speak of the character of the gallant Irish, whose virtues, and, I will add, whose defects of character (the virtues far overbalancing the defects) are so well known throughout the world. I am not the enemy of foreigners; but the opinion expressed by the honorable Senator from New York is one of immense practical importance; for, if I am not greatly misinformed, President Van Buren owes the vote of one State of this Confederacy, I mean the State of Illinois, to the fact of unnaturalized foreigners voting in our late election, and casting their votes for him. I will not, however, enter on that subject, and I have adverted to it now, merely that no conclusion may be drawn from my silence that I approve or tolerate the doctrine advanced by the Senator from New York. I here publicly express an opinion decidedly opposite. I think that the exercise of the elective franchise always implies citizenship, though citizenship does not imply the right to the exercise of the elective franchise. I hold that a voter, whose voice may affect or change the entire policy of the country, may alter or subvert the Constitution and laws of the country, is a component part of the political power of the country. I hold that the power over the subject of naturalization has been confided by the Constitution exclusively to the General Government, and that no State can constitutionally exercise that power; and that, therefore, no State can confer those privileges and immunities, or grant those rights which proceed from naturalization. This is my opinion, and I advance it here merely as a counter-projet to that expressed by the Senator from New York. When a foreigner has once been naturalized, I regard him as a brother, as a member of our political community, and as entitled, with some few constitutional exceptions, to all the rights of native born citizens, and to the protection and defence of the Government at home and abroad; but until he has renounced his allegiance to his foreign sovereign, and sworn fidelity to our country, I cannot and will not—and I was utterly amazed to hear the gentleman from New York express a different opinion—look upon him as incorporated in our society, and authorized, by the exercise of the elective franchise, to exert an influence in unsettling or changing our entire political policy, whilst, as a subject of a foreign power, he lies under all his original and native obligations. If the contrary doctrine be admitted to be a sound one, then, as has been shown by a calculation which I have seen, the Emperor of Russia, by a proper distribution of 17,000 of his serfs among the States of this Union (if the States would have permitted them to vote) might have changed the glorious, the triumphant result of November last, and have continued those in power who, by the full, decided, and manly expression of the public will, have been declared unworthy to be the depositaries of it any longer.

But it is with another subject that I have risen now to deal—the fearful extension now proposed to be given to the pre-emption system. We have now had a land system in operation for upwards of forty years. Is there any thing in the practical effect of this old and long tried system which should induce us to repudiate it for a new, untried, and wild experiment? What have been its results? It commenced about forty years ago, or a little more, in one of the great Western members of the Confederacy, (the State of Ohio,) the settlement of which took place as much as twenty years later than in the case of her sister and neighbor, Kentucky. And what is her population now? From the returns of the new census it is found to amount to a million and a half of souls—nearly double that of my own State, although Kentucky had preceded her by such a great length of time. And if we then go to Indiana, a still younger sister in the great family of States, we shall find that she exhibits a population of between six and seven hundred thousand, nearly equal to that of a State which was her predecessor in the establishment of independent State sovereignty by thirty years. I will not go through the list. All the members of the Senate are doubtless familiar with the returns of the late census. All these great and astonishing results have taken place under that system which we are now asked to change. Is it wise—is it prudent—is it statesmanlike, to reject a plan from which have proceeded such glorious fruits, for an untried, and, as I believe, a most hazardous experiment?

What is the history of these pre-emption laws? They arose, I think, in the first instance in the case of what is called Symmes's Grant. John Cleves Symmes purchased from the Government a large tract of land between the Great and Little Miami rivers, in Ohio, including the spot where Cincinnati now stands. He was unable to pay for it, but finally made a compromise with the Government, and took a less amount of land. He had, in the mean time, sold out to numerous sub-purchasers, who, being innocent third parties, and having purchased in good faith, were supposed to have a fair title to pre-emption for the improvements they had made and the farms they had opened to cultivation. Congress, accordingly, granted to them the right to purchase from the Government the lands they held at the minimum price prescribed by law. Then came the cession of Louisiana, many of the occupants of which had settled on their farms while that Territory belonged to the Spanish and the French Governments, under grants freely made, while others had entered on their lands with confidence that, according to the established usages and customs of the country, donations of land would be obtained, totally unaware of the change of sovereignty which had passed upon the country without consulting them. The question then arose, what ought, in equity, to be done in their case? And the American Government came to the conclusion that all who had thus come into possession of their land were equitably entitled to the right of pre-emption, which was accordingly extended to them. Next came a third case—that of the Kahokia, Kaskaskia, and St. Vincent settlers in Illinois and Indiana. These inhabited French villages were settled in some cases more than a century ago, and were not drawn within the action of our land system till about fifty years since. These people, having settled under like circumstances to those in Louisiana, were held to have a claim equally equitable, and pre-emption was granted to them also. Thus the system stood till 1830, under General Jackson's administration. Then, for the first time, was introduced an entirely new principle, and it is that which is contained in the substitute for this bill proposed by the Senator from Vermont. There is, however, a wide difference between what this bill proposes and the practice introduced under Gen. Jackson's administration.

The pre-emption laws, as altered in 1830, allowed a right of pre-emption to all settlers on the public lands from a specified day, who should assert their rights before the expiration of the law, the operation of which was limited to two years. This new principle continued to be periodically re-enacted till some seven or eight years ago, when it encountered a gallant resistance from a friend, who I regret is not now by my side, but who has passed from this place, and, according to public rumor, is destined to a more useful, if not higher, sphere than even that of a seat in this body, august as it may be. Great frauds and abuses were detected in the execution of the pre-emption laws. Speculators freely used them. Floats especially were found to be fraught with iniquity. With the efficient aid of my friend, [Mr. EWING] we succeeded in arresting for a time these pre-emption laws. We succeeded in putting an end to special and unlawful privileges. We succeeded in restoring the principle of fair equality in the disposal of the public lands. But those interests, speculative and others, which are always awake, always watchful, always on the alert, to get up pre-emption laws, under the convenient and plausible guise of benefiting the poor, made a rally in 1838. We were then told that not less than thirty thousand settlers had entered the Territory of Iowa. The Senate was assured that these persons could not be removed from the public domain; that all the military force of the Union would be insufficient to remove them; and thus, under a species of moral duress, you were induced to pass the law of 1838: and it has now been in operation for two years. But, not contented with all the victories heretofore achieved, not satisfied with pre-emption laws restricted in point of time, and limited as to the theatre on which they were to operate, gentlemen now come forward with a new and bolder, and more extensive demand. They have suddenly become converts to log cabin doctrine, and, under a log cabin profession, they demand the passage of a new law, boundless in the space on which it is to operate, or restricted only by the limits of the public lands themselves, and illimitable as to time. Now with regard to the sincerity of these gentlemen in their profession of log cabin principles, (though I am very glad to see that they have profited by the very salutary lesson afforded them within two or three months past,) I like to test their profession by their votes. When my colleague [Mr. CRITTENDEN] offered an amendment, the effect of which would be to confine the operation of their bill to real log cabin men, to the veritable poor who could make oath that their entire property was not worth more than $500, where did we find these new proselytes to log cabin doctrine? Were they ready to go with us in thus restricting the bill? Were they prepared, by adopting this amendment, to shut out from the privileges of the bill the rich men—the “barons”—the owners of manors—the greedy speculator, and restrict it to the hardy settler who sought a home for himself and his children? No, sir, no; every man of them voted it down.

Let us now pause a moment, and look a little at the distinctive provisions of this bill. Heretofore pre-emption bills have been retrospective only: this is in its operation both retrospective and prospective. Heretofore pre-emption bills have been limited as to time: this is unlimited in point of time so long as there remains a foot of public land for it to operate on. Heretofore pre-emption bills were operative practically only with reference to some new land, recently surveyed and brought into the market: this bill is a proclamation to the whole universe, native or foreign, naturalized or unaturalized, that the moment the Indian title is extinguished to any portion of the land held by the United States, they may all rush in and take just as much of it as they please, without even waiting for a survey; and that all the other surveyed public lands of the United States, amounting to about one hundred and twenty millions of acres, no matter how long they have been in market, and although they may be purchased at the moderate price of one dollar and a quarter per acre, are to be subject to the right of pre-emption. This, it is obvious, involves a complete change in our whole land system; a thorough, radical, entire change. It opens at once all the public lands, surveyed and unsurveyed, to the operation of a pre-emption law.

And here let me stop and look for an instant at what are said to be the sole advantage granted to the pre-emptor by this bill; a point on which there exists the greatest possible misconception, either on the part of other gentlemen or myself. The whole practical difference which this bill is to work in our receipts from the public domain is said to be some two or three cents per acre only. Here is a message of the President of the United States, sent by him to Congress in December, 1837. It is, in many respects, a discreet and sensible paper, so far as it treats on the subject of the public lands. The President here praises the old land system as it deserves. He describes those who enter on the public domain, without title or pretence of title, as “trespassers,” “intruders,” and he recommends the passage of one more pre-emption law, and one only, and after that the adoption of stronger measures for the purpose (in his own language) “of preventing these intrusions.” The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] spoke to us yesterday of the President as being a capital pre-emptor now, although when he was here as a Senator he was decidedly opposed to the whole system, and although when he came into office he talked about “trespassers” and “intruders” on the public lands, and recommended us to adopt measures to put a stop to these “intrusions” in future. It would seem that the President is an attentive listener to the advice of his friends, and always open to conviction. I must admit that he has exhibited not a little flexibility in yielding to the suggestions of some of those who have his ears. I will make my position more general. I think that both the Secretary of the Treasury and the President have shown remarkable ease in opening their ears to the counsels of gentlemen who are strong advocates for pre-emption laws and for the practical appropriation of the public domain to the benefit of a few. The Secretary has brought down the receipts from the public lands to three millions of dollars. They were three millions in 1838, and the very next year they rose to seven millions. The receipts from this source have been subject to great fluctuation; the past year a little above three millions. They are now sinking; and it seems that the more they sink, the more he calls out for pre-emption laws! pre-emption laws! graduation laws! to save him from that impending ruin in the administration of the public domain, which his system is about to inflict. What, sir, is it possible that any man—what shall I say?—that any man in his senses can be so supremely ridiculous as to suppose that, by reducing the price of the public lands from a dollar and a quarter to twenty-five cents, or, in some instances, to 50 cents, you will get more money for them? Yet that is the principle assumed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and it shows the opinion which operates in his mind, and in the minds of the friends of graduation and pre-emption laws. I will not attempt to describe the whole of the consequences of this law. One of its effects is to convert the existing cash system into a credit system. Do you not see it? What is the fact as to the pre-emption laws heretofore granted? They gave the pre-emptor a credit of two years. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] now limits his credit to one year; but whether the term be one, two, or three years, it changes our land system from a sale for cash to a sale for credit; and thus the whole 120 millions of acres of the public domain will all pass under this newly revived credit system.

And who are they who propose this change? The very men who decry all credit, who clamor for hard money, who inveigh against banks, and denounce the credit system as the source of all our woes! and yet here, now, under the name of a pre-emption law, they propose to revive the whole credit system! Can it be doubted that such will be the result of the bill? Will any man, who can get his land on a credit of one or two years, buy it for cash?—especially when he can dispose of his cash at a rate of 18 per cent. interest, as prevails in Illinois and some other new States?

This is a grave feature in this new experiment, and deserves the serious consideration of the Senate. To what will such a system lead? Have we had no experience on this subject? When you have parted with your land from year to year thus on credit, you will at length have accumulated a mass of debtors on whose behalf petition after petition will be presented here, and their inability to pay will be most pathetically set forth, till at last your compassion will be moved, and will forgive these poor debtors the entire amount of their debt and consent to take remuneration for their land in some other form of advantage to the public service.

It is not correct, though it has been said and repeated by some gentlemen here, that the sole difference effected by the pre-emption law in the price you receive for the public land is some two or three cents per acre. First, there is the difference of six cents which the President states; and how is this made out? The public land is sold either by auction or at private sale; but owing to coercion, to violence, to combinations, and the open contempt of law, (a state of things which has grown with the multiplication of pre-emption laws,) the proceeds of the auction sales are now much less than formerly. I cannot believe with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. LINN] that the people of the United States are incompetent to protect their own property. I believe that it can be done, by a steady, firm, and upright administration of the Government. I believe that the people of the United States are capable of protecting the rights against all who assail them, whether from within or from without. Assuredly, if the Government cannot protect what is its own, it must be very incompetent to protect us and ours. But, I ask, how is the six cents excess of sales over the minimum price, referred to by the President, made up? It is got by running an average over the total amount of sales, both by auction and by private entry. Now, the amount sold at auction is not one-fourth, no, I believe, not one-tenth, part of the whole. The Secretary takes the auction sales, where the lands brought from $5 to $20 and acre, and spreads that amount of excess over the whole remaining nine-tenths of the total amount sold by private entry, and then he makes an average, and draws the inference that the whole gain in selling the public lands in the established and customary method over what they bring under pre-emption laws amounts to but six cents an acre! Is this fair? But even this amount of six cents, under a proper administration of the system, would cover the whole expense of survey and sale. But is that all? You are to add two years' interest on the minimum price, which, on a credit of two years, amounts to fifteen cents. If one year's credit only is given, it will be seven and a half cents, which, added to the six cents, makes thirteen and a half cents on every acre of the public domain, which would be gained by the continuance of the old system.

But more. This bill amounts to a virtual repeal of the auction system. That system applies only to new lands recently brought into market. But of what avail is an auction if you proclaim to the whole world that they may get the land at the minimum price if they will only come and settle on it, and that before survey? The entire existing system is superseded by the introduction of this “wooden horse,” with all the means of injury with which it is fraught.

I have now described, but not with all that force in which the circumstances of the case would warrant me, the difference between the old and long-established land system of this country and the new and fearful experiment now proposed. You must have seen that the change is to be thorough and radical. Now I put it to the Administration Senators in this body—to their candor—to their patriotism—to their sense of justice—is it right, on the close of the Administration of a dismissed Ministry, to introduce a new and totally different policy in regard to one of the greatest interests of the country? Is it right, is it fair, that the policy of the existing Administration now passing out of power shall be made to lap over on the new Administration without consulting them or paying the least regard to their judgment in the matter? The progress of the administration of the American Government has developed in the practical operation of our system a new feature, and one of the most profound importance. A different political phenomenon takes place here from any thing which exists in Europe. In European constitutional Governments, when a Ministry is dismissed or goes out of office, the King or the Queen, as the case may be, yields to the change of sentiment, and comes round with the nation. But here an Administration may be dismissed and still remain four months in power. What, in such a case, is it their duty to do? I will tell gentlemen what I would do in the like circumstances. I would institute no new measures of policy. I would simply keep the political machine in motion. I would grease the wheels and repair and preserve all its parts in a state of preparation for the performance of those high duties for which the whole was constructed; but I would attempt nothing new in the permanent policy of the country, foreign or domestic. By such a moderate course alone can the evils of the anomaly to which I have adverted be prevented. I would not ask gentlemen to deny themselves a fair exercise of the Executive patronage from now till the 4th of March next. I do not ask them to do what was done when Mr. Adams was expelled from the Presidency—I should say, lost his election. What did they do then? The Senate refused to pass on important Executive nominations till after the 4th of March, and then several of them were withdrawn, and substitutes sent in by the new President. The Senate refused him the constitutional exercise of his official right from the time of his lost election till he went out of office. This I do not ask. I dare to say General Harrison, when he comes, will look at those whom he finds in office, and, if he finds that they are honest and capable and faithful, that they have not been noisy and forward politicians, nor brought their official influence in conflict with the freedom of elections; if any such there be, I hope he will let them stand (though I fear there will be but few) as monuments of the liberality of a Whig Administration, acting on patriotic principles. But if gentlemen expect that General Harrison, because they choose to rush on and make appointments, with a view to thwart his Administration, will, when he comes here, fear to do his duty, either they or I have mistaken the man. General Harrison means to be the President on the 4th of March next, which his fellow-citizens have elected him to be. And no premature bill, no stretching out of the policy of this into the next Administration, is going to restrain him from looking at those in office, and deciding for himself whether they possess the requisite qualifications for the discharge of their official duty.

But, to come back. I put it to gentlemen whether it is right and fair to make this great change in the land system of the country at such a time? Would you like us to do it if conditions were reversed?

But there are other considerations which admonish us against legislating on this subject at the present time. We have not yet officially received the results of the census for the last ten years; we cannot, therefore, see whether the new States have filled up as rapidly as we could wish. Let us first see what is the number of their population; so that we may judge whether any further stimulant is needed to quicken the rate at which their numbers increase. I know, indeed, that the result will show directly the contrary. From tables which I caused to be carefully constructed nine years ago, it is shown that the population of the new States increases at a rate vastly over that of the old. Take a single example. The population of Illinois doubles itself in six years! What, then, is the ground for the adoption of this new system? Does it consist in some notions of charity to the poor? I have formerly adverted to that subject. Where do gentlemen get their right to set up eleemosynary laws for the benefit of the poorer portions of the community? But if they have, what will be the operation of the system in this respect? It is pretended to be for the advantage of widows and orphans, (orphans over eighteen years, however.) Is any gentleman here ignorant of what will and must, of necessity, be the practical operation of such a law? Will a widow in Maine travel all the way to Missouri that she may receive the boon proposed to be given her by this law? Will not its benefits be confined to the widows of the locality? In terms, to be sure, it proposes to confer the pre-emption on all widows and minors. But will not the benefit, in fact, be limited to widows and minors residing in the States within which the lands lie? Surely. That, then, is the extent of your charity.

I am not very well, and I do not feel very much encouraged by past experience in opposition to this bill. My hope is elsewhere; though I would trust that honorable Senators would at least pause before they take such a leap.

There are other consequences on which I might dwell. We have heard that this bill and another allied to it are to increase the revenue; and I believe that one of them was, pro forma, sent to the Committee on Finance on that ground. The new plan is, to increase the resources of the now impoverished exchequer; but I have already shown that, for the present at least, the revenue will be diminished instead of increased by it; for the amount vested in the public lands under this law will be on a credit of one or two years, and cannot come into the Treasury till the end of that time. And as those disposed to make such investments will avail themselves of the credit, there will be sales to but an inconsiderable amount for cash, and a consequent diminution of the proceeds during the present year. Therefore, with an exhausted treasury, with a vast national debt, ascertained and unascertained, besides a large amount to be soon redeemed, of Treasury notes outstanding and running on interest, it is now proposed, instead of replenishing the empty coffers of Mr. Secretary Woodbury, by an imposition at once of duties on luxuries, to increase, instead of removing, the existing deficit in our pecuniary resources.

Our land system heretofore has been the admiration of the world for one of its best and noblest features, viz: the perfect security it gave as to the land titles of our new settlements. No man who had eyes to see the marks upon a corner tree, or upon a stone standing in a prairie, could possibly mistake the limits of his own tract; and no other man could have color of right to disturb him on the ground of his title. Security—absolute security in land titles—has been one of the highest blessings in the new States. But are you sure that this will continue to be the case under your new pre-emption law? Do but conceive how it will work. Imagine that a new district of rich and choice land had just been thrown open. The Indian title has been extinguished, but the fresh and fertile lands have not yet been surveyed. They are open, however, to the operation of this bill; and, in the course of a few weeks, may become worth from fifteen to twenty dollars per acre. You proclaim to all who come rushing in torrents upon the new acquisition, crowding, contending, scrambling for the fairest spots, and the best situations, that they shall have a pre-emption. What scenes of confusion, contention, heart-burning, ay, of blood-hed, must naturally ensue. When a nation, heretofore esteemed wise and prudent in the management of its public domain, proclaims to all the world that the first man who comes and seizes on it shall have it, who can calculate, who can conceive the confusion, disorder, and mischief which must ensue? Who can estimate the effects of the broad foundations that will be laid for uncertainty, controversy, and litigation in land titles?

Again, this bill must work a vast increase of the Executive power; for all disputed pre-emption rights which, according to the cautious policy of Virginia, were referred to the decision of the Judiciary by caveat, or ejectment, or bill in chancery, are now ultimately cast on the Executive of the United States; for the bill provides they shall be settled "summarily" and definitely by the register and receiver of the land district in which the dispute arises, these officers to decide under instructions from the Commissioner of the General Land Office. So, the disputant is put under the register and receiver; the register and receiver are under the Commissioner; the Commissioner is under the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary is under the President. Thus, you add immensely to the mass of Executive power, by drawing within its vortex all the disputed claims through all the land districts. And now, I ask, what right have you—and I put the inquiry more especially to that portion of the Senate who have been in the habit of esteeming it as their more peculiar province and duty to guard and defend the Constitution of the United States, (and who perhaps, have sometimes pushed their zeal on that subject a little too far)—what right have you, and under what principle, or provision of the Constitution, especially after the clear and distinct separation in the Constitution of the Judicial from the other departments of the Government—what right have you to give to the register and receiver of one of your land districts the indisputable judicial power to decide a question of title to real estate "summarily," without appeal, and without the intervention of a jury? And then what a temptation do you not present to public officers so situated? Why, if I am rightly informed, there was not long since a single pre-emption right near the town of Chicago, the value of which was at one time estimated as high as $200,000; and the right to such a property is to be entrusted to a register and receiver absolutely and without appeal! Can there be greater danger of corruption, or, at least, of favoritism? The power is tremendous.

Mr. President, I have said much more than I intended. Both your comfort and my own require that I should here stop; and I will stop with repeating my most anxious entreaty to these honorable gentlemen whom in political sentiment I have the misfortune to oppose, that they will pause before they sanction an untried experiment of such enormous magnitude. I ask them to wait for the results of the late census; to compare the population of the new and the old States, and the relative rate at which both are increasing; and before they part with a land system which is at this hour the pride and ornament of the legislation of the Congress of the United States, and which has brought to the nation such rich and invaluable fruit to pause—to pause!—and if they will not abandon the plan, that they will at least consent to embark on these new experiments with greater light to guide their course than that which they now have.

Mr. WRIGHT said he had, yesterday, before any question was taken on this bill, offered a few remarks to the Senate on one single question, and with one single purpose, and that was to show that no law which they could pass could have any influence, within one of the States of the Union, upon a holder under this Government, of a patent for lands, as to the security, or perpetuation, or transfer of his title. He attempted to show that the State, and not this Government, has the control of that matter, and that any alien receiving their patent would take the title, and that it would depend upon the institutions of the State whether he could hold, and whether he could transmit or transfer it, and therefore, that the amendments then under discussion were entirely unnecessary, unknown to their legislation, and of no practical utility. He had then, in illustration of the argument he had attempted to make, referred to the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] who had just taken his seat, made on a former day, and in reference to the influence of our legislation as to the sale of lands upon the subject of voting in the States; and to that incidental remark of his, the honorable Senator fairly and properly, though unexpectedly to him, replied. It was to answer the honorable Senator's argument on that point, and not to discuss the bill under consideration, that he now threw himself on the indulgence of the Senate.

There was one part of that Senator's remarks, which he should not answer; namely, that the vote of one State, at the late election, the gentleman was informed, and supposed to be true, was controlled by the votes of persons who were not naturalized citizens of the United States. Having no knowledge of the facts, he referred all that matter to the Senators on that floor, who represented the State to which allusion had been made. He referred also the bill, and its provisions, to the Senators from the States more immediately interested, and who were much more able than he was to discuss it. As to the incidental point, one of vast importance—no less than the qualifications of voters, and as to the question where rests the power to prescribe those qualifications—he could not, in justice to himself, do less than make some reply to the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky. He admitted, however, that he was led into an error in making that simple allusion on the previous day, as he had afforded the Senator from Kentucky an opportunity to draw this discussion from the point before the Legislature, and from the proper question to be discussed. The question between the Senator from Kentucky and himself was, first, where rests the right to prescribe the qualifications of voters for members of the National Legislature in this country, for he chose to confine himself within that limit; but if the Senator desired more broad ground, he would then say, for the officers of the State Governments, and, by consequence, for the members of the National Legislature?

Has this Government any power whatever over those qualifications when prescribed by the States? He (Mr. Wright) said yesterday that, as he understood the subject, the whole power was committed to the State, and that no branch of this Government could, in any way, constitutionally interfere. If he understood the argument of the honorable Senator, and that honorable gentleman would believe him when he said he did not intend to misunderstand him, it was that the qualification of naturalization overrides the power of the State, and, resting in the hands of this Government, until it shall constitute an emigrant from a foreign country a citizen, the State in which he may reside cannot constitute him a voter. He believed he stated the argument fairly and truly.

Now he did not propose to go into this discussion: it was above his sphere; but he had some suggestions to make, which it was his duty, at the earliest period, to lay before this body, and before his countrymen. What was the question? It was—in reference to one class—and if they went back to the commencement of our history as a constitutional Government, a very large class—if they looked to the future, likely to be as large a class of the inhabitants of this country, the tillers of the soil, and the operatives in all the avocations of business—has this Government the power to say whether they shall, or shall not, be the free-men of the United States, in the common acceptation of the term? Whence is that power derived? Where did the Senator look for the right of interference. Was it in our Constitution? He (Mr. WRIGHT) had carefully examined that instrument, and the only word or provision which he had been able to discover was almost one of the first in the instrument itself, and what is it? "The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States." And they knew that, up to this hour, no other than the people of the States had had any part in the choice of members of that House: they had quasi members, in the shape of delegates from the Territories, but they had no "members" who did not come there by the choice of the people of the States. The Constitution proceeds: "And the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature"—and that was all there was in the whole instrument on the subject. The electors of a member of the House of Representatives shall have the qualifications of electors of members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. Who prescribes these qualifications? The Congress of the United States? The President of the United States? Any power of this Government? No: but the people of the States, whose representatives they are. How are they usually presented and defined? In the Constitution of the State. And who was prepared to say that the people of a sovereign State, forming to themselves a Constitution, can be controlled by this body in designating those who shall elect their officers? The persons to represent them at home, and here? For the argument goes to that.

He believed it had been an unconsidered position of the honorable Senator—it must be a new doctrine in this country. He admitted the States usually confined the right of voting to citizenship. But would it be said the people of a State, in the formation of their Constitution and Government, were compelled to do this? Where was the compulsion? Suppose they did not do it; or, suppose they should say, in the Constitution of the State, that an alien, with a residence of but one hour, shall be a voter for the members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature; who was to correct that decision? Where was that high court of appeals which could say that the Constitution of a sovereign State was unconstitutional? He believed it did not exist in our institutions; but that the people, inhabiting a Territory, with a title to become a State under this Government, were sovereign, and, in a legal sense, as inhabitants of a State, were without Government, until they made one for themselves. If his memory served him, they had had a recent example, involving this very point; and if he misstated the fact, he should be corrected. He believed, at the formation of the Constitution for the State of Michigan, free white inhabitants of the Territory were the persons who formed it, and who elected delegates to the Convention as their agents. In the Constitution adopted by that Convention, limitations and qualifications of voters were prescribed; but all the free white inhabitants of that State, at the time of the Convention, were made voters within the State, without regard to our naturalization laws. He might be mistaken, but such was his impression of the facts. Could any body, or any power in this country, say that that Constitution was void? Did it conflict with any powers delegated to this Government?

But for a moment, and he did not intend to protract the discussion, let them look at the condition in which a State might be placed, and in which, at a certain period of our history, the States would have been placed, if this power had existed in the Federal Government, and its voice could have controlled the qualifications of voters for officers of the State Governments. At one time, during the existence of the old alien law, the President of the United States was authorized to remove aliens from this Union—to order their transportation beyond the Territories of the United States. At another period, a long residence had been required, to enable aliens to be naturalized under this Government. By the naturalization law of '95, five years' residence was the limit; but by the law of '98—that period which a most distinguished individual of this country once, in his hearing, in another place, (referring to the House of Representatives,) pronounced hard, unconstitutional times—a residence of FOURTEEN YEARS was required to enable a foreigner to become a citizen. Such, then, had been the practical exercise of power by this Government, over the matter of citizenship of the United States. And still no man would question that this was but a faint exercise of the power, in its plenary existence; this Government might repeal all the naturalization laws, and leave the foreigner forever unable to become a citizen of the United States, and consequently, according to the Senator's position, from ever becoming a voter in any State in the Union. Was it true that this Government held that power over the States, and that the States could not, for all practical purposes, citizenize emigrants? It was not true. They could prescribe, either in their sovereign or legislative capacity, the terms on which a man was to hold real estate, not only, but to exercise the right of a freeman in voting for those who were to exercise the powers of Government over him and his property. At least, he knew not of the existence of a power in this country to control the action of the States and the people of the States upon these points. He believed such power did not exist in fact, as a part of our institutions, either State or National. Look at it, and look again at those complaints which gave existence to this Government, as an independent Government among the nations of the earth; and what do we find among the enumeration of grievances? Why, that the King obstructed emigration to the Provinces, and that the passage of proper naturalization laws was refused; and did our fathers of the Revolution, those sticklers for State sovereignty, place in the hands of this Government those vital powers, which the King possessed, and which the King abused? If so, he asked for evidence of its existence, and for a record of the grant. For they should not forget that they stood there with delegated powers simply, and not upon original and absolute power. This Government possesses the powers which the States and the people have granted to it, and none other. Every other power of sovereignty and government is expressly reserved to the one or the other by the terms of the Constitution. But this argument of the honorable Senator seemed to him (Mr. WRIGHT) to be an argument of convenience, or rather he should say, of necessity. His [Mr. CLAY'S] feelings appeared to be horrified at the idea that the foreigner, the citizen, or subject of another Government, owing, as that honorable Senator expresses it, allegiance to a foreign power, should come to this country and, by his vote, govern our politics and political institutions. Suppose this evil to exist, where was the danger to be felt? And where should the remedy rest? Could it be that these serfs of Russia, who had been introduced into the Senator's argument, were to place themselves in one of the free States of this Union, to control its elections, its offices, and its affairs, with its approbation? To be the destruction of this Government, and not the destruction equally of the government of the State? If there be danger, and there may be, where is it first to be felt? In the State where the evil exists. Where then should rest the remedy? In the hands of the sovereign people of that State; and Congress was not permitted, in his estimation, to presume that the people of a State will encourage a policy, in reference to free voters of this country, that will be destructive of our institutions, State or National. If it shall come to be so, the institutions are gone, for they rest on that people, the people of the States, and not on any distinctive organization of this Confederacy, which can preserve them against, or without, their action. The members of Congress are but the delegates of the people of the States, with limited and prescribed powers, not extending to the qualifications of voters in the States. If evils were to be apprehended from too great a latitude in defining these qualifications, the apprehensions must exist with the greatest force in the heart of our sovereignty, among the people themselves, and the remedy should rest where the evil must be first discovered, and where it would be most severely felt. An argument, then, cannot be drawn from the necessities of the case, for if there be danger, the remedy rests where it should.

The people have the right to prescribe their own policy, and to judge of their own safety. He had now said all he intended to say in reference to the power to prescribe the qualification of voters; and with a single reply to a very playful remark of the honorable Senator, he would close. The honorable Senator said that as a defeated party—as a retiring Administration, it was indecorous and improper in the friends of this Administration to bring forward any new measures, or to adopt any new steps of policy. Well, that he (Mr. WRIGHT) believed; and he had intended, in his heart, to be just as modest as possible for the short remaining period in which his political friends were to hold power in that body, if they held it then—to do what he believed the interests of the country required should be done, and strictly to refrain from doing what he did not believe to be necessary. The bill before the Senate—and it was but the opinion of a single individual—he considered as part of a policy adopted and pursued by the Congress of the United States nearly ever since he had had the honor of a seat in that body; or, at most, it was but a modification of that policy. He viewed it in that light, and he entreated the friends of the coming Administration not to look upon him as attempting to tread in the steps of that powerful party.

Suppose, however, the honorable Senator's exaggerations were real, and that they were attempting, at this late period of their political power, to introduce new and improved measures of principle or policy, it would seem to him that the opportunity to effect a remedy was so near, that that pure and clear light, which was to shine, on the 5th of March next, over all this happy Union, could prevent any great evil; while if, from any motive, proper or improper, they should make a sad mistake, as political partisans, it must be remembered that all partisans did not deeply regret such misfortunes, when falling upon their opponents. If, however, it should happen that this measure runs across the policy of the coming Administration, and yet that a heavy responsibility may be devolved upon those who feel compelled to act in its repeal, then complaint might not only be expected, but received with indulgence. In that aspect of the case, he could feel no disposition to recriminate upon the honorable Senator. Such would have been his feelings, and might have been his course, if their situations had been changed.

A word upon another topic.

The honorable Senator said, that some years ago, when there was a political revolution in the country, this body, of which he (Mr. WRIGHT) was not then a member, refused to consent to the nomination of the non-elected President. That might be so. He (Mr. WRIGHT) did not doubt it, for the Senator said so; but his memory enabled him to say that there was a radical difference between the two cases. It was not that the men of that day acted in violation of the principles which they had espoused and advocated, but that the Administration, then dismissed, happened to fall into a minority in this and the other branch of Congress, not during the year of its expiration, but two years before, and the representation of the people, here and in the other end of the Capitol, had been against that Administration, for that length of time. Surely, then, the honorable Senator would not criminate them for doing what they believed to be in conformity with the will of their constituents, thus repeatedly expressed. He (Mr. WRIGHT) must believe the Senator from Kentucky would not now recriminate on the friends of the present Administration for doing what they believed to be their duty, since they were so soon to yield the Government to those who, he sincerely hoped, would give the country a wiser and better government. But if it be improper for them to introduce new measures, and a new policy, was it generous for the Senator to ask them, during the short period which remained to them, to undo all that they had done? To retrace their steps? To unsettle again their old established and most favorite policy? Should he appeal to them to take ground which the new Administration must occupy? And yet the complaint was that they were carrying out that policy which they had deliberately adopted and consistently pursued, with intentions as sincere and patriotic, and motives as pure, he trusted, as the new Administration would adopt its measures. It seemed to him, therefore, that the lecture of the honorable Senator was ungenerous; for what he asked was, that they, by their actions, should take back the prominent measure of the present Administration; should undo what they had done; and should reverse the policy by which they had been hitherto governed.

Mr. CLAY. I shall offer but a few words in reply. Among all the charges which at various times have been made against me, I had supposed that a want of generosity at least was not one of them. The gentleman thinks it ungenerous in me to ask—what? That he and his friends here shall obey our common masters, the people—that they shall repeal the Sub-Treasury law which the people have condemned. Why, sir, in this, I only call upon gentlemen to conform to their own doctrine, so often, so long, and so loudly proclaimed by themselves: “that the people are to govern—that the Democracy must rule—that the Democracy of numbers is the real and only sovereign—that we are all here as servants of the people—that, as Senators, we have no original rights—that we are to bow to the majesty of the people in all their pleasure.” But now, it seems that this Sub-Treasury scheme is their measure, and not the measure of the people whom they represent—and it is very ungenerous to ask them to obey their masters’ will. Why, sir, what is the honorable Senator? Able, adroit, astute, learned, ingenious as he is, is he not the servant of the people of New York—of the 400,000 voters, a majority of whom have condemned this law? And whose will is to prevail—theirs or his? I have asked him to yield to their pleasure. I hope there will be no flinching, no shuffling; but that the honorable Senator will have the goodness to act according to the principles he has so often inculcated on us—that he will bow to the “Democracy of numbers,” and conform himself to what his constituents require. This measure of the Sub-Treasury was, as I have understood, the one constant theme of the gentleman’s eloquence from the shores of the Atlantic to the borders of the St. Lawrence—that was the issue he continually made—that was the issue on which his State cast her vote—she has condemned his favorite measure—and yet now he considers it ungenerous in me to ask him to abandon what his own constituents condemn! Far from it. I am not the counsellor of the honorable Senator or his friends; but I will tell what I would do. So help me God, on my sacred honor, I would move to repeal the Sub-Treasury law. I would not say that I had changed my opinion—my pride of principle would prevent that—but, finding the measure not acceptable to my constituents, I would conform to their will. Where on the whole face of the globe does not public sentiment exact obedience to its will? Is it in Russia? No, no. The Autocrat himself is bound to yield to its behests, and so in fact he has done. Where? I ask again. In Turkey? No. The Grand Signior is obliged to submit as much as any other despot. We are charged with a want of generosity because we have asked the Senator to bow to this common law of our nature—a law that rules the whole civilized world!

I have now a few remarks to make on the question raised by the honorable Senator respecting the elective franchise. Why he has risen to discuss in so elaborate a manner a mere opinion of mine, thrown out without argument, I do not know. He is too acute and practised a legislator not to know that the manner of putting a question, of itself, often decides it. The Senator asks, what right this Federal Government has to prescribe for a State who shall vote for her rulers? It has none—it pretends to none. But this case of unnaturalized foreigners is an exception to the otherwise universal exercise of the State sovereignty. The exception applies here. An alien is not a citizen of a State, nor is he one of “the people of a State,” and therefore he is not included in the words which the Senator read from the Constitution. The question would be more correctly stated to be, what right has any State to perform that process of naturalization which is exclusively confided to the General Government? But he asks, who has a right to contest the constitutionality of the Constitution of the State of Michigan. I say to him, you have; every man has who lives under the Constitution of this Union. If a State Constitution declares that aliens may vote, then their votes may affect the composition of the House of Representatives, or of the Senate, and so eventually the question might come into these bodies in judging, as they respectively have a right to judge, of the qualifications of persons returned as members of the two Houses.

The Senator supposes as a case possible, that Congress should refuse to pass any naturalization law, and he asks, what is then to be the condition of large bodies of emigrants to this country? There are two answers to be given to this question: First, if Congress should fail to pass naturalization laws, it fails to do its express duty; a duty to which it is bound under the Constitution. Congress has passed such laws, and I presume it always will. There may be a difference as to the time to be prescribed as a probationary period, but there can be no doubt as the obligation of Congress to fix some rule.

But there is yet another answer. If Congress fails to make provision on the subject, then the right reverts and accrues to each State, exactly as it would accrue should Congress neglect to pass a uniform bankrupt law. But for another clause in the Constitution which declares that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, but for that, every State would have the right. There is no such obstacle in relation to naturalization. I have no desire to press this matter; but if the gentleman is very desirous of an abstract argument on this point, I am ready. It is not necessary, however, to enter into it; my only purpose was to enter a caveat against the doctrine advanced by him, as being, in my judgment, not constitutional. The right to vote implies citizenship, necessarily, essentially, although the converse of the proposition does not apply: then comes in the State authority; but the State has no authority to confer the elective franchise on any foreigner who is not a constituent portion of the people of the State—who is not a member of our political community—who is not one of the people of the United States. That incorporation of aliens into our society is an office confided, and wisely confided to Congress alone. A State may confer any other privileges it pleases—allow foreigners to hold and transmit lands; but it cannot make a citizen of a foreigner—it cannot make an alien my fellow-citizen, without the consent of our common Government. Nor can it invest him with those privileges, the existence and exercise of which necessarily imply the existence of citizenship, I protest against the right of any State, by its separate action, to disturb the balance of political power between the States, or to affect the political condition of the people of other States.

The Senator seems to think it easy, after the 4th of March next, to get rid of this new pre-emption law should in now pass, and he seems delighted, he appears to chuckle at the thought that he has got hold of a little popular measure; and that it will be a difficult matter to repeal it. Why, sir, I should think that after setting land traps for the people for these twelve years past and all in vain, the Senator and his party would not be so very sanguine in their expectations of the success of a new one. You have had all these traps for the popular favor for a period now of twelve years, and what have you got by them? About as much as you are likely to get hereafter: you have got four out of the nine land States! The more traps you set, the fewer States you will catch. And now, in conclusion, if I might be allowed to give to the gentleman and his friends my sincere, and I hope unobtrusive advice, I would remind them all that, in the long run and on the great scale in politics and in private life, HONESTY is the best policy.

Mr. WRIGHT said he would not protract the debate. With the argument he was content, as the honorable Senator had not materially referred to it.

In the closing remark of the Senator, that “honesty was the best policy in politics, as in private life,” he heartily agreed with him; and however the past might have been, he earnestly hoped that the maxim might be the Senator’s constant rule of action in the long and prosperous life he wished him.

To a single position which the honorable and learned gentleman had laid down, he must enter his earnest dissent; and but for that, and the feat that silence on his part might be tortured into assent, he might have felt at liberty to omit this entire reply. The position was that a non-user of a power, expressly granted to this Government in the Constitution, operated to confer that power, and the exercise of it, upon the States. To such a position he could not assent, nor could he permit his silence to be construed as assent to a doctrine which seemed to him so subversive of the very theory of written constitutions.

As to the remarks of the Senator in relation to the expression of the people of the country at the late elections, on the subject of the Independent Treasury measure, he had nothing to add to what had formerly passed between them upon that point. They had then differed as to what the verdict of the people, at the late elections, had decided upon that point; and it was not likely that further discussion between them would lessen those differences. It was enough for him to know that a new party was in power; and if they repealed that measure, he hoped they would replace it by one which would be wiser and better, and more acceptable to the people.

Mr. LINN addressed the Senate at some length in reply to Mr. CLAY.

After a few words from Mr. HUBBARD, the debate was again adjourned, and the bill was informally passed over.

REMARKS OF MR. ANDERSON, OF MAINE,

In the House of Representatives, December 30, 1840
—On the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of Mr. SHEPARD, repealing the pension act of 1837 had been agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON of Maine desired to inquire of the honorable member from Massachusetts, if the bill he intended to offer as an amendment to the bill now under consideration, should the vote of yesterday be reconsidered, was the bill agreed upon by the Committee on Naval Affairs yesterday. Mr. READ replied, that it was the bill adopted by the committee, with an additional section, extending to all the widows and children now on the pension list, the same amount of pension they now receive, for the further period of five years.

Mr. ANDERSON then stated, that the committee had unanimously agreed upon a bill, regulating and defining the future distribution of navy pensions, and had instructed him to improve the first opportunity of presenting it to the House, and also to ask that it be made the special order for some early day in the session—a duty which he should not fail to perform at the earliest moment; and he was satisfied, that the protracted discussion which this bill and amendment had produced, would predispose the House to a prompt consideration of the measure.

He had made this inquiry and this statement, in order that the House might fully understand the true position of this case. It seemed to him, that the argument with which the amendment of his friend from North Carolina was originally met, was at least in a fair way to be entirely removed; for after a three days’ debate upon the expediency of repealing this obnoxious law of 1837, which was the substance of his amendment, it could not seriously be contended that the House were acting with any inconsiderate haste, or that members could not vote understandingly upon it. Sir, if a tithe of the discussion which this motion has occasioned, had been bestowed upon this most extraordinary act of 1837, no one will pretend that it could have had the slightest chance of passing; and it has excited the astonishment of every one familiar with the operation of that act, that, in a body where every question provokes discussion and debate, a measure so important in its consequences could have gone through the House without question or opposition. I recollect inquiring of the honorable member from Massachusetts, who generally bestows so watchful and vigilant a care over every thing connected with the naval service, how this most extravagant and ruinous bill could have escaped his observation. He gave me substantially the same account he has now given to the House. I put the same question to another distinguished member of the committee from the State of Delaware, not now a member of the House, and received from him a similar answer.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE] also a member of the committee, had informed us that he was engaged in other inquiries, and knew nothing of it. How much good may have resulted to the country from his investigations into other supposed abuses of the Government, I pretend not to say. We have, in that part of the country from which I come, a homely maxim; "that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure;" and I cannot but think it unfortunate for the public interests, that these gentlemen who were then on the committee, could not have found time to look a little more carefully into this measure, emanating as it did from their own committee.

But, sir, the mischief has been done, and under the operation of this law of 1837, entitled an "Act for the more equitable administration of the navy pension fund" this magnificent fund of nearly $1,200,000 has been entirely exhausted, and this enormous list of pensions is now to be fastened upon the public Treasury, unless this law is now repealed, or some other measure adopted which shall limit and restrain the bounty of the Government. By the operation of this and other pension laws, persons have been included as beneficiaries of this fund, whose claims for pensions rest upon the most flimsy and unfounded pretences. Not only have you given a retrospective operation to this act of 1837, thereby giving to officers now in the navy, and to the widows of those deceased, many of whom were in affluent circumstances, enormous sums, to some of them as much as $20,000 at a payment; but you have given to these now in service, pensions for life, and there are officers holding a high rank in the navy, now receiving their full pay, and yet drawing pensions for total disability—a degree of lavish liberality, to which I will venture to say, the legislation of no country upon earth can present a parallel.

In the remarks I made upon the amendment proposed to be reconsidered a few days since, I alluded to some of the abuses which had grown out of this law. I have since ascertained, that thirty-eight officers, now in service, and receiving full pay, have been placed upon the pension list by the operation of that act, and are now receiving both pension and pay.

Sir, it is time to stop this gross perversion of the public charity, and I trust that the facts developed by this discussion, will lead to a speedy arrangement of this whole matter, upon principles of just and reasonable economy. I voted yesterday for the amendment of the member from North Carolina, not because I believed it would remedy the folly of the past, or afford any sufficient protection for the future, but because I would not refuse to vote for the repeal of an obnoxious law, and because, in making the first appropriation from the public Treasury to pay these claims, I would couple with it something which should evince a determination on the part of Congress to retrace its steps in this matter, and return to a sounder and better policy. There is a difference of opinion as to the operation of the repeal; and though some gentlemen seem to apprehend that it will at once strike from the pension lists all pensions established under it, others entertain a contrary opinion. The Secretary of the Navy, in his annual report of last year, fully expresses the opinion that it will not disturb existing rights. Even if it did so, there are other laws behind it, which, excepting the retrospective operation, are almost as bad; and the repeal of this act of 1837, revives the act of 1834, which is nearly as comprehensive and profuse in its provisions as the other, limiting, however, the pensions in all cases to the term of five years. The only adequate remedy is in the enactment of a bill which shall limit and define all pensions now established, and hereafter granted. Such a bill, embodying the views of the committee, will be presented. This bill, with the exception of the section I have referred to, expresses the unanimous sense of the committee, has been considered with great care, and I hope will be adopted by the House; it is just and liberal to those who have really suffered in the service of the country, and provides a limited gratuity to the families of those who have lost their lives in the performance of their duties. It, however, gives no pension to those already receiving pay from the Government, and limits to a reasonable extent the amount of arrearages to which the applicants shall be entitled.

Upon one point, the committee, during the three years that I have had the honor to belong to it, have been entirely united—and that is, in condemning the provisions of the act of '37. They have at former sessions reported bills providing for its repeal; the Senate have also passed bills to the same effect, and every gentleman who has spoken on either side, during this debate, seems equally hostile to it. Why, then, should we hesitate to repeal it, even if the process be a little irregular or unusual?

Mr. A. said he had regretted that this debate had assumed a party character, and that gentlemen had undertaken to arraign the policy and conduct of the Secretary of the Navy and the present Administration in connection with this subject. It seemed to him that the course of the Secretary, in relation to this matter, had been not only wholly irreproachable, but highly creditable and praiseworthy. From the first entrance of Mr. Paulding upon the duties of his office, he had admonished Congress of the effect which the operation of this act of 1837 was producing upon the navy pension fund, and earnestly and unceasingly recommended its repeal—he has repeatedly apprised us that the fund was rapidly diminishing, and would be soon entirely exhausted, and that a demand would be made upon the National Treasury to make good the deficiency. So careful has he been in the administration of this law, that he has sent cases—when for a merely nominal service in the navy, large sums would be abstracted from the fund—to Congress, with a detailed statement of the effect of their admission. These cases, one of which is now before me, were referred to the Naval Committee; but that committee, not deeming it proper to interfere with the administration of the law, declined expressing an opinion, and the claim, to the amount of ten or twelve thousand dollars, has since been established and paid. These suggestions and admonitions of the Secretary fell upon reluctant and unwilling ears. Congress failed to apply the proper remedy; and now, when we are called upon to appropriate $150,000 out of the public Treasury, to continue these payments, and the subject has forced itself upon the attention of Congress, it is neither just or fair to attempt to charge the Secretary with what he has so earnestly and necessarily labored to avert.

The member from North Carolina has given so minute and accurate an account of the origin of this Navy Pension Fund, that I do not deem it necessary particularly to advert to it. There is one point, however, upon which gentlemen seem to be laboring under a strange delusion. They seem to imagine that this fund was originally the property of those who made the captures, from the avails of which it was formed, and that the Government is now bound to reimburse its entire amount. This is a great mistake, and must proceed from an entire misconception of its origin. The amount appropriated to this fund consisted in no part of the money belonging to the captors, but was the share belonging by law to the Government, and entirely separate and distinct from that portion awarded to the officers and crew who made the captures. It was a mere gratuity at first, and if it has been improperly or improvidently applied and administered, it has not been directed to any other branch of the public service. I hope neither to see this fund reinstated, or any other similar one accumulated. If pensions or rewards are properly due to officers of the navy, let them be paid directly out of the public Treasury, and this will afford the surest corrective of extravagance and abuse. Under the view of this case which some gentlemen take, there is another class of claimants which, in my judgment, present much stronger claims upon the liberality of the Government, than those we are now considering; and I was gratified to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] bring them to the notice of the House. The widows and families of those whose personal enterprise and bravery in the private armed vessels of the United States poured millions into your Treasury, are now entirely unprovided for, the small fund of two per cent upon the amount of prize-money being long since exhausted. There are some thirty of those widows, whose husbands fell in battle on board these vessels, most of whom are in destitute circumstances, and who have been, for several sessions, entreating you to continue the small pittance heretofore granted to them, a few years longer. While you have turned a deaf ear to these meritorious petitioners, and while you have doled out your charity with the most parsimonious reluctance to the officers and soldiers of the Revolution, you have not hesitated to bestow extravagant gratuities upon those who have been continually receiving the most liberal allowances.

Sir, I repeat, that I am gratified that this subject has at length attracted the attention of the House; and that whether the vote of yesterday be reconsidered or not, the whole subject of navy pensions will be considered and revised by the House at an early period of the session.

Mr. NAYLOR said that, ever since the commencement of this debate, he had been endeavoring to get the floor for an opportunity of addressing the House. When the bill was first introduced, he thought he had something to say upon it, but all his intended observations had since been so much better given by other gentlemen, that he should not now trouble the House with what he should otherwise have submitted. Yet, inasmuch as he had been a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, he thought it due to himself to explain his position in relation to the subject, and thus place himself right before both his friends and enemies. He hoped the vote of yesterday would be reconsidered. How did the matter at present stand? The first section of the bill, which had been passed, provided for the payment of pensions accruing under the law of 1837, as well as under other pension laws. It provided over $150,000 for this purpose. But what next? After the House had wisely enacted this appropriation for the express purpose of carrying the provisions of the act of 1837 into effect, then it had immediately taken another step and declared that the very law it had provided to fulfil was a bad law in toto, and should be at once repealed! In this there was not only a gross inconsistency, but there was something else, which the whole history of the passage of the act of 1837 would exhibit. What was its history?

The subject of navy pensions had occupied Congress almost the whole of the last session. A bill had been passed in the Senate and sent to the House, where it had been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. That committee acted on the bill. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. ANDERSON] in the eloquent and very sensible speech which he had just made, had told the House what the committee had done. They had reported a bill, and what was its effect? To annihilate the law of 1837! Not at all; but to continue many of its provisions in full force. It went to continue the bill which had yesterday been repealed. But was that hasty repeal an act of wise and prudent legislation? If a man had an inflamed arm, would he, to get rid of the inflammation, cut his arm off? So if there existed in the State a defective statute, in part sound and wholesome, and in part injurious, to get rid of the injurious feature, must a wise Legislature destroy that which was good and wise, and which the justice and the glory of the country demanded? The bill which the gentleman from Maine had presented as the result of the deliberations of the Naval Committee, went to continue so much of the act of 1837 as was sound and wholesome, while it cut off only that portion of it which was unsound and was injuring the body politic.

And such was the general history of the course of legislation. No act was perfect at its first enactment: such laws as were perfect, or at all near to perfection, had become so by the progressive wisdom and emendation of centuries. The law of 1837 might be very imperfect, but it never would be improved by knocking it on the head.

PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION BILL.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE—Concluded.

WEDNESDAY, January 6, 1841.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up, the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. PRENTISS, of Vermont, as a substitute for the whole bill, as follows:

"Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following: That every actual settler on any of the public lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished, except such as are hereinafter reserved, being the head of a family, or over twenty-one years of age, who was in possession and a house-keeper, by personal residence thereon, at the time of passing this act, and for four months next preceding, shall be entitled to a pre-emption in the purchase of the land so settled upon, not exceeding one quarter section, of the minimum price now established by law."

Mr. CLAY of Ky. and Mr. WRIGHT having submitted their views of the subject, as published on Tuesday—

Mr. LINN rose to notice so much of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] as referred to what Mr. L. had said on a former day, in regard to the application of force to carry into effect the prohibitions of a pre-emption law. Mr. L. had then expressed the opinion that it was physically impossible to remove by force those who are usually termed "squatters" from the public domain. He had often expressed that opinion here and elsewhere. It was a settled conclusion of his mind; and he now put it to the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY] whether, were he in the executive chair, he would wield the military force of this Government in an endeavor to dispossess them? He should like to see the man that would avow it. The orders might be issued, but the officers of the army never would nor could carry them out. They would, in the first place, be incompetent to do it. On this subject it might be sufficient to advert to what had been said, and said so well, the other day by his friend the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEVIER.] Such orders had once been given, and the officers attempted to remove the settlers in that quarter of the Union, and did remove them from Lovely's purchase, which had been wrenched from the Territory of Arkansas by a treaty with some tribe of Indians from an old State, but no sooner had the officers turned their backs than the squatters again returned upon the lands which they claimed. Their houses had been burnt; they rebuilt them. They were driven off a second time; and a second time they came back; and thus they fought it out, until at last the Government gave up the contest, and gave each of them 320 acres of land: while such of them as had obeyed and gone off the land, got, in the end, but 160 acres by a bill which passed the Senate a few days since. Now if the power of the Government could not enforce its prohibition laws in the single State of Arkansas, then a feeble and dependant Territory, how was it likely to do it along the whole frontier from Lake Superior to the Sabine river? Before such an operation was attempted, you must augment your army; for, sir, the whole military force of the country, as it now stands, would be too weak to accomplish it. The idea, to those acquainted with the real state of the case, had in it something ludicrous. It would be an amusing spectacle, to be sure, to see our gallant and chivalric officers of the United States army engaged in driving off women and children, while their husbands and fathers were in the thickets behind, ready to fire upon them with their rifles! They would every one be shot down the moment they attempted such a thing; showing, conclusively that there is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous. The truth was, the law prohibiting such settlement was practically a dead letter, and so it must forever remain. At first, there had been no law to restrain our people from settling where they would, on unoccupied public land. The first law on the subject was passed in 1807, and was made against those who claimed lands under the French and Spanish grants; and the object was to prevent those who had only inchoate title under such grants from going on the lands they claimed either to cultivate or survey, and a most unjust law it was. Mr. L. would speak with respect of the legislation of Congress, but such was his opinion of that law, as can be demonstrated in a moment.

And he now repeated his position, that it was utterly useless to pass laws to restrain the American people from going forward to settle on the public lands. Congress might pass such edicts as often as they pleased, but they never could carry out one of them. As to the grant of pre-emption, there were entire districts settled wholly under such grants, which it was an important policy to bring into market. They would bring millions of dollars into the Treasury for the benefit of General Harrison's Administration, and, but for our pre-emption laws, these districts would have been settled very gradually.

The Senator seemed earnestly to deprecate a change in our land system. Why, the land system of the United States had been a system of change from the beginning. Up to 1820, it was a credit system—then it was changed to a cash system, which was in its effects a pre-emption system, because the payment of a few dollars enabled the poor man to take possession of a choice piece of land, and, by his labor and exertions, to pay the remainder of the money, by instalments, in five years. This was easily done by the real cultivators of the soil, and it certainly was not for their benefit that any change was made in the system, but almost exclusively for those who bought on speculation. In 1830, a new pre-emption law was passed, which changed the system again in many particulars. Mr. L. said he should be sorry to see that part of the system which regulated the survey of the lands altered in any respect. But as to the general principle of pre-emption itself, it was only carrying out the original plan of the old thirteen States of the Revolution—which plan enabled them essentially to battle successfully with the mightiest power in the world. This was the original principle in regard to our new lands. Virginia had her pre-emption laws, and most of the lands in Kentucky had been sold at but 12½ cents an acre. By the old laws of Pennsylvania, and, he believed, of most of the other Atlantic States, a mere nominal settlement was all that was required. The public lands were not then expected to yield any amount of money; that was not the object; the object was to get them settled. Nor would they ever yield the Government a dollar but for that line of settlers who went into the wild woods and preceded what was falsely called "good society." When the second line came forward, they were very glad to find the wilderness opened for their progress, and some decent log cabins ready built to their hands. The same system, in substance, though its form might be slightly modified, must continue to prevail. Mr. L. defied gentlemen to change it. Much as the American people respected the law, they never would consent, for one minute, to see their hardy, enterprising fellow-citizens turned off by a file of soldiers from the land that had received all its value from their toil.

He hoped gentlemen from the East and from the South would not forget the circumstances under which their own forefathers had commenced the settlement of those portions of the Union. He hoped they would not forget, either, the incubus which the legislation of Congress had imposed on the settlers of the West by congregating on their frontier a vast body of resentful savage warriors, whose presence, power, and angry passions were as a smouldering volcano to all white settlers in their vicinity. Those settlers were fully sensible of their danger; and they wished to fortify and strengthen themselves against it by every means in their power.

er. They wanted to see coming in among their forests new emigrants from all parts of the world. It was a matter of comparative indifference to them whether those who constituted this valuable accession to their security were naturalized American citizens or not. The moment the foreigner settled by their side, he became a sharer in the common danger; and the consciousness of this, together with his hardy and adventurous habits, made him at once an efficient soldier. Many years since, the General Government adopted a system, a weak and unwise system, in Mr. LINN's apprehension, in regard to a certain portion of the public domain which contained lead ore. In the year 1822 or 1823, the Government invited, by proclamation, all who chose to come there and dig for the mineral, that their labor, through a tax upon the lead, might constitute a source of revenue to the Government. Multitudes of hardy miners from the old world and from the new availed themselves of the opportunity, and were settled on the lead lands at the time that Black Hawk and his party crossed the Mississippi with his band of savage followers, and placed himself between Galena and the adjacent new settlements in Illinois and Wisconsin; and, but for the presence and the hardy bravery of these miners, the entire frontier would perhaps have been laid waste by the tomahawk before the regular army could have been concentrated for their protection. Yet these defenders of our infant settlements, of the helpless families of the inhabitants of the frontier, were "squatters," were the "intruders and trespassers" of whom some gentlemen spoke in such injurious language. Their presence was the means of saving millions of money and thousands of lives. It became men situated as were the people on our Western border to look to all sources for an augmentation of their strength. Should the Indian tribes who had been collected on the frontier once combine in an attack upon the country of the whites, the whole military force of the United States could offer but a feeble resistance to their incursions, but would be driven before them like chaff before the wind. The gentleman from Kentucky on the left [Mr. CRITTENDEN] had spoken of these Indians as a set of poor, naked, half-armed savages, and had insinuated that there was not the slightest danger to be apprehended from any thing they could do. But was it not the duty of that gentleman to have investigated somewhat further the actual state of the facts before he spoke thus slightly of the dangers of an Indian invasion on defenceless women and children? On the frontier of Missouri and Arkansas, chiefly west of Arkansas, there was at this hour a body of 26,000 Indian warriors, prepared at any time to take the field. They were now, it was true, receiving annuities under treaties with the United States; but let these annuities be paid off, and then the only chain which bound them to us, or rather which held back their savage thirst of slaughter and revenge, would be gone. What restrained them now? In part the receipt of their annuities, and in part the dread of the whites. But would this always be sufficient? All who knew the Indian nature knew that war was their element, their pride, their chief delight. Nothing availed to keep Indians quiet but a visible force. It was vain to tell them of a force they did not see; it must be before their eyes—visible and tangible. A people like this, with 26,000 warriors on the lines, and many thousands more within striking distance, were they to be restrained by the 1,500 or 2,000 troops which the Government had on that frontier? The idea was preposterous. Besides, suppose our dispute with Great Britain, or some dispute with another foreign power, should issue in war—had they no access to those Indians? And when organized for war, would they not form the most efficient body of men of the kind ever brought into the field? They most assuredly would. Those who doubted this knew little of the matter.

What had been our past experience? All the language in which some indulged about Indians being cowards was an error, a great error. Had our settlements found them cowards? The truth was that, man to man, these Indian warriors were equal to any troops upon earth, in bravery and determined resolution; in dexterity, in facility of movement, in wily stratagem, in the power of sne-cessful ambuscade, they were superior, far superior. Exposed to neighbors like these, was it unreasonable that the people of Missouri and Arkansas were anxious to invite among them all the settlers they could get?—that they should be in favor of pre-emption laws?—especially when it was remembered that those laws did but carry out the great and pervading principle on which the entire continent had been in the first instance settled? The French and Spanish Government asked no money from the settlers of their wild lands—all they demanded was inhabitation and cultivation. They wanted men—farmers, cultivators of the soil. And then, to encourage a spirit of devotion to the public good, they rewarded meritorious services by additional land grants. Many of their colonies had thus been planted. Even as a mere financial measure, the present bill would do much toward filling the coffers of the coming Administration. The new lands on the River Platte district alone, when brought into market, would bring into the Treasury a million and a half of dollars.

There was another point to which the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had alluded, viz: the prospect of increased revenue from the lands, by a graduation of their price. Look at the so much vaunted land system, and see what had been its practical operation. The amount of land which a settler could take up was at first 160 acres: from this it had been reduced to 80 acres. Did this lessen the land sales? No, it had greatly increased them. The principle had been pushed still further, and the quantity reduced to 40 acres. And did not a similar result follow? Were not the sales increased? And as this had been the effect of lessening the quantity, why should it be doubted that a reduction of the price of inferior lands long neglected would have the like consequence? The Senator seems to think it very unreasonable, ridiculous, to hold such an opinion—it was his opinion. He believed that the result, if ever the experiment is made, will prove it. He considered the opposite opinion supremely ridiculous. General Harrison was held up in Missouri and elsewhere in the West and Southwest as a pre-emption man. Votes were claimed for him expressly on that ground. He was spoken of by his friends as "a log cabin man," and we were told that he would extend his favor to the inhabitants of log cabins all over the United States. If left to himself—if permitted to act from the promptings of his own judgment, and according to his personal knowledge of Western life, it is probable he may; but it seemed to him, from what he could gather of his sayings and doings, (and they seem something like the inarticulate whisperings of the ancient prophetic shrines,) that it is very hard to conjecture what his course in this or any other respect will be. But it had been charged upon Mr. Van Buren that his opinions in relation to the public lands had undergone a change, from the influence of certain individuals that had access to his private ear. What had the settlers to expect from Gen. Harrison, after the bold avowals that had been made that day by a person that might be considered a power behind the throne greater than the throne itself? We shall soon see.

He knew they were under great disadvantages at the present time for bringing forward this measure, or any other of a liberal nature, in regard to the public lands. Missouri, Louisiana, Wisconsin, Arkansas, and a few other States and Territories, are left to fight this great battle alone, as the new States are rapidly becoming old States, in relation to the public domain. It is the interest of the old States, as they seem to think, to advance the price of the public lands. Pre-emption may suit a temporary purpose, by filling the exhausted coffers of the Government; but their abiding, permanent interest, is to hold up these lands, and get a high price for them, to go to the immediate filling the State treasuries.

But looking to this question in an enlarged national point of view, it seemed to him that every reasonable encouragement should be given to the extension of our settlements, to aid in the development of our resources. Under the invitation of the Government adverted to, the extensive and fertile regions in upper Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa, were raridly peopled. The flourishing and populous towns of Galena, Dubuque, and many others, sprung into existence like magic, and in a few years the wilderness was made to blossom like a garden. Look for one moment at the results. This people dug from the bowels of the earth hidden riches, and from that time have increased the production of lead until it amounts to fifteen or twenty millions of pounds annually; being enough, perhaps, to render us independent of foreign powers for this important article so necessary to our defence in time of war. And, sir, Massachusetts and other manufacturing States upon the Atlantic border, where labor is cheap, are as much or more interested in thus producing national wealth as we are, as they furnish manufactured articles in return for raw material. His own constituents (he said) had also contributed in this way to the sum of national wealth by the annual production of several million pounds of lead, much of which has been made from the public lands or private property acquired under different pre-emption laws. They were now turning their attention, with energy, to the cultivation of hemp; and such was the value of the article for its fineness, silkiness, and strength, that it commanded in the Boston market $30 per ton more than Kentucky, and was now beginning to be imported into the State of Kentucky for the purpose of being wrought into cotton bagging. He understood from undoubted authority that it is stronger than the best Russian hemp. This hemp was raised upon lands the title to most of which was acquired under the operation of the pre-emption laws, or by squatters, who are now awaiting the passage of one. This was important for the support of an important arm of national defence, viz: the navy. How was it that Daniel Boone commenced the settlement of Kentucky? There were then no such laws as our pre-emption laws, taking from the settler $1 25 per acre for his lands; no law to restrain him from the wilderness. He roamed and squatted where he pleased, and no one knew better than his friend [Mr. CRITTENDEN] what had been the results. Driven from Kentucky by injustice, and impelled by his love of danger, he sought a lonely spot in Missouri, on the extreme frontier of civilization, and squatted on the public lands, and contributed to its defence. It seemed as if his fearless spirit still hovered over what was once his favorite haunt, and pointed his descendants to the shores of the Western Ocean; and these descendants are now requesting Mr. LINN to use his influence to get them appointments in any expedition fitted out for the Oregon Territory. It was to be regretted that this old man, this hardy and adventurous pioneer, could not have lived a few years longer to see this broad Union stretching itself from one great ocean to the other.

Boon was a living type, an impersonation as it were, of the spirit which had settled this continent. Mr. L. rejoiced to see the same spirit in full force and action to this hour. God forbid he should ever see it stopped; but that could not be done. The whole force of the Government could not stop it; he defied them to do it. Looking at the whole course of the American Government and nation in relation to the public domain and commerce, it seemed to him to be governed chiefly by an eye to dollars and cents. He saw how his countrymen suffered themselves to be kicked about and imposed upon; how they permitted their property to be destroyed upon the ocean and upon the land, and their citizens murdered within the very sight of our own shores. He saw their patience, their meekness, their forbearance; but what was at the bottom of it all? The dollars and cents. What a contrast did this exhibit to that prominent and admirable feature of the British system of policy, which was to protect the man, the British subject, wherever he might be! Without this, she never could have stood so long the enormities of her system. He thought that, as American citizens, we ought to feel proud while witnessing the march of the Anglo-Saxon race in its onward progress for the benefit of the human species. He would rejoice to see it surmount the rugged tops of the Rocky mountains, and, pouring over into the fertile valleys beyond, form, by its presence and its bravery, an impenetrable barrier against Great Britain on the North. Let the free race of American pioneers go onward West, carrying their love of liberty and all their free and beneficent institutions with them; and he would be the man to encourage their progress by every means within the compass of his ability, even to the utmost verge of the continent. When the bill in regard to the Oregon Territory should come up, Mr. L. hoped the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] might take the same view of the subject which he did, and that he should then enjoy all the benefit of his powerful aid. It was the State from which that Senator came, and his own native State, that first settled its lands under the system of free occupation of the public lands. They came first into the great wilderness; their fathers had had the brunt to bear; and Mr. L. hoped one day to see a noble monument erected, if not to these bold and enterprising men, at least to the noble-souled women who had followed their husbands into the wilderness, and shared their toils and dangers. Cheated they had been, and wronged in every practicable way, by the petty county court lawyers and other reptiles who were ever found haunting the precincts of a court; and now, to this hour, they were pursued by the same class of wretches—heartless speculators—who were every where prowling along our frontier, but who were not permitted by public opinion to wrong them. These advancing pioneers were made of stuff which presented a tremendous battery for the protection of the secondary class which followed in their footsteps. They hewed down the timber; they subdued and exterminated the beasts of prey; they discovered and developed the natural resources of the country; they compelled the roving Indian to recede and seek more distant hunting-grounds; they added to the national wealth; and would gentlemen forego advantages like these for the sake of making some five or six cents more an acre for the public lands? Why should not a pre-emption bill be prospective as well as retrospective? If such a law was fit and right to cure a wound after it had been made, why not adopt a measure which should cause there to be no wound? Illegal combinations of citizens for mutual support against pre-emption restrictions which they deemed oppressive there, would always be on the frontier. An army of 30,000 would be vain to suppress them. Why not supersede the cause and the temptation?

As to a distribution of the proceeds of the public domain among the States, he would give it here as his opinion that, should such a measure ever prevail, the inevitable would be that the lands would be held up from sale from year to year, until (as he had heard suggested by an honorable Senator once on that floor) their value reached $30 an acre. He greatly regretted that, by unwise and mistaken legislation, men should be strongly, irresistibly tempted, nay, compelled, to evade the law, and, still more, the attempt to enforce such law by the armed troops of the United States. Should a contest of that miserable character ever take place, no man who knew the people of the West could doubt for a moment how it must terminate.

The bill having been ordered to be printed, together with all the amendments hitherto adopted, The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 7, 1841.

The order of the day being the bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system in favor of settlers on the public lands who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon; and the question being on the following amendment offered by Mr. PRATT of Vermont, as a substitute for the whole bill:

"Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following: 'That every actual settler on any of the public lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished, except such as are hereinafter reserved, being the head of a family, or over twenty-one years of age, who was in possession and a housekeeper, by personal residence thereon, at the time of the passing of this act and for four months next preceding, shall be entitled to a pre-emption in the purchase of the land so settled upon, not exceeding one quarter-section, at the minimum price now established by law.'

Mr. HUNTINGTON addressed the Senate, in substance, as follows:

It is no part of my present purpose to discuss, at much length, the general subject of the pre-emption laws of the United States. There are two reasons which deter me from such a discussion. One is, that the indications are quite apparent that a majority of the Senate will sustain the policy of these laws in some form; and the other is, that the subject has been so often and so recently the topic of debate here, that it cannot be expected that much, if any thing, which is new or important, appertaining to it, can be suggested. I wish, however, to call the attention of the Senate—of the friends as well as of the opponents of pre-emption laws—to the peculiar, and, I think, extraordinary provisions contained in the bill before us; provisions which, when understood, I cannot believe will be adopted by this body.

That this bill, in its present shape, is an extension of the pre-emption system; that it introduces new principles, gives greater facilities, and holds out new encouragements to settlers on the public lands, is not denied. Indeed, the latter object is apparent on the face of the bill, and avowed in debate. That it will, in effect, produce an entire revolution in our whole system relating to the public lands; that it is unjust to the States collectively, and impolitic, inexpedient, and fraught with serious mischief, I have no doubt; and I propose to examine the several sections of the bill with the view of sustaining the opinion just expressed.

The bill is prospective in its operation. It does not look merely to the advantage and security of the settler, who has already gone on the public lands, in good faith, and made his improvements, and who is still there, with the intention of becoming a permanent resident, and a citizen of the State where he has settled. In this respect it differs from former pre-emption laws. They were intended to give the industrious and enterprising settler the fruit of his labor and industry, already bestowed upon the public lands, by allowing him the privilege of pre-emption. The act of 1838 confined its benefits to the actual settler of these lands, who was in possession, by personal residence on the land, at the time of the passage of this act, and for four months next preceding. Security, in the form of pre-emption, for settlements and improvements already made, was the design of that and the previous acts. This bill provides for a new class of settlers. It holds out encouragements to enter upon the public lands without right or title. It declares that the persons described in it "who shall make a settlement," &c. shall be entitled to a priority in the purchase. It invites to unlawful entries upon the public domain. It offers inducements to commit trespasses upon the property of the nation. It says to the settler, in advance, that he shall be secured in the pre-emption right to lands to which he has not the shadow of a legal or equitable claim, if he will enter upon them. It is a proclamation by the Congress of the United States, proposing not merely protection to those who are already settlers, but containing an invitation to the people of all nations to become intruders upon the public lands, and offering to secure them in the enjoyment of the fruits of their trespass. Why should there be such a departure from the principle adopted in former pre-emption laws? Why should the legislation of Congress be invoked to encourage violations of its laws, unlawful entries upon, and continued possession of its property? Why should a general request be made to settle down upon the best of the lands of the United States. Has a law holding out such inducements the sanction of any just or equitable principle? Or can it be defended on the ground of general expediency or public policy?

But to whom is this invitation given? Who are to be the objects of the bounty of the Government? Who may claim the benefit of this pre-emption law? The answer to these questions may be given by looking to the personal qualifications required of the settler, and the acts which it is necessary for him to perform. By the law of 1838, he must be the head of a family, or over twenty-one years of age, and a housekeeper. He must be an actual settler, in possession by personal residence. By the proposed act, the settler must be a white person, the head of a family, or a widow, or a single man over the age of eighteen years; he must make a settlement, inhabit and improve the land, and raise a log cabin or other dwelling thereon. To all such, from every quarter of the globe, whether aliens or citizens, and without reference to character; whether they owe allegiance to this or some other country; whether favorably disposed or hostile to our free institutions; whether good or bad inhabitants; to all, indiscriminately, is the invitation given to become freeholders and owners of real estate in this country. Is it desirable that such an unlimited offer should be made? Is it good policy to encourage every description of persons to become proprietors of our soil, and to remain such (when aliens) as long as they please to continue the subjects of a foreign power? Does this comport with that policy which seeks to perpetuate our free institutions? or with that wisdom which would encourage only the honest, the virtuous, the industrious, to become owners of lands in the nation? But this bill is not confined, as was the act of 1838, to heads of families and adults. It allows widows, and single men over the age of eighteen years, to participate in its benefits. It invites the youth of eighteen, who is under parental care and authority, whose duties to his parents have not ceased, and who is legally incompetent to make valid contracts, (except in a few cases,) to become a settler on the public lands; to leave the service and protection of his father, and select for himself a portion of the public property, and obtain a pre-emption right in it. Can such a separation of parent and child be deemed expedient? Ought encouragement to be given to such a class of settlers?

Such are the personal qualifications of the settler required by this act. I will now call the attention of the Senate to the acts to be done by him to secure to him its privileges. It is only necessary that he should "make a settlement," "inhabit and improve" the land, "and raise a log cabin or other dwelling thereon." This language is very indefinite. No clear, precise meaning is given to the words settlement, inhabitation, improvement, log cabin, or other dwelling. It is certainly open to the construction, even if it will admit of any other, that the slightest improvement, the frailest tenement, the shortest occupancy, will suffice. The bill does not provide what shall be the nature or the extent of the improvement, what the dwelling, or how long it shall be inhabited, to confer the privileges secured by it. The occupant may improve a foot of the land—may cut down a single tree—clear away a few bushes—build a rod of fence—erect the slightest possible dwelling, not larger than is sufficient to contain his person—remain on the land for a short time only—entering upon it with the rising sun, and departing from it when it sets, and then claim the benefit of pre-emption. He is not, by the words of the act, required to make a bona fide settlement and improvement. Wholly different was the law of 1838 in this respect. That provided that the settler should evince the honesty of his purpose, the sincerity of his act of settlement, the bona fides of his intention, by his being either the head of a family, or over twenty-one years of age, and also a housekeeper, by personally residing on the land at the time, and at least four months next preceding the passage of the act. This furnished some security that his design was not speculation in the public lands for his own benefit, or for others; not a fraud upon the equity of the pre-emption law; not a mere nominal improvement of the land and a temporary settlement upon it. Under that law, he could not come and go in a night; erect a building which would perish in less than a week; make a mere show of residence and improvement, and then claim the pre-emption. He was to have a family, or be over twenty-one years of age; a housekeeper; an actual settler, and this for at least four months, and down to the passage of the act. If this is somewhat indefinite, it is much less so than the proposed act. It provided some test of honesty and sincerity, and, perhaps, practically furnished, in most cases, adequate security that the settlement was made in good faith. It excluded minors: it neither broke up, nor held out inducements to destroy, the relation of parent and child, and its legal consequences.

It was the housekeeper only for whom provision was made, and such a person, it would be expected, would have a comfortable dwelling, and the time of his residence was required to be four months at least, that it might appear that he was not a mere sojourner, but that his residence was intended to be permanent. The bill under consideration contains no such salutary provisions. It opens a wide door to fraudulent settlements, and to the perversion of that equity on which, it is alleged, all pre-emption laws rest, and by reason of which supposed equity such laws have found advocates and friends. What necessity exists for this unusually loose legislation? Why should encouragement be given to fraudulent settlers? What reason can be urged sufficient to justify a law which, in its operation, will benefit mainly the speculator and rich man? Why should those who wish to force, more rapidly than heretofore, the settlement of the new States, and to increase, in a still greater ratio, their numbers, countenance a project which, so far from securing to them an industrious and permanent population, holds out inducements mainly to such as have no intention to become citizens and residents, but to use the law for the purposes of speculation; and to add to their already overgrown wealth?

The Senate will thus perceive who are the special objects of the bounty of the Government, and what acts are required of them to entitle them to receive it. It will be seen that the class is exceedingly numerous, and little else than what is tantamount to a demand of the boon is required as a preliminary to its receipt. But of what land is the settler entitled to the pre-emption? To what portions of the public land is he confined? It would seem reasonable that his right should extend, in ordinary cases, only to that quarter section on which he has settled; for his equity arises out of the fact that he has settled upon and improved the land, and there erected his dwelling. The law of pre-emption is founded on the assumed principle that it would be unjust to take from an honest and meritorious settler the fruits of his industry. To protect him, therefore, in the enjoyment of the product of his labor is the design of the law, which gives him priority in the purchase. He should, of course, unless strong reasons exist for an exception in particular cases, be restricted in the right to the property on which that labor has been bestowed. And such was the law of 1838. But in the provisions of this bill no such restriction is found. The settler is entitled "to a pre-emption in the purchase of a quantity of the public land not exceeding one quarter section, in legal subdivisions," &c. He need not confine himself to any portion of that on which he has made a settlement, provided he can find any public land, in any State or Territory, which is open to pre-emption. He may traverse the whole Western country, select the best quarter section he can find, which is not pre-occupied or reserved, and is the subject of pre-emption, and, under color and by virtue of his settlement on other land, claim the pre-emption right. Nor is he expressly limited in his selection to public lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished, or which have been surveyed. If no survey of it has been made, and perhaps if the Indian title is still outstanding, he may settle upon it. The bill provides that the settler "who shall make a settlement on any of the public lands to which the Indian title has been or shall be extinguished, whether the same be surveyed or not," shall be entitled, &c. The language is not, (as it should be,) to which the Indian title shall have been extinguished at the time of such settlement. This would confine him to such lands. And this was the law of 1838. It declared that no right of pre-emption should accrue to any person or persons in consequence of any settlement or improvement made before the extinguishment of the Indian title to the land on which such settlement or improvement was made. And the policy and justice of such a limitation is too obvious to require argument. It cannot be thought expedient to confer on these settlers or intruders the privilege of going upon your choicest lands, which are not subject to sale, and pre-occupying the best quarter sections, and thus acquiring the right of pre-emption. But this bill may be so construed as to give this privilege, provided the Indian title shall be extinguished at any time during the continuance of the pre-emption right.

This bill confers other benefits than those which have been mentioned. It gives the settler liberty to make his improvement and settlement on different quarter sections, and in such case allows him to "make choice of the quarter he will take, or take parts of each in legal subdivisions," if not prejudicial to the rights of others. What a power is here given! and what opportunity is afforded to gain priority in the purchase of the best of the public lands! The settler may, if he please, erect his dwelling on different quarter sections. He may select those which are particularly valuable in quality, or which possess important water privileges or other advantages. They may be contiguous to each other in different quarter sections. And when the period arrives that his pre-emption right is to be perfected, he may select an entire quarter section, or parts of each, shut out all other during the time allowed him to make the purchase, and thus gain priority as to one entire quarter section, or to portions of two, at his election. Can any good reason be given for such a license as this? Why should he be allowed to settle on adjoining quarter sections, and then avail himself of the peculiar privileges of both, to the exclusion of other equally meritorious settlers?

This bill also gives, in one event, the pre-emption in more than one hundred and sixty acres. For although, in the first section, it provides that the settler shall be limited to a quantity not exceeding "one quarter section, in legal subdivisions," it declares, in the 4th section, that where this quantity cannot be had entire, the entries may be made in tracts of eighty acres, or forty acres, or fractions; and when the fraction shall be more than the quantity required to complete the pre-emption, the excess shall be paid for, and the pre-emption right shall extend to the whole fraction. It will be seen that there is no prohibition to settling on a tract, where the quantity cannot be had entire; and of course nothing to prevent, in such cases, an entry in fractions; and, in case of excess, a right to more than a quarter section. It would be difficult to assign a satisfactory reason for conferring such a privilege.

Another unusual, unnecessary, and most extraordinary privilege is conferred by this bill on the settlers on the public lands. By the law of 1838, it was enacted that where more than one person had settled upon any one quarter section, each should have an equal share in it, but should have no claim to any other land by virtue of that act. The policy of this provision is quite obvious: Its justice is equally apparent. By the present bill, if two or more persons shall have settled on the same quarter section, it shall be divided between them, and the deficiency made up to each out of the contiguous vacant ground, excluding, however, from the benefit of this provision, a wilful intruder on the known claim of another. It will be seen that the pre-emption right to what is equivalent to a whole quarter section attaches in favor of each settler, where there is more than one, on the same quarter section; and it is to be remembered that there is no prohibition to an amicable settlement and improvement, by two or more, of the same. I now ask the attention of the Senate to the consequences which may follow from the adoption of this provision, especially when taken in connection with other provisions to which I have adverted. Any number of individuals may associate to improve the same quarter section. The head of a family who has several sons over eighteen years of age may put them on such a section, and obtain for himself, through them, or they may obtain for themselves, each, one hundred and sixty acres. Combinations of persons, in any numbers, may be formed, for the very purpose of acquiring the prior right of purchase of this quantity. Hundreds may associate from every nation upon earth, enter upon the same quarter section, erect a building just sufficient to hold their persons, improve the smallest portion of the land, and for the shortest time, and then each has a lawful claim to what is equal to a quarter section. This would indeed give an inchoate right to a very large quantity of the public lands. It would spread over immense tracts of the national domain the beneficial lien of pre-emption. It would lock it up from the enterprise of others. It would secure it, for a limited period, from the claims of all others. It might, if carried to its extreme limits, bind most of the valuable lands of the U. States, which are subject to the operation of the bill, with the strong cord of pre-emption, and which no law could break. And will the Senate adopt a measure producing such results? Will they open the public lands to adventurers of any and every character from every portion of the world, and allow them to unite in making a fraudulent settlement, and obtain, as the fruits of it, a quarter section for each? Do our Western friends desire such privileges to be given, indiscriminately, to those who choose to avail themselves of them? Will this give to the new States a healthy, sound, industrious, and permanent population? Is this for the benefit of the poor man who seeks a home in the Far West, builds his log cabin, improves the ground, and in good faith intends to become a permanent settler?

This bill is open, however, to objections even of a more serious and important character than any which have been mentioned. It may be doubted whether the exemption from the operation of the bill of lands "reserved and appropriated," is sufficiently explicit and comprehensive to reach portions of the public lands which ought not to be subject to its provisions. I mean such reservations to Indians by treaty stipulations as have been since purchased of them by the United States, and which, I am informed, embrace some of the most valuable of our lands. Whether all these lands are reserved from sale by act of Congress, or by order of the President, or have been appropriated for some purpose, I do not know. I invite the attention of Senators who are better acquainted with this part of the subject than I am, to this provision in the bill.

The bill does not in fact afford, nor does it even profess to afford, any security against settlements made for the sole purpose of benefiting speculators and rich men. While its passage is urged as being a reasonable and just provision for bona fide settlers—as encouraging the growth and prosperity of the new States, and thus beneficial to the whole Union—its provisions are not confined to such persons, nor so drawn as to produce such results. If it should become a law, settlers on the public lands may avail themselves of it without any intention of becoming permanent residents. Speculators and men of wealth may employ any number of persons to go upon these lands, who shall have the qualifications and perform the acts required by the bill, and obtain all the benefits of the pre-emption system. Mere intruders and rich men, citizens of other States, may combine to give the latter the privileges intended solely for the former, and the public lands thus become the prey of the speculator instead of being the home of the industrious settler. No questions are asked as to the intention and motives with which a settlement is made; no inquiry is to be instituted with reference to the question whether the settler goes upon the land for his own benefit or for the benefit of another. If he is embraced by the description in the first section of the bill, the right of pre-emption attaches, although he declares that his residence is intended to be temporary, and to enable another to enjoy the benefits of the act through such a settlement. Will the Senate adopt such a principle in any pre-emption law? Will its incorporation into our land system increase the wealth, the population, the resources of any of the new States? Will it be just to honest settlers, or to the States collectively? The framers of the act of 1838 provided against the mischief to which I have called the attention of the Senate. That act required of the person claiming the benefit of it, to make oath that he entered upon the land which he claimed in his own right and exclusively for his own use and benefit; that he had not, directly or indirectly, made any agreement or contract in any way or manner with any person or persons by which the title he might acquire from the Government of the United States should inure to the use or benefit of any one except himself, or to convey or transfer the land or title to any other person or persons at any subsequent time; making false swearing in the premises perjury, and working a forfeiture of the money paid for the land; and declaring all grants or conveyances made in pursuance of any such agreement or contract void, except in the hands of a purchaser in good faith, for a valuable consideration, without notice. Such was the guard thrown around the Government and honest settlers, to protect both against fraudulent settlements. No such protection, nor any other, is afforded by this bill. If it should pass in its present form, settlements may be made, not for the use and benefit of those who make them, but for those who have no other interest in the land than to make gains by the sale of it at an advanced price, and who are to be encouraged in such speculations by being invested by the Government of the United States with the privilege of pre-emption. Surely such log cabin settlers have no peculiar claims upon the bounty or to the favor of Congress.

To these objections to the bill is to be added another. Every question arising under this act, both of law and of fact, touching the construction of this law, the proof of settlement and improvement, and all questions in relation to pre-emption claims, or between claimants to the same quarter section, are to be settled, summarily and definitely, by the register and receiver of the district, agreeably to the rules which may be prescribed by and under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. No judicial tribunal is to hear and determine these questions. No court is to construe and declare the law, and no jury is to pass upon the facts. The register and receiver are to proceed summarily, and decide finally. Ought such a power as this to be vested where this bill proposes to place it? And ought not the rules which are to govern in the determination of the many and various points which will necessarily arise under such a law, to be established by Congress? At least, would it not be prudent to make some general regulations, which would reach most of the cases which would require to be settled? Or, should not the power to make rules on the subject (if given to any Executive officer) be vested directly in the Secretary of the Treasury, to whose department the administration of the public lands belongs, and on whom, rather than on any other individual, the responsibility of passing such regulations ought to rest?

This bill also provides for a permanent pre-emption system. It is to continue until repealed or modified by further legislation. It is not, like the act of 1838, limited to two years. It does not expire by its own limitation, but it requires the action of Congress to repeal it, if it should be ascertained by experience to be productive of mischief. Why should we abandon, in this respect, the path marked out by our predecessors? Especially, why should we make such a bill as this, containing so many novel provisions, and which is a new and untried experiment in our land system, permanent as well as prospective?

I have thus, Mr. President, referred briefly to the provisions of the bill now under consideration. It is a bill creating a prospective pre-emption system; it encourages intrusions upon the public lands in advance, and holds out inducements to persons to become settlers upon the public domain without right and against law; it gives the pre-emption right to minors as well as adults, to aliens as well as citizens, to the subjects of a foreign prince, owing him allegiance, as well as to our native or naturalized citizens; it invites all such, without respect of character or country, to become proprietors of our soil; it requires, perhaps, only the form and shape of a dwelling to be erected, an improvement of a small portion of the land, a residence of a few hours only, to entitle the settler to a priority of purchase; and of land other than the quarter section on which he has settled; and possibly of land to which the Indian title may not have been extinguished at the time of the settlement; it gives him the important privilege of selecting portions of two quarter sections under certain circumstances, and of more than one hundred and sixty acres in specified cases; it confers the right of pre-emption to one hundred and sixty acres on each one of any number, however great, who may settle on the same quarter section; it is doubtful whether valuable lands are exempted from its operation, to which it ought not to apply; it affords no security against fraudulent settlements, but gives to the individual who settles, for the benefit and at the instigation of the speculator and the rich man, the same privileges which are conferred on the bona fide settler, who enters solely for his own benefit, and exclusively in his own right; it refers every question of law and fact, in the construction and execution of the law, to the register and receiver, to be decided summarily and finally by them, under rules established by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and such a bill as this is to be made a permanent law.

If it should become a law, unless I greatly mistake, it will produce some or all of these results:

It will operate injuriously upon the interests of the honest bona fide settler, whom alone the friends of the bill seek to protect.

It will greatly encourage and enrich speculators and rich men.

It will give the selection of the best lands to those who have no interest to become actual residents.

It will encourage fraudulent nominal settlers.

It will eventually abolish the sales of lands at auction.

It will convert the system of cash sales into sales upon credit.

It will greatly reduce the proceeds of the public lands, and thus unjustly deprive the Union of the full value of its property.

For such a bill (even were I in favor of any pre-emption law) I cannot and shall not vote. And now, Mr. President, having adverted to the prominent features of the bill, and stated my objections to its provisions, I have only to add that I shall vote for the amendment of my friend from Vermont, [Mr. PRENTISS], because it reaches and obviates some of these objections; and when that amendment is disposed of, I shall offer other amendments, with the view of carrying out more fully the design and object which those who are the friends of this bill propose to accomplish by its passage, viz. the encouragement of honest bona fide settlers on the public lands, by giving them a pre-emption right in a quarter section of land on which they have settled.

Mr. HUBBARD addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The immediate question now before the Senate involves the entire rejection of this permanent prospective system, and the substitution of the proposition submitted by the Senator from Vermont.

I am, and I trust ever shall be, in favor of the pre-emptive principle. Is it just, it is right in itself, and deserves our unqualified support. It has long commanded the co-operation of popular feeling and of public sentiment. Viewing this subject in the light I do, I should be faithless to my trust, and regardless of my public duty, should I withhold my support from this measure—founded, as I believe it to be, upon the great principle of immutable justice—calculated, as I believe it to be, to advance the best interests of the Confederacy, and to secure the happiness, the confidence, and well being of the settlers of our public domain.

The immediate question, as I have before stated, before the Senate, is the proposition submitted by the Senator from Vermont, "To strike out the whole bill after the enacting clause, and to substitute the following:"

"That every actual settler on any of the public lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished, except such as are hereinafter reserved, being the head of a family, or over twenty-one years of age, who was in possession and a housekeeper, by personal residence thereon, at the time of the passing of this act, and for four months next preceding, shall be entitled to a pre-emption in the purchase of the land so settled upon, not exceeding one quarter section, at the minimum price now established by law."

I differ with the honorable Senator who has just resumed his seat, [Mr. HUNTINGTON] I cannot go along with him and give to this amendment my support. It fails to accomplish the object—it comes short of the purpose I have in view. It asserts plainly and in direct terms the pre-emptive policy—and so far it meets my approbation—and I rejoice to find the honorable Senators from Vermont and Connecticut coming in aid of this policy. Heretofore, a retrospective pre-emption bill has experienced much opposition on this floor. But the amendment submitted by my friend from Vermont is a surrender of the principle—a yielding up of all objection to the pre-emptive policy. The course pursued by the Senator from Vermont augurs well, and was an indication that a great change in the sentiment of the Senate had already taken place in relation to this subject. But, as I have remarked, it does not go far enough. The time has come when a more decided measure should be adopted by Congress. We have seen, and we must know, the effects which have already been produced by the course hitherto pursued. In my judgment, we should now go further—we should, by our positive legislation, encourage the settlement of our public domain. We have hitherto protected the settlements which have taken place. We have heretofore said to the bona fide settler, you shall not be disturbed in the enjoyment of your rights; the land you have occupied—the habitation you have erected—the home you have made for yourself and family, shall be exclusively yours. We now propose by this bill to invite, to encourage emigration, and to induce the improvement and settlement of our public lands. Heretofore we looked back, and by our legislation protected the honest settler. By this bill we say to the emigrant, go forward, and you shall be sustained in your efforts to occupy, improve, and honestly to settle such a portion of the public land as you may select, not exceeding the quantity named in the bill. This constitutes all the difference between the bill as reported by the Committee on Public Lands and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont. They both contained and declared the pre-emptive principle. They both encouraged and sustained the pre-emptive policy.

The slightest acquaintance with the history of our legislation, would lead to the conclusion, that the pre-emptive policy had been, for a long period of time, the policy of our Government. For more than forty years we have recognised this principle. The right of pre-emption was secured to certain occupants of the public land as early as 1799—and to each head of a family who resided upon and cultivated a portion of the public domain prior to 26th March, 1804, in the then Territory of Michigan, the right of pre-emption to one hundred and sixty acres was expressly provided by the legislation of Congress. By the act of 3d March, 1819, any person who had settled on and improved any of the lands in the Territory of Missouri reserved for schools, before the lands were actually surveyed, shall have a right of pre-emption thereto. And so it was in the land districts in the other Territories of the United States. It will be perceived that a pre-emption right at least to one quarter section was secured to every cultivator and bona fide occupant of the public land, whether the same had been offered at public sale or not. By the act of the 29th of May, 1830—an act which was passed within the first session of Congress under the late Administration—the pre-emptive policy is clearly and distinctly declared. It is true that by the terms of that act its operation was exclusively of a retrospective character. It however asserted that those who had with good faith taken up portions of the public land, and had so occupied and so improved them for a prescribed period of time, as to induce the belief that they designed to make permanent settlements thereon, were protected, and justly protected in their rights.

This was the leading provision of the act of May, 1830. True it is, that act expired by its own limitation in a single year. But there was no occasion for its longer duration. Its object was to protect settlements which had previously taken place; and those whom it was intended to benefit, were required to prove their pre-emption claim within the period to which the act itself was limited. But in that act you cannot fail to discover the disposition of the Government to sustain, and to protect the actual settler upon the public land. The feeling and the sentiment of the people evinced by that act of their public servants was distinctly manifested. The adventurous pioneer—the honest occupant of the public land—the man who had made far himself and his family a home in the wilderness of the West, was, by the act of May, 1830, defended and sustained. I cannot but consider the question then as settled—the policy established—and the right to pre-emption admitted.

Sir, would Congress at this day refuse to re-enact the provisions of the law of 1830? Would they dare refuse protection to the honest settler of the lands. No, sir, no. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Vermont shows what are his feelings, and it shows full well what is the state of popular sentiment touching this subject. Mr. President, you cannot stay the march of the pioneer—you cannot stop the progress of the actual settlement of the public lands by any enactments of Congress. The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. LINN] in an able and eloquent speech, has portrayed the fruitlessness and folly of every attempt on the part of Congress to check the march of the intrepid and bona fide explorer of the wilderness of the West for a permanent home. He has said, and has said most truly, that you cannot prevent, with all the force at your command, the occupation of the public domain by those who wish to make permanent locations. He has, in a masterly manner, given us his views upon the general policy of pre-emption laws. I would not weaken his argument by any attempt of my own to illustrate that policy. I fully and sincerely concur with him in the sentiments expressed by him on yesterday. It may, however, be well to follow up the legislation of Congress a little further in relation to this matter, as going to show with what care, and with what interest, Congress has watched over the rights of the actual settlers of the public lands. In 1834, it was expressly provided,

"That all persons residing on the public lands, and cultivating the same, prior to the year eighteen hundred and twenty-nine, and who were deprived of the advantages of the law passed on the 29th May, 1830, by the constructions placed on said law by the Secretary of the Treasury, he, and they are hereby, authorized to enter at the minimum price of the Government, one quarter section of the public lands, within said land district."

Such has been, then, the character of the legislation of Congress for nearly half a century. Such were the provisions of the law of 1830, and such has been the policy of the Government before and since that period. To protect the bona fide settler—to sustain his rights—to secure to him his pre-emption—this has been the policy of our Government; this should be, and this will be, her future policy; for it is in accordance, in my judgment, with every sentiment of fair dealing, of honesty, and of right.

Let us examine the bill proposed by the committee, and see if in terms it does not advocate the same policy. Let us consider the amendment offered to that bill, and see whether the whole difference between them is not confined to the operation of the two measures. Let us note some of the objections urged by the Senator from Connecticut to the bill, and see whether those objections have been well taken.

In the first place, Mr. President, there is not a shadow of difference in the principle of the bill and of the amendment. They both advance and sustain the right of pre-emption.

The bill seeks to establish a "permanent prospective pre-emptive system," and as such I give to it my unqualified support. The amendment is intended merely to protect settlements already made. And what are the objections urged to this pre-emption policy, prospective as it is in its operation. It is said that it will produce an entire change in our system, touching the public lands. And it is said that if this bill passes, it will be an invitation to unlawful entries upon the public domain—that it will encourage violations of the laws—justify intruders upon the public lands, and protect them in their trespasses and wrongs. Is this so? That it will effect a change in the pre-emption policy, no one will deny. That it proposes a prospective system instead of one retrospective in its operation, all will admit. But, sir, I deny that any such consequences can be fairly charged upon this measure, should it become the law of the land. The bill before us goes to justify entries upon the public domain with the bona fide intent of making permanent settlements. Some of the very objections urged against this bill apply with great force to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont. Continue this retrospective pre-emption policy, and what is it but an invitation to intruders to enter upon the public land? What is it but an invitation to the commission of trespasses upon the public domain? The amendment of my honorable friend goes upon the ground that persons have, "without right, and without title," entered upon, cultivated, and improved in good faith portions of the public land; and to quiet all such in their possessions, to protect them in the enjoyment of their rights, this retrospective pre-emption policy has been from time to time resorted to by Congress. It was this consideration which induced the passage of the act of May, 1830, to protect those who had actually settled upon the public domain prior to 1829. It was that same principle which was manifested in the amendatory act of 1834. It was that same principle which led to the passage of the act of 1838; and it was that same kind and benevolent feeling which has induced the Senator from Vermont to offer his amendment to the bill before the Senate. The great object of Congress was, in passing these various acts of legislation, to do what? To protect the occupant—the settler—the man who had, without the sanction of law, at a time previous, entered upon, and who had continued in good faith to improve, portions of the public domain. But, sir, how were these men regarded anterior to the passage of such pre-emption laws? How were they denounced at the time these pre-emption laws were under the consideration of the Senate? They were called trespassers, land pirates, wrong doers, and squatters—every odious and opprobrious term was cast upon this portion of our citizens. This fact must be fresh and green in our remembrance. The events of the last ten years, connected with our legislation in relation to this very subject, cannot fail to impress, and deeply to impress, upon our minds, the importance of some change in the character of our legislation. We have not hesitated, and we do not hesitate, (after applying to our citizens, for such acts of settlement upon the public land, the most denunciatory language,) to grant unto these same citizens protection in the enjoyment of all their settlement rights—to secure to them the pre-emption of the very land, the occupation of which has called forth every foul epithet which goes to characterize any but the honest citizen.

26TH CONG....2ND Sess.

Pre-emption Law—Mr. Hubbard.

It is in view of these things, Mr. President, and with a perfect knowledge of what has taken place, that I am prepared for an entire change in the pre-emption policy. I would no longer limit this system to a retrospective operation: I would no longer confine the application of this principle to settlements which have taken place: I would protect them. And I would go further: I would throw open the door far and wide: I would say to every man who desires to become an honest settler upon our public land, Take it, occupy and improve it, and make it exclusively a permanent home for yourself and your family. In advocating this policy, I should be doing no wrong in a pecuniary point of view to my own Government; and instead of producing the effects which have been described, by way of objection to this bill, I should avoid them all. Instead of encouraging trespassers, this bill would prevent them. Instead of inviting lawless intruders upon the public lands, without right and without title, this would justify all entries made with an honest intent—with the purpose of making permanent settlements. This bill is an encouragement and a protection to the citizens of New England who wish to emigrate to the West. The census recently taken shows that my own State has added but little to her population within the last ten years. Some of the best and most patriotic portion of New Hampshire have within that period settled upon portions of the public domain. In my own excursions through Michigan, Illinois, and Wisconsin, I have frequently met with many a native son of my native State. I need not say that they are among the most valuable portions of those communities—distinguished for their sobriety, industry, and moral worth. They have left us, and found an acceptable home in the wilds of the West. To some of them you have already granted protection and relief from all apprehension that their rights would be disturbed. To others now residing within some of the very best sections of Illinois, protection has not as yet been extended, because these public lands have not as yet been brought into market. All are ready and willing to pay in specie to the Government the minimum price per acre fixed for the sale of our public lands. I know these men well—they have been greatly abused heretofore on the floor of this Senate for doing that they were authorized to do by the passage of the act of May, 1830, and the act of 1834. True, there was no existing law giving them direct authority to enter the public land which had not been offered at public sale, but they considered the acts referred to as having settled the policy of the Government. But notwithstanding all this, anterior to the passage of the law of 1838, and while that measure was before us, these men were denounced as trespassers and wrong doers for having thus entered upon the public lands. I would now, sir, establish a permanent prospective pre-emption. I would avoid all this kind of retrospective legislation hereafter. I would ask any one to show me the difference in the two supposed cases which follow. Suppose, sir, that under the encouragement tendered by the acts of 1830 and 1834, fifty citizens of the State of New Hampshire should leave their ancient home to make a permanent settlement in the West; that each should take up, occupy, and improve in good faith one hundred and sixty acres of the public domain, and should continue to possess it, without the authority of law, until Congress, by their legislation, should protect them in the enjoyment of their settlements by securing to them the right of pre-emption. Such a proceeding would be to encourage the settlement of the public domain, without prejudice to the public interest. Suppose the present bill should become the law of the land, and other fifty citizens of my own State, with the law in their hands, should each take up for his exclusive use one hundred and sixty acres of public land, and should occupy and improve it in good faith, for the purpose of making a permanent settlement, and should pay into the land office therefor the minimum price per acre fixed for the sale of the public lands. Where is the difference in principle? The retrospective pre-emption law is to protect the settler in his occupation. The prospective pre-emption law is to encourage and protect the settler in his occupation. It seems to me that there is no difference, so far as it respects the actual and abstract right of the settler, whether he is protected either by a retrospective or a prospective enactment. But so far as the morality of the two cases is brought in question, there is a wide and manifest difference; and it is this very difference in the moral character of the cases which induces me to give my support to the bill before us. I have no doubt that Congress would protect and sustain the settler upon the public land. They would not dare to drive from the public domain by any coercive measures, the bona fide actual settler, under any circumstances. In the one case settlements are made without strict right and without legal title. In the other, they are made under the authority of our own laws. In the one case the settlers are, in the eye of the law, trespassers. In the other the settlers are sustained, not only by the voice of public opinion, but by the sanction of public law. I go then, sir, for the bill, and against the amendment.

Mr. President, I go for this bill because it is prospective in its operation. This is the best mode that could be adopted to settle the public lands. Secure to the Government the minimum price is all I ask, and all that I expect the Government will ever realize. Instead of abusing those as land pirates, who engaged in the hazardous enterprise of penetrating the wilderness, I would encourage such acts of daring by the positive legislation of Congress. I would afford to such adventurous spirits, in the outset, the certainty of a good title to the public land they might occupy, in accordance with the provision of the law and at our minimum price. I regard this bill as more acceptable—more just in itself—than a bill merely quieting past titles upon the settlements which had been made. Pre-emption is a part of our public policy. It could not be interrupted, and I would not interrupt it if I could. The thing was right in itself, and those bold adventurous pioneers, who had opened to us a way to the Western wilderness, were worthy of all encouragement.

Mr. President, the first time I visited the West, in 1836, there were but few settlements upon the northern line of Illinois, or upon the southern line of Wisconsin. When I again visited that country, it was truly matter of astonishment to a man who had come from a State which had been peopled for a century, to witness with what rapidity the sections of country to which I have referred had been actually settled within the preceding two years; and these settlements had been made by the hardy yeomanry of the country, upon lands which had not as yet been brought into market. I was at Milwaukee a short time after the public sale took place in 1839, and knowing that the southern counties in Wisconsin had been previously settled, to some extent, by emigrations from New England, I was induced to inquire what had taken place at that sale. I was informed that these settlers, who might have proved their pre-emption claims clearly under the act of 1838, chose to attend the public sale, relying for their protection and support upon the state of public opinion, upon the force of popular sentiment. The result showed that they did not look in vain to that source for protection and support. More than half a million of dollars, the result of that public sale, found its way into the public Treasury; and nineteen-twentieths of all the receipts proceeded from those who had been for months in the previous occupation of the very tracts offered for sale. The sheriff of the county was the agent of the settlers; he proclaimed that the tract which was offered was in the occupation of A B; it was bid off by him at the minimum price, and A B was permitted to hold it; and thus the sale proceeded, until every actual settler was protected in his settlement rights; and such was the state of public feeling, that not an individual present attempted to interfere with the claims of the settler. The whole matter was conducted with the utmost harmony. The sheriff, as the agent, holding in his hand the list and description of the lands thus occupied, bid them off for their rightful owners, without the least interruption. The actual settler paid into the land office the amount required, received the evidences of payment, and in due time will receive from our General Land Office the proper patents. All this was accomplished by the moral force of public opinion, the principle of pre-emption being founded in justice and right. The practice necessarily was made to conform to it. No one would have dared, on that occasion, to oppose the rights of the actual cultivator. And if the bill before the Senate becomes the law of the land, the settler could at once pay for his quarter section, without being put to the expense and loss of time of attending a public land sale. There would be, practically, no difference in the amount received into the Treasury. The United States, under this bill, would get the same money they now did for the same quantity of land.

The Senator from Connecticut objects to the passage of this bill, and expresses himself in favor of the amendment, because the provisions of the bill extend as well to aliens as to citizens. And what is there in the language of the law of 1838 (which is retrospective in its character) which confines the operations of that act exclusively to naturalized citizens? What was there in the act of May, 1830, which limited its application to native or to naturalized citizens? Not anything. The acts referred to went to confirm and establish the rights of aliens as well as of citizens. Is there a single line—is there one single sentiment in our whole land system which goes to exclude foreigners and aliens from taking up, possessing, and holding portions of our public domain? No, sir. The invitation under the general provisions of our land system is just as comprehensive as the invitation under the particular bill before us. The foreigner can now enter any portion of the public land subject to private entry. Your pre-emption law, which have heretofore passed, have extended to the cases of aliens as well as of citizens. All have alike participated in their benefits. In the pre-emption bills which have been passed by Congress we have not required that the occupant—the head of a family—the cultivator—should be a naturalized or a native citizen of the United States

We have studiously avoided all such distinctions in our legislation upon this subject. Aliens and citizens are alike entitled to take and hold our public lands; they have been alike protected by our pre-emption policy; and I am at a loss to find any good reason why any difference should now be attempted to be made—I am at a loss to discover any satisfactory reason for saying to the foreigner, you may take our lands, subject to private entry, but you must be excluded from becoming a prospective pre-emptor; saying to the foreigner, you may go on to the public land which has not been brought into the market, and if you cultivate and improve it with the intent of making a permanent settlement, Congress will, by a retrospective pre-emption law, protect and sustain you in your rights; but you cannot be permitted, by the authority of public law, to take up a quarter section of the public land with ever so honest a purpose. This is a distinction without a difference—this is a kind of refinement entirely above my comprehension—this seems to me to be so gross an absurdity, that it only requires to be stated but to be condemned. Mr. President, I can tolerate no such principle; I am disposed to carry out, as far as I am able, the liberal, generous, and just provisions of our general land system. This is but in accordance with the practice of many of the States of this Union. In my own, foreigners may purchase and hold lands; but, unless they become naturalized citizens, they cannot transmit them by deed or by descent, but they will escheat to the State.

After the able and conclusive argument touching this point, of the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT,] I shall forbear adding any thing further.

The Senator from Connecticut objects to the details of the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands, and complains that the terms of settlement, the period of occupation, are too vague, and too uncertain. I am free to admit, sir, that I would like to see the requirements of the settler more distinctly defined; and I hope yet to see the bill improved in this particular. But, sir, let us not lose sight of the immediate question before the Senate. That question is, shall the whole bill, the good and the bad details, the great prospective principle itself, be stricken out, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont be substituted? This, sir, is the question, and to this amendment I am utterly opposed, because it does not contain the prospective principle. I differ entirely from the Senator from Connecticut, with reference to the provisions of this bill. It seems to me impossible that, under the terms of this bill, a pre-emption right can be acquired to more than one hundred and sixty acres of land, or to any land to which the Indian title has not been extinguished. Nor can I discover how this bill can be made to enure to the benefit of speculators, or how the great object of actual settlement and occupation can be defeated. As far as my knowledge extends, our pre-emption laws hitherto have operated to the exclusive benefit of the actual and honest settler. But again I say, if the bill does not effectually secure that object, I will agree to any amendment which shall look to the accomplishment of such a purpose. The first section of the bill, from which I have made the subjoined extract, distinctly avows the object of the friends of this measure; it distinctly asserts the prospective pre-emptive principle; and this is the great feature of the bill I wish to preserve unimpaired. As it respects the details, I stand ready to agree to all such as shall practically carry out the principle. The first section declares:

"That from and after the passage of this act, every white person, being the head of a family, or widow, or single man over the age of eighteen years, who shall make a settlement on any of the public lands to which the Indian title has been or shall be extinguished, whether the same be surveyed or not, or who may have settled on such land since the first day of June, eighteen hundred and forty, and who shall inhabit and improve the same, and raise a log cabin or other dwelling thereon, shall be entitled to a pre-emption in the purchase of a quantity of the public land, not exceeding one quarter section, in legal subdivisions, to be paid for at the minimum price of such land at the time of paying for the same: Provided, That no person shall have the benefit of this pre-emptive right more than one time: And provided further, That no person being the owner of land in any State or Territory, who shall quit or abandon his residence on his own land, to reside on public land in the same State or Territory, shall acquire any right of pre-emption under this act."

I shall not be deterred from giving my support to the bill from any objections which have as yet been stated, either by the Senator who moved the amendment, or by the Senator from Connecticut. It may be well for us to consider what has been our legislation heretofore in relation to some of the objections which are now urged against this bill. The third and fourth sections of the act of May, 1830, contain the precise provisions embodied in the sixth and seventh sections of the bill before the Senate; and when the Senator from Connecticut, as well as other Senators, object to the bill on the ground that every question of law and of fact is summarily and definitively to be settled by the register and receiver of the district, I answer that such was the law previous to, and has been subsequent to, the act of May, 1830. The jurisdiction of these pre-emption claims has been given, and properly given, to these officers. They are, or should be, men competent to decide all questions which may or can be submitted, and they can have no interests in the questions involved. The bill before us requires that instructions should be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who is known to act subject to the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury. No evil has arisen under the law as it stands. No objections have been made to that particular provision of the act of 1830. I am, therefore, not disposed to change the law in this particular.

The sixth section of the bill, in reference to this point, is in the following terms:

"That, prior to any entries being made, under the privileges given by this act, proof of the settlement and improvement, required by its provisions, shall be made to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the land district in which such lands may lie, agreeably to the rules which may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office for that purpose; which register and receiver shall, each, be entitled to receive fifty cents for his services therein; and all assignments, or transfers of the right of pre-emption, given by this act, prior to the issuance of patents, shall be null and void."

And it is an exact transcript from the act of 1830. I cannot the fore regard this objection to the bill as important.

It is also objected that by the terms of this bill, lands reserved by treaty for the use of Indians are not exempted from the operations of this measure. This objection is not well taken. Nothing can be more specific than the provisions of the seventh section in reference to this matter. I have transcribed that section entire, not only as furnishing a perfect answer to the objection as stated, but also to a still farther objection which has been made to the bill—that it abolishes cash sales and necessarily extends a credit to the purchasers of our domain.

The section declares:

"That this act shall not delay the sale of any of the public land of the United States, beyond the time which has been, or may be, appointed for that purpose by the President's proclamation; nor shall any of the provisions of this act be available to any person, or persons, who shall fail to make the proof and payment required before the day appointed for the commencement of the sales of land, including the tract, or tracts, on which the right of pre-emption is claimed; nor shall the right of pre-emption, contemplated by this act, extend to any land which is reserved from sale by act of Congress, or by order of the President, or which may have been appropriated for any purpose whatsoever."

Here again this section is a literal copy from the fourth section of the act of 1830—and it does seem to me that these objections have not any sufficient foundation upon which to rest. In spite of all of them, I must go for the bill. I support it because I believe it to be in accordance with the instructions of the Legislature of my own State, directing us to use our exertions to produce such graduation of the prices and limitations of the sales of the public lands as will best promote the settlement and actual occupancy of the same.

I support this prospective permanent pre-emption system to prevent trespasses and intrusions upon the public domain, which have hitherto been the subject of so much and so severe animadversion.

I support this bill because I believe that it will advance the actual settlement of the wilderness of the West.

I support this bill because it goes to encourage, protect, and sustain the honest emigrant, be he whom he may.

I support this bill because it practically carries out the literal and just policy of our general land system.

I support this bill because it is just in itself—extending equal privileges and equal benefits to all.

I support this bill because I cannot fail to regard it as tending to the benefit of an honest and meritorious class of our countrymen.

I have opposed the proposition excluding those worth over five hundred dollars from participating in the benefits of this bill. I would make no such odious discrimination. I would prevent no man who desired to leave the home of his fathers for a home in the West, whatever might be his estate or his condition in life. Many a man worth more than that sum has left New Hampshire for Michigan; and if more choose to take the same road to comfort and independence, they shall have all the aid I can give them.

Believing, as I do, that the settlement of the public domain should be the primary object of the statesman and of the patriot; and believing, as I do, that no more than the minimum price can be expected or even desired from the sales of the public lands; and believing, as I do, that the bill before us is admirably calculated to advance the actual settlement and occupancy of the now trackless forests of the West, I go for it. I desire to see it become the law of the land: and in my judgment, whenever that time shall come, you will hear no more of the lawless intruders upon the public domain; you will find a moving mass of patriotic citizens settling your outer borders, capable of resisting every encroachment, and of sustaining at all times the honor and independence of their country.

MR. YOUNG of Illinois explained in reference to the admission, by that State, of aliens to the privilege of voting. Persons of that description might, until lately, enjoy the elective franchise in Illinois after a residence of only six months, whether they had been naturalized or no. And such had then been the practice for twenty years. Nay, the State had gone still further. When the country was settled by its present occupants, they found there many French settlers whose fathers had resided on the soil time out of mind. And it was fit that these people should be secured in the same privileges as should be granted to new comers. There was, especially at that time, in the country a deservedly prominent and popular man by the name of Pierre Menard—a man without reproach, universally respected and beloved by all, French and Americans. And, in framing the Constitution, a provision was introduced with a direct reference to his case. The qualification required for Governor of the State was, that he should have been a citizen of the United States for thirty years previous to his election; and it was at first provided that the same qualification should be requisite in the case of Lieutenant Governor; but that provision had been altered, with the express purpose of admitting M. Menard, whom the people generally desired to fill that office. To be a member of the State Legislature, a man must be a citizen; but for the election of members of Congress, no such qualification was necessary. The Constitution of the United States recognised the same distinction. The electors of President were not required to be citizens of the United States—the phrase was, "people of the United States;" but when it spoke of members of the House of Representatives, it required them to be "citizens."

One of the first laws passed by the State Legislature declared that aliens might take, hold, and transmit real estate, and that their widows should be entitled to a right of dower. And would the Senate now, in reference to the privilege of pre-emption, insert an odious distinction, which did not apply even to the holding and transmission of land? He hoped not. The distinction was rejected by his State, and he hoped it would not now be established by Congress.

The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] who had objected to the admission of aliens to vote, and who was so much opposed to the present bill, had stated that the population of Illinois had doubled itself in six years. Well, if that was true, did that present a reason why pre-emption laws should not pass? On the contrary, it was the very reason why they should.

As to the justice of the measure now proposed, he would put it to gentlemen on either political side of this body, how it could be refused to his State? There were seven millions of public lands still unsurveyed; they constituted the fairest portion of the State; and though they had not been laid out into sections and quarter-sections, county lines had been established by law; and would gentlemen prevent settlers, entitled by law to vote as all other citizens of the State, from going and occupying these new counties and filling them up with a hardy agricultural population? If so, what was to become of these fair portions of the State, the new, fresh, and fertile lands which invited to settlement and cultivation? Would gentlemen say that the people of Illinois, or strangers from a distance, should not be allowed to occupy counties in the old Atlantic States regularly organized by law? And if not, why should they desire to say this in reference to similar counties in the new States? Some of the members of this body had recently been travelling in the Rock river country; would they say that the settlers were all guilty of frauds, frads in every shape? that they were a set of plunderers and land pirates? He was willing to refer to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] Let that gentleman tell the Senate what he saw in that country, and what sort of a population he found upon the public domain. Was it filled with rich speculators? or was it occupied by the poor, industrious, enterprising actual settler? He believed speculators had had pretty near enough of dealing in the wild lands of the West.

On the subject of graduating the price of the public lands, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had used an argument which was fallacious in point of fact. He had insisted that it could not be good financial policy to hope to get more money for the lands by reducing the price. He said that the Senate had been deceived as to the vast amount of poor land, which would not bring over twenty-five cents an acre, as large quantities of this very land had since been actually sold at the Government price. This was true, and what had been the result? All who had been engaged in such purchases had been broken up and totally ruined. There had come, not long since, a man from Philadelphia who only looked at the maps to ascertain what tracts were still vacant, and he had bought them up in all directions, in fact, had swept the whole country. He purchased at the Government price, and he had been ruined. In 1835 the amount sold was between four and five millions of acres; in 1836 it went up to twenty-four millions. The same course of things appeared at the same period from an assessment of the value of real estate in New York; the same spirit prevailed everywhere; and what had been the issue? Universal ruin and desolation. Figures, therefore, while they showed a vast apparent increase of the public wealth and prosperity, were not always to be relied on.

Let any man go and look at these Western settlements; let him travel through them and mingle with the people; let him see what sort of people were on this national domain, and who they were that were actually benefited by our pre-emption laws, and they would soon have all doubts as to the expediency and utility of the system done away. Men who went into that region on a pack-horse, carrying their worldly all upon his back, had now become respectable farmers, and were able to give their children a good education. Should not the law give a preference to such men as these over mere land speculators?

But it was said that, if this bill should pass, the squatters would rush out upon the lands, even before they were surveyed, and take possession of the best portions every where. That was true; and that was just what every Western man desired to see. Let them rush; let them get hold of the best and choicest lands; and then, if the speculator chose to come after them to purchase on speculation, let him take up with the refuse that was left. It was true that in some particular cases the land thus obtained had brought a high price. He knew one case where a man had obtained a tract of land in exchange for a horse, which he had recently sold for $8,000; he had then gone further on, and settled again. Did gentlemen wish to put a stop to this? He hoped not: he wanted to see it go on.

And then let it be remembered that the new States had themselves a direct interest in the passage of such a law; and they had a right to insist that some such act should pass. Did gentlemen wish to hold up vast tracts of wild land from sale, and thus keep it from the reach of the taxation of the State? Did they really want to cramp and embarrass the new States? Every gentleman knew that the public lands in a State, when sold, were exempt from State taxation for five years. Did they want to keep back the termination of this period as late as possible? There was no injustice in the enactment of a law of this kind. If it did go to foster the growth and augment the wealth of the rising States, was that a result not to be desired? Very possibly the older States might, in some degree, suffer from the emigration of their population westward; but they should not endeavor, on that account, to prevent their poorer citizens from bettering their condition, and providing a heritage for their children. Under this system of pre-emption Illinois had already attained a population exceeding that of Kentucky, and surpassing by twenty thousand that of the Old Dominion. But would Senators from those States prevent the emigration of their poorer neighbors? He trusted not; he was sure they never would act from such a motive. On the contrary, every facility should be extended to those honest and enterprising men. What more did gentlemen expect to get for this Government land? Was not a dollar and a quarter enough for an acre of wild land? Surely it was. But supposing it would bring $10 an acre at auction, was that a reason that it should be held up from the reach of the poor man who wished to cultivate and improve it? And was he to be condemned to toil all his days on a second or third rate soil, that the Treasury might be enriched by selling its land to wealthy men?

Gentlemen supposed that a reduction of the price of the poorer portion of the lands would not lead to more sales and a larger consequent receipt of money. He thought they were mistaken. Graduation was, in fact, the policy of every State that had lands of its own to sell. Kentucky owned lands south of the Tennessee river; had she not gradually reduced her price until it came down as low as 12½ cents? That was the policy of Illinois. She had sold at $1 25; then at $1; then at 75 cents; and was now selling her land at 50 cents the acre. Were the same course pursued in reference to the United States lands, many would be induced to examine with a view to getting a good bargain, and the consequence would be a great increase of the amount actually sold. After this had been continued some time, and the sales grew slack, then diminish the price again; and so on, till not an acre was left unsold. He admitted that when poor land lay immediately adjacent to good land, the owner of the latter was likely to give a better price for it than others for convenience sake, because from its situation it was worth more to him; but this held only in particular cases, and not generally.

He concluded by expressing his hope that the bill would pass. It would be seen that, except in what land was subject to private entry, there could be no delay of payment. The moment the land on which a pre-emption had been granted was advertised for sale, the settler must pay the money for it, or lose his pre-emption. He had no doubt that, should the bill pass, more money would be brought by it into the Treasury than could be obtained in any other mode. The money paid at Burlington, in Iowa, on pre-emption lands, had in a few weeks amounted to half a million of dollars. That Territory had already 40,000 inhabitants, and would shortly be applying to come as a State into the Union.

Mr. GRAHAM of North Carolina rose and said that he had originally entertained no design to participate in this discussion. Those whom he represented (so far as he had ascertained their wishes) were generally opposed to the policy of pre-emptions; and he himself, concurring in that opinion, had intended to content himself with a silent vote, but for certain doctrines which had been advanced and facts stated in the progress of the debate. The bill would have been far less objectionable to him had the amendment prevailed which was offered by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] limiting the bounties which it proposed to confer to American citizens, and excluding unnaturalized foreigners. But, in resisting this amendment, the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] had contended that any one of the States had the right to confer the elective franchise on foreigners without naturalization, according to the laws of the United States, and thus enable them to vote in elections under this Government; and the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. YOUNG,] who has just taken his seat, had stated that this doctrine was actually carried out in practice in his State, for that there aliens had voted after a residence of six months. It was upon this subject he had risen to say a few words. He could not but regard such a doctrine as directly in the teeth of the Constitution of the United States. The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] understands this power to belong to a State by reason of the general provision in the Constitution that members of the House of Representatives and the President are directed to be chosen by the people of the several States, and that "the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." It was unnecessary for him to remind one who showed himself so familiar with such subjects, of the ordinary rule of interpretation, that all parts of the instrument must be looked to in giving it a construction, and that general words were oftentimes controlled by particular provisions. The section of the Constitution immediately preceding that referred to by the Senator from New York was equally general in its terms: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." If we look no further than this clause, the Senate and House of Representatives can make laws without hindrance or concurrence from any other department of the Government. The words are as comprehensive as any that our language can afford. But in the subsequent parts of the Constitution we learn that no act of Congress shall become a law unless it receive the approbation of the President, except in cases which need not now be mentioned. Finding this first and broadest declaration of the Constitution qualified and restrained by subsequent provisions, our surprise will be the less if we discover that that relief on for the support of the power in question is subject to a like qualification. Let us, in passing, inquire who are "the people of the several States" by whom representatives, &c. are to be chosen? Who are the people of Kentucky, among whom you, sir, reside? Who are the people of New York? Does any one understand them to include unnaturalized aliens, owing allegiance to foreign Governments, and bound to cleave to them in the event of a controversy with our own? But suppose that by the generality of these words they were embraced. The Constitution elsewhere, in express terms, gives to Congress the power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization," and Congress has exercised that power by prescribing the rule. From its very nature, it cannot be concurrently exercised by the General Government and the States. There cannot, in the nature of things, be a uniform rule throughout the United States, and yet different rules in different States. But it is asked by the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] shall Congress prescribe the qualifications of voters in the States? By no means. Congress cannot prescribe any qualifications for electors in the States who are native born or naturalized citizens; and even in the case of a foreigner they cannot prescribe to him qualifications as an elector, properly so called, but they prescribe the means by which a disqualification under which he labors may be removed; and such disqualification can be removed by no other authority. This construction of the Constitution conflicts with no just rights of the States; on the contrary, the rights of all the others are grossly violated by any one of them undertaking to naturalize aliens in any other mode than that agreed upon in the Constitution of the United States. The States, by the Constitution, have entered into certain stipulations with each other, which none of them can in good faith violate. Some of these are of a positive character, such as that they will deliver up fugitives from justice, and fugitive slaves and servants. Others are negative, such as that they will abstain from the exercise of powers themselves which they have delegated exclusively to the General Government. To refuse to execute the former is a crime of omission; to attempt the exercise of the latter is a crime of commission; both alike injurious to the other States. When, therefore, a State admits foreigners to political rights, affecting the action of this Government, without naturalization, she violates the covenants of the Constitution and does injury to her sister States.

Such was his reading of the Constitution. How stood the question upon authority? He believed that all interpreters of the Constitution agree that the States have alienated exclusive powers of legislation to this Government in three cases only: 1st. Where the Constitution, in express terms, granted an exclusive authority to the Union. 2d. Where it granted, in one instance, an authority to the Union, and in another prohibited the States from exercising the like authority. And 3d. Where it granted an authority to the Union, to which a similar authority in the States would be absolutely repugnant and contradictory. And it was a little remarkable that all the commentators on the Constitution, from Mr. Madison down—at least as far as he was informed—had selected this very power of naturalization as an illustration of the third class of these cases. In the Constitution of the State which he had the honor in part to represent—and but for this fact he would not now have obtruded himself on the notice of the Senate—as adopted in 1776, there is this clause: "Sec 40. That every foreigner who comes to settle in this State, having first taken an oath of allegiance to the same, may purchase, or by other just means hold, acquire, and transfer land or other real estate: and, after one year's residence, shall be deemed a free citizen." Under this section, foreigners, by taking an oath of allegiance to the State may yet acquire, hold, and transfer lands; but, in the fulfilment of her duties to the Union—and he trusted she had fulfilled them all—North Carolina, by her constituted authorities, both legislative and judicial, had uniformly admitted that, by her adoption of the Federal Constitution, and the passage of naturalization laws by Congress, the latter clause of the section just quoted was abrogated; and that foreigners could become citizens only according to the uniform rule established by Congress. And he appealed to honorable Senators if it was just towards her, and the other States of the Union who put a like construction on the Constitution, that other members of the Confederacy should adopt a different rule of naturalization. When the Constitution was adopted, it was declared to be intended to secure "the blessings of liberty to the people of the United States and their posterity." Aliens were no parties to it. But a provision was inserted by which Congress might admit them to become parties, and to share in its blessings. The Constitution was brought into existence mainly to regulate our foreign relations. To Congress had been given the power to make peace and war with other nations; and there appeared to be a propriety in giving it also the power of determining upon what conditions the people of those nations should be admitted to share with us in the privilege of deciding on the question of peace and war with their native countries.

But the States have agreed by the Constitution to distribute their relative power in the other branch of Congress, and in the election of a Chief Magistrate, according to the respective numbers of their people; and, so long as those numbers depend on the natural course of increase, or on the inducements which might be held out for emigration from one State of the Union to another, the struggle for power among themselves was one of fair and honorable competition. But, sir, I deny that in such a contest, any State has a right to invoke as allies unnaturalized foreigners. This is a subject of vast magnitude, to which I desire to call the special attention of Congress and the country. There is shortly to be a new distribution of power, according to the census recently taken of the people of the United States. Sir, I protest against aliens being enumerated in that census, or, if so enumerated, against any State acquiring members of the House of Representatives, or votes in the Presidential election, by considering aliens, not naturalized, as a part of "the people" of such State. This is an unconstitutional mode of acquiring power; which, if tolerated, would subvert one of the first principles of our Confederacy. And, with proper deference to the opinions of others, I cannot conceive a more gross violation of the Constitution, a more clear usurpation of power, than for a State to annul or dispense with the laws of naturalization, and swell its own importance and weight in the Union by the aid of aliens owing no allegiance to this country, but bound by the highest obligations to take up arms against it in the event of war with their own sovereign. Such an injury is the more grievous because it operates not so much against this Government as against the constitutional rights of the co-States of the Confederacy who had not expressly provided sanctions to prevent such infractions.

He would take occasion to remind the Senate that not only personal bravery and adventurous spirit, the qualities so much lauded by honorable Senators from the West as characterizing those for whose benefit this bill was intended—that not only these, but the highest degree of virtue and honor, might co-exist with a deadly hostility to Republican institutions; and he would exhort them to beware how bounties were bestowed on those who owed no allegiance to the Government.

He had not noticed, in its proper connection, the precedent alluded to by the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] of the admission of Michigan into the Union with a clause in her Constitution allowing foreigners to exercise the elective franchise. If he had been correctly informed in relation to the facts of that case, he did not conceive that it sustained the doctrine contended for by the Senator from New York. As he (Mr. GRAHAM) had understood, the Constitution of Michigan gave the right of voting to the inhabitants of that State at the time of its formation; and the act of Congress admitting her into the Union was by implication a special act of naturalization for the then inhabitants. He supposed such a law was within the power of Congress; and if so, the case of Michigan was not a precedent for this, to him, new and alarming doctrine; if, however, it were otherwise, he could not admit that a single precedent of Congress could overturn what was in his opinion the true construction of the Constitution—one of its most important provisions. He had no feeling of hostility to foreigners who were disposed to become citizens according to the constitutional mode. He believed our present regulations on the subject were hospitable and liberal. If they were not enough so, he was even willing to hear propositions to make them more liberal. He, however, was opposed to annihilating the uniform rule on the subject of naturalization, and bestowing bounties on those who owe no allegiance to our Government.

Mr. PRESTON had not risen with any wish or purpose of protracting the discussion; but, as this question of power had been debated with some earnestness, he would say a few words in relation to it. He referred to a period, some years ago, when he had the misfortune to differ on certain points of State power from the opinion of many of his friends; and it was now again his lot in reference to the question which had been raised. After mature reflection, his views were quite different from those which had been expressed by the two gentlemen near him, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. GRAHAM]. He did not believe that the Federal Government possessed any right under the Constitution to look into the qualifications of voters in any State. No such power was expressed in that instrument, and the power would be nugatory and its exercise impossible even if it did exist there. The State of Michigan had determined that persons other than naturalized citizens might vote in her elections. He held that she had a right so to determine, and that from necessity. The members of the Senate held their seats in that body by the election of the States; but, if the principle contended for by these gentlemen were to be allowed, then, in every case where persons had voted within the State who were not entitled under the Constitution so to do, this original vice in the election would pervade the whole act, and a Senator so chosen could not take his seat. He held that the Senate had no power to go behind the Constitution of a State, and thought it would be a dangerous usurpation should they undertake to look into the case of each member at the electoral college to see if those who constituted it were or were not duly qualified. The Constitution provided no particular qualifications for voters, and if it implied such qualifications, it must be by a strong necessity indeed. And should a law be passed to lay down such qualifications, that law would be against the express declaration of the Constitution which provides that the qualifications of persons voting for members of Congress shall be according to the State's own determination with respect to voters for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. The whole control over that subject was given to the States emphatically. The logical proposition of the gentlemen who held the opposite opinion amounted to this: you shall in this matter imply for the General Government the repeal of an express delegation of power to a State. The States had power to declare who should be electors, for the Constitution provided that those might vote for electors of President who were qualified to vote for the most numerous branch of the Legislature. The State declared these qualifications, and, therefore, the State had power to declare who should vote for electors of President, but the doctrine of the gentlemen would go to repeal and completely abrogate this power.

But if the power for which they contended had been reposed in the General Government by the Constitution, it would have been impossible to exercise it. Suppose a seat in the House of Representatives to be contested on the express ground that persons voted for the sitting member who were unnaturalized foreigners; and suppose the sitting member should appeal to the Constitution of the State which permitted such persons to vote for members of Congress, could that House look beyond the State Constitution? Was it for a committee of that House to decide that this ought not to be so, and thus to repeal the Constitution of a State? And if they once got behind the Constitution, where were they to stop? It would, in his judgment, be wise to confine the elective franchise to citizens alone, but, in the absence of any express prohibition, he would not restrict the right of the State by implication. Had Congress any right to do it? Might it pass a law declaring that none but citizens of the United States should vote for members of the State Legislature. He apprehended not. The Constitution did not say so, and they could not infer the power. If time served, and if this were the time, it would be proper to inquire more generally into this whole subject. Gentlemen talked of a citizen of the United States; what was a citizen of the United States? Could any gentleman tell him? Could they define the idea? Was every citizen of a State a citizen of the United States? Was a citizen of the United States a citizen of all the States? Was a man who was a citizen of the District of Columbia a citizen of South Carolina? He apprehended not. In North Carolina aliens could hold and transmit land, by the Constitution of the State; in Georgia they held under an express statute. The States always modified this matter to suit their own pleasure. A man's holding land did not make him a citizen of the United States; and a man's citizenship in the United States did not make him a citizen of any one State. The States carefully guarded this right of citizenship, and required a probationary period of various lengths. In South Carolina a man must be a citizen of the State before he could practise law. On the whole, he did not see where the rights of the States over citizenship and the exercise of the elective franchise were abrogated or touched by the Constitution. The question, however, did not affect the present bill. It mattered not whether a man was a citizen of the United States or not. He could purchase public land. He did it at his own risk. He did it under the laws of the State where the lands lay; and though he purchased of the United States, he could hold only under the State. Congress had passed no law that all who purchased the land of the United States should have power to hold it within the new States. It had, however, gone further than this bill proposed to go. It had not only sold, but given land to foreigners, and even to those who were subjects of the Autocrat of Russia and the King of France. Tracts had been given both to Polish and to French settlers, and the States had formerly done the same thing. He would not dispute the power to sell to any one; whether to do so was politic or not, was a different question. It had been thought good policy to give these lands to the Poles and the French emigrants, but he greatly doubted this. He did not think it good policy to give privileges to foreigners, in preference to our own citizens. The present bill was a bill of privileges—it was a bill of bounties to some classes of persons over others. He was not in favor of giving privileges and making grants to foreigners, over the heads of our own citizens, in order to induce them to come and reside among us. Congress had had a magnificent domain confided to its care, not, indeed, to be managed in the niggardly spirit of a land holder, who was determined to make the most of every foot of the soil, but to be held as a great and sacred trust, for purposes both of finance and of patriotism. To view the subject aright, gentlemen ought to look at it in both these views. They ought not, on the one hand, to forget that the public lands were a great financial trust for the benefit of the whole Union, nor, on the other, that they were the means to be employed in building up a glorious empire in the West. Considered first in a financial point of view, they were a property not to be wantonly wasted, or profugetly dilapidated. As a trust fund, held for the benefit of all the States, the land was to be husbanded with care. They might be made to diminish the public burdens, and to lighten the load of taxation; but while the General Government was to regard them in this light, it must remember that it might not, to secure these objects, trample on the rights of the inhabitants of the great West, nor on the paramount right of the whole people of the United States. He would not waste the domain, but would administer it in such a manner as to afford an inviting outlet to that mass of population which was leaving the Atlantic shores to seek a more fertile residence in the virgin soil of the West.

As to the financial question, the present bill, by allowing settlers to select the most fertile tracts and advantageous points, certainly would diminish the value of the residue which was to be exposed at public sale. Lands thus sold at auction brought to the Government, upon an average, something over $1 25. Those who went in on the public domain would fix upon spots not only good in themselves, but commanding, to a greater or less degree, the value of the lands in the vicinity; such, for example, as spots of wood in the midst of a prairie, valuable springs in a dry region, water-power where water-power was scarce. Such points as these were certainly worth greatly over the minimum price, yet the bill allowed a pre-emption without restriction, knowing that the seizing and occupancy of such favorable situations would be the certain and necessary result. The consequence was inevitable, that the value of the rest of the territory would and must be diminished. Means would of course be devised of speculating on these advantages. They had been already put in practice. Every body who came from the West well knew that this was and always would be done. Wealthy men would send individuals to settle on the land, with an express view to buy up their improvements. Nor was there any thing wrong in this. He had himself made such purchases, and the settlers from whom he bought immediately went on to make new settlements, and openly begged his custom. They were in the habit of seizing on a commanding situation, so as to make the surrounding land of comparatively no value without it, and thus contrive to put money in their pocket.

Extreme cases answered extreme cases. The worthy Senator from Missouri on his left [Mr. LINN] had said that, if pre-emption and graduation were refused, the public lands might be held up until they should be worth $30 per acre. True, this might happen; but then, on the other hand, the lands might be given away for nothing at all. The Senator said that, if thrown open, the lands would bring more money than if held up; and yet that they might be held up until, instead of bringing $1 25, they would bring $30 per acre. Both positions certainly could not be true.

There was no man who rejoiced more at the astonishing growth of the West, or who wondered more at the contemplation of it, than he did. His heart's most earnest desire had been gratified to witness the population of some of these States doubling itself in eight or ten years. But what was the practical effect of this whole state of things? If it was our true policy to build up the West, to foster by every proper means this young and rising empire, was it not equally our policy to cast an eye toward the seaboard, and to preserve the old States of the Confederacy? And if so, what right had our Western brethren, out of those States' own patrimony, to offer a bounty for the purpose of draining off their population? What right had the General Government to draw off the population and resources of South Carolina that the West might spring up like the palace of Aladdin, or rise like an exhalation? This bill offered to all who would leave the worn out soil of Virginia or the Carolinas a positive bounty. It held out inducements to the young and enterprising to pour over the mountains, and build up an empire in the West, beyond even the rapidity of Nature. The Atlantic States were already drained. The lands of South Carolina were already worn out by long use, while those of the West were fresh and new. New Hampshire was very much in the same condition. Her population had forsaken her, and were to be found in the West. God forbid he should prevent the efforts of the young and the strong to better their condition. But were not the inducements to emigration already sufficiently strong without superadding the force of rewards and bounties? Yet the privilege proposed by this bill was as much a bounty as if it had been offered in cash. He estimated it in that point of view. If the United States should sell land in order to give money, what was it but a system of rewards and punishments?—of rewards to the new and rising States, of punishments to the States which were to be devastated and drained. The old States had as much property in the public lands as the new; and yet it was proposed to take from the revenue they would bring, and give it as a bounty to those who shall go West. The bill would take money from him to give it to his neighbor, to induce him to leave Carolina and go into Arkansas or Missouri. This was not fair; it was unequal; it was exclusive.

Whether the existing land system was in all respects correct or not, was a question on which he should not enter. Thus far, at least, it had acted regularly and well. It had made Ohio. It had made Indiana. It had made Illinois. It had made Missouri. It was making Michigan. It was making Arkansas. It was fast making the West the great depository of political power. One census more would make the old States but an appendage to the new—a mere fringe upon the border of the Western empire. Was not this enough? Did Western gentlemen ask for more? Would they still insist upon hastening the process yet more by bills of bounty and privilege? He hoped not. If the United States title to the land was a grievance, it was a grievance which the new States could not remove. No doubt it was held as a grievance that the Government should hold up the land at $1 25. Granting it, however, to be an evil, it could not be a very great one where there was so much land of the first rate quality. There might be some evils in the system; but let not the Senate, by one fell swoop, tear up and reverse the whole.

It might be because he was passing the meridian of life, but, from whatever cause, he certainly found a daily increasing tendency in his mind to stop in past experience, to abide by what had been tried. Stare decisis. He was for adhering to that which had worked well, and not, in the mere insolence of his own reason, for tearing up and overturning what had long been decided by the wisdom of those who had gone before him. He turned from mere theory, however fair and promising, to actual results—to the verdict time had given. The proposed plan held out magnificent results, but they were results merely in prospect. He preferred to stand on what experience had proved, and was satisfied with the results which proved the system, from which they flowed, to be wise and beneficent. As to the distinction proposed in the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CARRINGTON,] by restricting the pre-emption privilege to the settler whose property does not exceed $500, I am not inclined to adopt it. Its object is to confine the benefits of the bill to the poor man; but we are all poor. In this country we all have to win our way to fortune by the sweat of our brow. The primeval curse rests upon America as upon the rest of the world. I am not disposed to legislate for the poor. In this free Republic we are all equal before the law, and when we are dispensing the bounties of the Government, I do not think we have any right to segregate one class alone as the objects of our beneficence. If we do it in favor of one class, we do it against another class; which is utterly abhorrent to the genius of all our institutions. The men who subdue our Western forests are a noble race; hardy, daring, full of enterprise and courage. I admire their character. I rejoice in their success; but I think they have no claim to exclusive legislation. While I look at them I must also have some regard to my own interests. What carries them to the West. A bold and enterprising spirit. And who is it they seek to benefit? Me or mine. Not at all. They seek to benefit themselves, and they are right; but they are no more entitled to the patronage of the Government than I am. We both pursue our own interests, though in different lines of exertion. Our stimulation is to be found in the high rewards which this country holds out to every form of resolute enterprise. If we employ men to settle the public lands, we ought to pay them; but if they go for their own advantage, to that advantage they must look as the reward of their efforts. If, indeed, we have in any case thrown special burdens upon them, the case is altered. It is said we have accumulated an Indian foe upon their borders, and that this body of settlers present their bosoms as a rampart for our protection; but wherein does their situation in this respect differ from that which has in succession been the early condition of all who settled this country? Has not our whole wilderness been opened and settled under the gleam of the tomahawk? Did not our first settlers calculate on dangers when they penetrated the Western wild? They braved those dangers, and they have found their reward. But it is said that if we expose them to Indian neighbors, we are bound in justice to guard them from the danger we have created. Admit it; and have we not guarded them? Have we made no military provision for their defence? When Black Hawk and his band invaded the frontier, did we stand with our hands folded and suffer their settlements to be ravaged? No; we sent them our Generals and our troops. We poured out without stint the treasure and the blood of the nation; and it was but our duty. I regard these Western settlers as children of the same common Government, as brothers in our great and wide family whom it is our pleasure and our pride to cherish and protect. We have sent regiment after regiment; we have built fort after fort; and if we have exposed them to danger, we have at least endeavored to shield them against it; not but what, while I say this, I think that many gentlemen are disposed to overrate that danger. True, we have sent off the Indians from within the States, and some of these very settlers have got the richest of the land which the Indians left behind them. We have congregated their tribes upon our frontier; but how are they situated? On the one side are the settlements of the whites, the very States from which they have been expelled, full of an armed and hardy population, which is multiplying and becoming more and more dense from day to day. This is on one side of them, and what is on the other? The boundless prairies of the West. A land of primeval beauty, covered with herbage and roamed by countless multitudes of buffalo and deer, and whatever else can delight the eye and tempt the footstep of the hunter. Are their tendencies toward us, or toward these vast and inviting hunting grounds? Will they be tempted to enter the bounds of Missouri and Arkansas, and rush upon the rifles of the settlers, and the bayonets of our troops, when the Camanches and the Caddoes lie beyond them to the West, whom they may sweep before them into the Pacific? I think not. I think their native tendency lies manifestly westward. Still, with their uncertain and malignant temper, it is our duty to guard against all possible contingencies, and I am willing and prepared to do it.

He observed, in conclusion, that his object in rising had only been to speak to the question of State rights, and not to discuss the bill. For one, he was as much disposed to trust the regulation of the elective franchise to the States of this Confederacy as to the General Government; and he felt content to leave the whole subject where the Constitution had placed it.

Mr. ANDERSON of Tennessee rose to address the Senate, but yielded to a motion to adjourn which prevailing—

The Senate thereupon adjourned.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 8, 1841.

The order of the day being the bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system in favor of settlers on the public lands who shall inhabit and cultivate the same and raise a log cabin thereon; and the question being on the following amendment offered by Mr. PRENTISS, of Vermont, as a substitute for the whole bill:

"Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following: That every actual settler on any of the public lands, to which the Indian title has been extinguished, except such as are hereinafter reserved, being the head of a family, or over twenty-one years of age, who was in possession and a housekeeper, by personal residence thereon, at the time of the passing of this act, and for four months next preceding, shall be entitled to a pre-emption in the purchase of the land so settled upon, not exceeding one quarter section, at the minimum price now established by law."

Mr. ANDERSON addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: It is always with extreme reluctance that I rise to trespass on the attention of the Senate, but the great interest which this question has excited, and the deep feeling with which it will be received by our countrymen, and especially by those whom I have the honor, in part, to represent, will sufficiently justify me in the humble attempt I shall make to discharge what I believe to be my duty upon the present occasion.

The policy of the bill, of which alone I shall speak, without intending to rely, at present, upon its details, has been repeatedly recognised in the legislation of Tennessee, and has again and again received the sanction of Congress in their disposition of the public domain. The people of this country have always sympathized deeply with that hardy, industrious, and enterprising portion of their fellow-citizens, who go from the respective States, to seek a solitary home in the great wilderness of the West.

Sir, I feel the full weight of such considerations pressing upon me, and I cannot repress the abrupt expression of my entire dissent from the views presented by gentlemen on the other side of this House.

If an enlightened foreigner had attended the progress of this debate, he would have received the impression that this was a mere question of finance. Following, by legitimate inference, the line of argument pursued by gentlemen on the other side, the question would have risen upon him, whether it was not an evil greatly to be apprehended, that our distant borders would be too soon occupied by bold pioneers, and that the vast wilds, which have now a scattered population, might prematurely be formed into States, under the guidance of those industrious cultivators of the soil. He would have listened in vain to understand, by this discussion, any great statesmanlike objections which ought to be interposed against the rapid settlement of the far West. In vain might he attempt to trace any fact in the history of the rise and progress of other nations that resembled the restrictive policy which so strikingly distinguishes the opposition to this measure. It is not to be found in the action of the mother country towards us, at any period. It is not to be found in the colonial history of the great nations who are now acting a conspicuous part in the affairs of the world. It is not to be found in the conduct of Great Britain, either towards her present American provinces, or her settlements in Asia or Africa. It is not to be found in the history of any of the nations of the earth whose territorial extension was great, and whose borders needed protection, but on the contrary, the solicitude of every wise and patriotic Government has been to encourage the progress of their population to their utmost extremities, to strengthen and consolidate those distant settlements, and teach the emigrant to feel that his home there, however lonely, was sacred. The Roman empire planted not only fortresses, but backed them by colonies at a vast expense, upon her remote frontiers. To her they were, as they must be to every nation of the world similarly situated, not merely the keys of peace and of war, but the shield of defence. A wise people, looking at the relations of things, will appreciate the magnitude of such a policy by no present security so much as the possibility of future danger. The existence of the first is one of the chief objects of government, as involving the whole question of prosperity; and to guard against the latter, one of the great principles of its administrative action. It is with this view, in part, that England now seeks to settle by gratuities her American lands. Texas—but the other day founded by our own people—pursuing a wiser policy than ourselves, offers the most liberal rewards to those who will become her citizens, while we, at the centre of this great Republic, receiving the largest share of the benefits of the public expenditures, commencing at this point, and spreading almost exclusively upon the Northern Atlantic borders—we, sir, in the midst of such considerations, hear this question deliberately treated as one of mere finance, of pounds, shillings, and pence, and a fit occasion to denounce the poor emigrant, for daring to set his foot upon the public soil, and that he should be bold and impudent enough to erect a cabin to shelter his household.

Sir, I do not look upon this as a mere question of finance, but one of a far higher order, affecting deeply the happiness and prosperity of a mighty people, and the multitudes of exiles who will seek our land as an asylum from an iron oppression, that has risen and strengthened under the feudal subjection of a thousand years. I look, too, to this measure as only the programme to some system which must necessarily, in the end, take the antagonist position to the proposition heretofore made, to distribute among the respective States the proceeds of the public lands. Both projects to which I refer must mainly stand or fall upon the same great principles. This, it is true, is not complete in the final disposition of the public land, and does not postpone those vexed questions which must annually arise here, but it is at least a pioneer to some equitable system, which will most surely, in the great movement of things, come sooner or later. That other system to which I allude, should be framed with a careful regard to the various interests involved, and if practicable, at least possess the merit of a final adjustment of the subject. The present system, however, which is proposed, ought not to alarm the fears of those who look specially to the moneyed concerns of the country in connection with our public domain; for I do not entertain a doubt that it will rather add to than diminish the revenues of the Government. That which you will receive, and that which you will save in the course of fifty years, will advance far beyond the paltry millions which you can cast into the Treasury, by any nursing policy for the benefit of the States respectively. I refer, sir, to the quantity of land you will sell, and to the accumulation of a massive population, upon a vastly extended and exposed frontier, whose presence may either overawe to peace the naturally belligerent savage, or check his bold and bloody incursions.

I consider this measure, therefore, not likely to have any unfavorable financial effect, and as presenting the means of promoting the progress, and providing for the safety of a great nation.

The bill proposes that every white person being the head of a family, and every white man over the age of eighteen, or widow who shall make a settlement on any public land, and who shall inhabit and improve them, and raise a log cabin or other dwelling thereon, shall be entitled to a pre-emption in the purchase of one hundred and sixty acres of land, at the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents. It was attempted to amend this provision, by adding the condition, that the emigrant who was worth more than five hundred dollars should not be entitled to the right of pre-emption. A regret was expressed on yesterday that it had failed. Nothing, it seems to me, could be more unjust and invidious than such a condition, and I rejoice that it has failed. It is the enterprise, the industry, and the safety of the emigrant, without distinction of persons, which you seek to protect against the unequal power of the speculator; and whether he is worth one dollar or five thousand, all those considerations apply with undiminished force to him, while he stands there as one more to be added to the living rampart, which is thus formed for the defence of the whole country.

But, sir, what is the great policy of this measure? This being settled, for good or for evil, determines of course the proper line of our action. Is it such as we heard it denounced to be on yesterday? It was then denominated a system of "privileges and bounties!"—a system by which our magnificent domain would be exhausted! Sir, what privilege, and what bounty? The privilege of buying land at the minimum price at which you have fixed it! The privilege and bounty of being preferred to the speculator! That privilege and that bounty to the poor and the adventurous, which alone can make your public domain most valuable! The privilege of entering a wilderness seven hundred miles from your seat of Government! A privilege, the natural result, I might say the necessity, of having cast the Indians out of our borders! The privilege of assisting to fill your Treasury! This privilege you confer upon the undismayed adventurer, who goes forth from the land of his birth, and the home of his childhood, from friends and kindred, and who plants towns and cities where you would have to establish a cordon of military posts. Sir, let it be remembered, these privileges and bounties fall from our hand upon the laborer, the farmer, and the pioneer, the great producing classes of the community, like summer showers upon the parched earth! They are rare, but welcome. They are our only tender mercies cast upon them, like "angels' visits, few and far between!" And shall the humble poor look to us in vain? Shall we turn them from our door homeless and homeless, and even forbid them to strike the axe, and rear their cabin in our vast and unoccupied forests? Has so soon a "change come o'er the spirit of the dream?" "but yesterday, and they could have stood against the world; now, none so poor to do them reverence!" Sir, I confess it struck me with peculiar force; it sounded strangely in my ears to hear from the other side of this House—from the party with whom we have so recently contended, this bill which so justly and fairly provides for the poor, the industrious, the enterprising, the great producing classes of the community, denounced most bitterly, as a "bill of privileges and bounties, of rewards and punishments." I repeat, considering the scenes through which we have recently passed, and the quarter from whence this came, I was most profoundly astonished. It carries with it a practical commentary, which no ingenuity can escape, and which requires no eloquence to illustrate or enforce. Sir, how soon has it been forgotten that those very men for whom we are now legislating, belong to that great agricultural mass who pursue the only unprotected occupation in our country? How soon has it been forgotten that they are the voters and the taxpayers, from whose hands are received all the power, and from the sweat of whose brows flow all the sweets that luxurious wealth carefully gathers up to cherish and inspire its collapsed excitement, to please its taste, and gratify its pride.

But, sir, what sort of privilege is that which you give to the humble and unambitious emigrant to buy the little spot of earth upon which he seats himself, when compared with the privileges and bounties which you bestow upon more highly favored objects of your kindness? The contrast is strange, marked and peculiarly distinguishing! The history of this country shows that we have just passed through a long succession of privileges and bounties to the manufacturer, of privileges and bounties to a great National Bank, and of privileges and bounties almost every where, except to the poor and industrious farmer, who asks you to give him nothing but protection against the speculator—that the cabin which he rears to shelter the wife of his bosom, and the pledges of their love, may be sacred against the world! For that price you have set upon it; he only demands of you to let him be the purchaser! The very thought, however, of privileges and bounties to the honest and industrious cultivator of the soil, rouses up resistance and provokes denunciation from those who have very lately professed to hold his interests very carefully and tenderly in the hollow of their hand! And how long, sir, will gentlemen pause—or will they pause at all under their keen sense of horror at these privileges of the husbandman, when they shall come to erect a vast Bank of the United States, with the highest prerogatives, and the largest privileges, or else when they shall come to call into existence, as the head of a great banking league, some rotten, disjointed, prostrate and still sinking institution, whose privileges have been corrupt and boundless, as her power has been abused and uncontrolled? All this will not shock the lively sensibilities of gentlemen! That banker, and that banking institution will with ease gather wealth, and grasp a thousand landed titles, and even aspire to guide and master the political current of events, and they are advocated upon the high public considerations of promoting the general welfare, while the humble laborer, utterly denounced, seeks but a home, and, “remote and unfriended,” pursuing “the noiseless tenor of his way,” he forms one of the millions on the strength of whose arm, and the courage and patriotism of whose heart, depends the safety of the Republic. Is there nothing of the public welfare that belongs to the destiny of that man? This one of the million? And shall not the voice of kindness be raised here to cheer his onward course, and the hand of a wise policy be extended to protect his lonely habitation?

But, sir, this prospective pre-emption, as I have stated, was also denounced as a system of rewards and punishments, applied between the Atlantic and the West. The citizen of the neglected Atlantic was described as being left to pursue his obscure path unknown, and unregarded by the Government, while the man of the far West rioted in the pursuit of the wild game of the prairies, and had superadded to his pleasures the highest legislative rewards. The great landed domain has been held up as that patrimony of the old States of which they have been gradually stripped by a similar legislation, and of which we seemed now to be in the attitude of ultimately depriving them, for the benefit of a more favored region. The hamlets, the towns, the cities, the vast spreading population of the West, has been grouped in graphic pictures to impress more strikingly upon our minds how we have built them by our legislation, and fostered them by our patronage. These have been called the rewards to the West. In contrast with this, and over which the sensitive and sympathizing can scarcely refrain a tear, we have the neglected condition of the Atlantic States painted with a fervid pencil and a filial hand. Their old fields covered with the growth of the pine, their villages decayed, their houses deserted, and their citizens gone. Who, sir, but would mourn over desolation like this? would weep to witness the infliction of such a punishment? There is nothing, perhaps, which more powerfully appeals to the sympathy of the human heart than the narrative of the misfortunes of those who have passed from the highest tide of prosperity to obscure want. But that the impression may sink deep and lastingly, the picture must be just! A mistake in this is fatal. It will chill your charity, and dry your tears. How, then, does this work of the imagination contrast with all that meets your eye throughout the broad Northern Atlantic States? They have advanced in their population, augmented their commerce, improved and increased their agriculture, adorned and extended their cities, founded new seats of learning, revived those whose decaying lights were going out, and added with a most unexampled rapidity to the private wealth of individuals, the progress of the arts and sciences, the building of roads, the opening of canals, and the laying of railways, until they have extinguished space, and almost condensed their cities to a unit. In all this the broad hand of prosperity has made its deep and indelible impress. This forms a small part of the punishments inflicted upon the Atlantic States by the disposition of the public lands.

But, Mr. President, let us inquire, for a moment, into this system of rewards and punishments, which has excited so much denunciation. I do not mean to utter any thing unkind, or invidious, or in the spirit of complaint, but in the right of rejoinder. I may be permitted to contrast the action of this Government in regard to the two grand divisions of the country—the Atlantic, on the one side, and the interior on the other. I think it requires no great mental effort to perceive that there is sound philosophy in the parallel, that this division in the Republic of two great sections has a necessary existence in their natural position. It is the history of all governments, and wherever they have had durability it has been by the action and reaction of balances established by natural causes, and preserved by a skillful administrative policy. In the West we have lands. We therefore want men; and men and lands constitute the greatness of our position, and from which, as a resource, we may build up a flourishing country. In the progress of industry this is a necessary consequence. It is not more natural in us, therefore, to ask you to do that in regard to the public lands which will benefit and protect the laboring settler, than it is wise in you to grant the demand, because it will, in the end, promote a common prosperity. Such, sir, is the true “head and front” of the whole system of rewards to the West! But not merely to balance this for the past, the present, and through all future time, has it never occurred to you that for all the purposes of taxation and expenditure, ours is a Northern Atlantic Government, and those States are, have been, and most probably will continue to be, the great recipients of the mass of the public expenditures. The difference between us is that we of the interior are taxpayers, but not receivers of the great body of the appropriations. In the Atlantic they are taxpayers and receivers too, and their industry is actually stimulated by that which they consume, because the premium at which they are permitted to do it is returned into their hands, either for the products of their soil, or their skill in manufactures. Thus the system of punishments proceeds. It is in the Atlantic States that you have erected your most costly palaces and public works; your custom-houses, and light-houses; and, added to all these, you have improved their harbors. I repeat, sir, I do not speak in the spirit of dissatisfaction, but of justice. Our brethren of the Northern Atlantic do but enjoy their position, perhaps with no greater tendency to the monopoly of all the moneyed favors of the Government than is natural to man where his slightest caprice has been respected, and all his wishes indulged. These men for whom we ask your protection against the speculator, are both taxpayers and land-buyers at your own price—and for all this we inflict a punishment upon the old States, by building our ships there when they might be constructed on the waters of the Mississippi. We purchase there almost all our naval and military stores, when they might be obtained in the West. In the manufacture of fire arms, and all the munitions of war, Tennessee and Missouri can offer facilities not to be excelled in any part of the world; but in the harshness of our severity, we punish our friends and fellow-citizens of the Atlantic, by the manufacture of these articles within their borders, that their raw material may be used instead of ours, their skill employed, and their provisions consumed. We have punished them by giving to the deaf and dumb asylum of Connecticut a township of land—and of the millions appropriated for the support of our Government, more than five-sixths are expended in the Northern Atlantic States. Above all, we punish them by expending every surplus dollar we make in their ports. No matter how it comes, whether from the toil of the miner or the ploughman, the hardy trapper or the trader of Santa Fe, the wealthy merchant and the manufacturer of the North gather within the year the hard earnings of the whole West. But, sir, I ought to add that other, and that last punishment which we inflict upon them, and from which, like the rewards they bestow on us, we all derive a common benefit. We punish them by seeking to improve that proud and glorious navy which protects them in war, and enriches them in peace.

This is a hasty review of the punishments inflicted upon the Northern Atlantic, peculiarly; and it must be admitted they are at least gentle and tender. In return, sir, though you may call them by the name of rewards, give to us similar punishments—so gentle, so kind, so modest, so tender! That is, sir, let us have the advantages of our position—of land and men—as you have the advantages of your position; and do not seek to become a great land merchant, holding up your merchandise for higher prices, or fretting over the apprehension of the loss of a few cents. It is not demanded by your obligations—it is unsuited to the greatness of your policy.

Let us hear no more, then, of “privileges and bounties,” of “rewards and punishments,” or of the obscurity of the man of the Atlantic, while that gilded coach parades yonder city, and that humble laborer delves in the soil of the far West, and while that banker has been, or is to be, made yet more than a millionaire, with potent privileges, that princes might envy, while that lonely emigrant asks leave to pay, from the labor of his hands, the price you have fixed upon the little spot of earth where he has reared his log cabin, and placed in it, as its queen, the wife of his bosom, the partner of his perils and his toils.

In one word, bestow upon the men of the West who shall go there, those kind, those gentle, and those tender punishments which we bestow upon the Northern Atlantic. Give us, I repeat, the advantages of our position, as we give to you the advantages of yours, and do it not grudgingly.

Mr. President, I now turn to what was done for the French settlers and Polish exiles, as adverted to in the course of this debate. I had the laws before me at the moment they were referred to, but I confess my mind took a very different direction from what appeared to be to be the opinion on the other side of this House. From the legal argument which was made by one gentleman, I had at first inferred that we would have received some additional aid in the support of this question. But, sir, I little expected that the charity which induced Senators to vote a township of land, at the minimum price, and a credit of ten years to the unfortunate Polish exiles, would so soon have given way when a less gracious deed was to be done to our own citizens, mingled it might be with the few who who should seek to escape from the oppressions of foreign despotism. In that very vote, which I now have before me, are the names of many Senators who are now honored by seats upon this floor, and gave to that measure their sanction. I do not, sir, mean to find fault with that privilege and bounty act, nor with the punishment it must have inflicted upon the Atlantic, if the position be true, as taken in this debate, that this bill is one of punishments to the Atlantic States! That at required no declaration of their intention to become citizens, nor have your land laws ever required such a proceeding on the part of the purchasers, of whatever country they might be. Either the charity to those exiles was wrong then, or less charity to our own citizens, and to foreigners generally, the men of log cabins, is right now! There is no escape from this conclusion! As far as the question of any declaration of citizenship is involved, the policy of our law, as well as that more recent act of this august body, was doubtless founded upon the very rational presumption that foreigners who seek an asylum in our country would come as the natural enemies of tyranny. I am not unmindful of what I say. The principle which embraces the one completely covers the other. It is in vain to refer to poor, unhappy, dismembered, prostrate, and ruined Poland, rent asunder and trampled in the dust by the Autocrat of Russia, as sending forth upon us higher claims, in the persons of her exiles, than other emigrants from every oppressive despotism of Europe. Nor do I agree with the suggestion made, that emigrant foreigners, who find here our outstretched arms, secretly retain their early prejudices in favor of kings and princes. This might apply to the tilled exile, but not to that laborer who fled to us for the protection of our laws, and the enjoyment of our liberties. He has no sympathy with power. The iron of resistance and of hatred has entered deep into his heart against the titular nobleman before whom he was compelled to bow, and against that king who had ruled him with a despot's rod. From the moment that he set his foot upon your shores, and beheld that glorious banner that waves above the dome of this Capitol, his allegiance to the land of his adoption entered into his heart, as a fixed principle, faithfully and forever; and when he feels the first tree of the far West, and treads upon the soil he can proudly call his own, an invading foe could only strike down the standard of liberty by passing over his dead or dying body.

Sir, why should not such men as those, as they have for more than forty years, mingle in the purchase of your lands; and if we could vote a township of land to the exiles of Poland, at a credit of ten years, and the lowest price, why not let our own countrymen enter the land for prompt payment? Why, too, sir, should we for the first time introduce odious exceptions in reference to aliens, never resorted to in all our legislation upon this subject? Sir, the poor of every land are the same. They are the lovers of liberty wherever you find them, because they have been made to taste the bitter cup of degradation. You have nothing to fear from such men! Such were the sires of that population which filled our victorious armies in the Revolutionary struggle. But, sir, we voted to the French settlers four townships of land, at a credit of fourteen years, for the minimum price, without exacting any condition of naturalization. The possession and occupancy of land seems to imply in our legislation that this act will follow as a matter of choice on the part of the individual. Any interposition at this day is obviously unnecessary, when no inconvenience has ever arisen from the present state of our laws.

The importance which has been given to this part of the subject, has induced me to call the attention of the Senate to the special legislation which we have made in those cases, without deeming it necessary to alter our general rules, in the slightest particular. Sir, I am fully sensible of what may be said for Poland, the country of Kosciuszko and of Pulaski—a country which seemed destined, at one period of her history, to take the lead of all the continent of Europe in the march of the right of suffrage, and the equality of liberty, when her three hundred thousand men were assembled on the plains of Warsaw, and the negative of a single individual would have decided the power of her ruler. I never can forget she has a hero whose bones sleep in this land, consecrated by his blood; and, sir, I should, if I had had the honor of a seat upon this floor then, received the perishing exiles from her ruin with a generous heart and an open hand. But, sir, to what despotism in Europe can you not turn and behold like oppressions, and when the victim who has long writhed beneath the tyrant's grasp escapes to this happy land, will you begin now for the first time, to doubt his sincerity, and to place him under hitherto unknown exceptions?

Sir, for one, in the sense in which all our institutions have been a proclamation to the world, and in conformity with your long established policy, if the silence of the law in relation to aliens be a like proclamation, let them come and mingle with our people, and partake of the joys and the blessings of liberty. The only impress of despotism they will bring with them, will be that hatred of it which has been indelibly stamped upon their hearts. It is now too late, with our success and our experience, and the past sanctions of our law, to enter upon the first act of proscription of the foreign emigrant.

Mr. President, I regretted exceedingly to hear it intimated upon this floor, by some of those who belong to the recently triumphant party, that the settlers upon the public lands ought to be removed by force. It is true, sir, that in some sense they are trespassers, but without disturbing the public peace. By the very act of occupancy which has been here denounced, they add to the value of our national domain. If the design of such settlement was to prepare the way for asking the land as a gift, there would be some plausibility for the denunciation. But the first wish and the highest expectation of the settler is to become the purchaser. It is in the very philosophy of things, in a country like ours, whose free institutions awaken and bear up the spirit of aspiration from the humble hut, as well as the lofty palace, that the poor man, surrounded by his wife and his children, and animated by a holy love of those endeared objects, with a pure conscience and a resolved purpose, relying upon his own unassisted arm, should go forth to the wilds of the far West to improve his fortunes, and confirm his personal independence. He meets, there, men like himself, who have entered upon that new experiment with the same ardent hopes and lively expectations. A common lot, and common sufferings, band these settlers together, and they love each other next to those whom God hath specially committed to their charge! Such, sir, are the men whom it is proposed to drive from their homes! Whence, sir, and whither, would you march an army? What part of the broad territory of the West would it traverse in order to reach the point of attack? I tell you public opinion would drive back your cohorts, and the man who should attempt such a measure is not so high but that same public opinion would drag him to the dust with scorn and indignation! My friend from Missouri [Mr. LINN] was right—the deed can never be done!

Mr. President, there was another view of this subject taken by gentlemen on the other side with which I do not concur. It has been said that there was no danger to be apprehended on our extended Western frontier. The twenty-six thousand Indian warriors whom our policy has assembled there, it has been said, are perfectly harmless, and that, instead of directing their arms against us, they will sweep California. This has been said in answer to the argument that this bill should pass in order to induce emigration to our most remote borders. I confess, sir, in this aspect of the subject I look upon it as presenting some of the most imposing questions which can occupy the attention of the American statesman. If we attempt to consider it as a subject of finance only, we carry it far below the standard to which it advances in the great scale of our interests. It is almost, sir, next in magnitude to the question of peace or war. I look upon its failure, if it is to be followed by the prevention of settlements on the public lands, as pregnant with vast and unknown mischiefs, and its success as certainly to be the ultimate means of procuring safety and protection to a long line of inland and undefended frontier, which cannot, in any other way, be secured against the invasion of the savage. If, however, the love of money must prevail, I entreat gentlemen to look through the rapid and protracted march of events it will produce, and when they have subjected the measure to the test of practical scrutiny, it will be found to be the most profitable scheme for the sale of the public lands that has ever yet been devised. When they calculate the difference between the interest on the amount of moneys which would be received under the old system, at particular periods, extending for more than fifty years, and that sum which would be realized by prompt and rapid sales under this law, I think it must be seen there would be little reason in a financial aspect to resist its passage.

But as a measure of policy, by which settlements will be invited to your most remote borders, along which you shall form a living and massive rampart of bold and hardy men, its importance can only be estimated by a review of the actual condition of our frontier; the relations between us and the hundred Indian tribes who hover like a storm upon our Western horizon, and the great interests of the civilized world, which in the adjustment of its balances may finally precipitate upon us the mightiest power of the earth. The proposition is startling and imposing, but not more startling than true.

Sir, how is it that we can assume the fact that the Indian tribes are harmless? The history of our country, passing from its first settlement through the war of the Revolution, and the second war of independence, is replete with contradictory evidence to any such supposition. Peace! Peace! Security with the Indian! It is but a dream! He but proposes for a season in the enjoyment of your favors until that day shall arrive when he flushes with the hope of blood and revenge. The recollection of the injuries you have inflicted—the lands you have taken—the wounded pride you have humbled, the very tribute under which you have placed him, keeps the fire of hatred unquenched, and fiercely burning in his bosom! He will receive your gifts, extend his hand for your annuities, but instead of turning his face upon the bleak passes of the Rocky Mountains, and descending upon the coast of California, he will patiently await the period, when events, guided by the potent hand of his old ally, shall call him to the war-path and the battle field. He will then remember, not your bounties, but your triumphs, and he will prepare, in a more formidable shape than at any former period, for uniting his kindred tribes in one solid league against your frontier brethren. The annuities which you so bountifully bestow upon them exert but a friendly influence, where no other more powerful agency is brought to act upon their councils. Their civilization too, in which some of them, at least, are rapidly advancing, is but the instrument of removing the barriers between you and them in your more social relations, but cannot at its present stage have any influence upon a question of war, which is the natural element of the Indian. His daily pursuits of the wild game of the forest or the prairie, is but the inspiring mimicry of war, and so in the midst of peace, the habit (the controlling power of man after all) is kept fresh, inspired and vigorous. We have, sir, an illustration of what I say in one of the most memorable and graphic incidents of Indian history. At the commencement of our last war with Great Britain, we were paying to the Indian tribes ample annuities. The Creek, the most powerful of his kindred, shared largely of our bounty, but it had no repressing effect upon his hostile spirit. That intrepid man, whom you, Mr. President, met in that battle field which has given immortal honor to the living and the dead, joined them in their national councils, and turned their love of peace to the fierce spirit of war. It was not the witchery of his eloquence, but, sir, the witchery of their passions! Their love of war! Their hatred of the border man! He went forth as the ally and the agent of a great power, and some kindred spirit of his will be found to act the same part, with the consolidated Indian tribes, in the future drama of the frontier, whenever sufficiently active and skilful appliances are brought home to their prejudices, their habits, and their passions.

But, Mr. President, I consider the question of danger upon our extended Western frontier, which has been treated as utterly illusory, as having its origin in the present progress of international events which no skill can avoid, and no human arm can stay. I refer, sir, to the relations between ourselves and Great Britain. I refer to her interests, the position she occupies in the affairs of mankind, and the power which sooner or later she will be called on to exert.

I do not wish to be misunderstood. I concur most fully in the opinions expressed by my friend from Missouri [Mr. LINN] in the debate of this morning, upon another subject, in which he adverted to the action of that Government towards us. He expressed his opinion that, for the present, she had no designs of a hostile character; but while this was apparent, she was not the less earnestly engaged in pushing her settlements to every point of our pacific territory, from the waters of the Oregon to California; and for the peculiar purposes of her far trade, and other ulterior objects, not yet developed, she had extended her laws to every portion of the West, even where we held the right of eminent domain, within the Indian possessions.

Sir, there is no movement of the British Government in regard to ourselves which is not marked by a wise and careful looking forward to the future; and no man can have given a profound attention to her history, without perceiving that her position is intrinsically difficult and great. For the present, she prefers our friendship, and needs the moral countenance of every disinterested people of Christendom. It is entirely reasonable to suppose that her able statesmen understand her complicated relations, and the intricate line of action she has to pursue in the present pressing and maturing affairs of the world; and nothing short of a stupid diplomatic blunder, joined to bad temper, could possibly involve us now in a war, when it is the obvious interest and the desire of both to maintain peace. I do not mean by this that Great Britain is anxious to expedite the adjustment of our differences; but the questions which present themselves on the surface of our intercourse, are not those upon which she is disposed, at present, to take on any very high excitement. It is most probable she would prefer to leave them open to the accession of other causes, until the time and the occasion shall be ripe for her to assume a very different attitude. Without intending to trace the motives of her future action, it is plain that, although we may have peace with her for ten, or perchance fifteen years, which, however, I think, pretracts the supposition beyond the probability, we may confidently expect that our commerce and navigation will interpose such rival interests to her progress in every quarter of the globe, which is made accessible to our enterprise, that she will then be ready to invent the ways and means to hasten the conflict. At present she is occupied with watching a nearer and more formidable power—a power made so by herself, in the height of her prejudice, and the violence of her passion. The moment she struck the falchion from the hand of the Gaelic Cæsar, and plucked from his brow the iron crown of Lombardy, she felt and perceived her error, and hastened to adjust herself to the movements of that other rival dominion, which rose unmatched, as that ascendant genius sunk beneath the horizon. It is now more than twenty years since that remarkable event, and the Autocrat of Russia, pursuing the unavowed end of a profound policy, and with signal success passing onward from his frozen region to the East and the South, has transferred the question of the balance of power from the old seat of its adjustment in Europe, to Asia and Africa. In this grand drama, England is cast as an actor having the deepest stake and greatest agency, and she is preparing to play her part with an energy that never tires, and a wisdom that never forsakes her. Of her final triumph in any great struggle like this with European nations, I have not the slightest doubt; and if, in the progress of events, it shall become necessary, she will dictate the terms of peace in the plains of Anatolia, and with one foot planted in Egypt, and the other in China, flushed with conquest, and possessing an empire upon which the sun in his wide career never sets, she will present herself in the full panoply of war, not only as she now is, the most formidable power of the world—but our most formidable rival of the world. It is in that attitude of things that I contemplate the rival destinies between England and ourselves! It is a conflict that is fixed and inevitable, unless the spirit of justice and forbearance, and of kindred feeling, which, Heaven send, shall prevail in the mutual councils of these nations. And, Mr. President, humble and inconsiderable as this measure may be in contrast with such mighty events, it can be made to form a great and leading link in the defence which you will be called on to make in that great contest! What, in that event, is to prevent England passing from Asia to the Pacific coast, and crossing the Rocky mountains to precipitate an allied army of disciplined veterans, and enraged Indians upon your Western borders. Sir, it is no impracticable undertaking to a power possessing the position and the means of Great Britain. The resources to supply an army in the country to be penetrated, are inexhaustible. That movement would be met by a correspondent line of action on the part of the British Fur Companies, in order to bring into requisition, every Indian warrior beyond the Mississippi. Let us not forget that Great Britain has already her standard at the mouth of the Oregon, as if the spirit of prophecy was upon her! And shall we hesitate upon a line of policy to which we are bound, as well from the danger that has sprung from our own hand, as by those which must follow from the natural course of events? Shall we hesitate upon a line of policy, which, if it prevailed no where else, we are solemnly bound to establish upon that Western frontier! The Indians are in a concentrated body there, by our act, and England occupies the Oregon by our connivance!

Such, sir, is the answer I have to make to those who think there is no danger upon our Western frontier, and such are the views I entertain in regard to this question, and whether considered as affecting the private happiness of individuals, or the public prosperity of the country, it seems to me a wise forecast demands of us the passage of this measure. The time will come, I have no doubt, when all individual opinion will give way to the progress of events, and I humbly trust, that our legislation will be such, that those who come after us will find reason to rejoice that the policy we now propose has fulfilled the just and ample expectations of its advocates—the poor and the industrious befriended, and the public prosperity promoted.

The following remarks were submitted by Mr. PRENTISS when the above bill was under consideration on Monday, the 4th instant.

Mr. PRENTISS said he did not intend to enter at all into the general policy of pre-emption laws. He deemed it altogether unnecessary to do so, because that question had been discussed at length, and very fully, on former occasions, and every member must have made up his mind decisively upon it. His object was merely to state, and bring distinctly to the notice of the Senate, the main particulars which distinguished this bill from all other laws which had been passed upon the subject, and which, in his opinion, rendered it singularly and exceedingly objectionable.

It was well known that he had not looked upon pre-emption laws with much favor; that he had been opposed to the whole system, and had uniformly voted against every bill of the kind, believing, as he did, that the system was wrong in principle, unsound in policy, and incompatible with the public interest, as well as with every consideration of justice. But if he had entertained a different opinion, and had given his assent to the laws which had been previously passed, he could not be prevailed upon to yield his support to a measure of so extraordinary a character as the present one.

The first and most essential particular (said Mr. P.) which distinguished this bill from all former laws was, that it was prospective and permanent, holding out an invitation to persons from all quarters of the world to settle upon the public lands, and to endure for all time to come. The laws heretofore enacted had been entirely retrospective in their operation, confined to cases of past settlement, and had professedly held out no encouragement to future intrusions upon the public domain. Mr. P. wished to know whether the Senate was prepared to depart from the policy hitherto invariably acted upon, and to carry it to the extraordinary extent contemplated by this bill. For one, he must say that he was unwilling to make the public lands an object of scramble and plunder, not only by our own citizens, but by aliens and foreigners.

Former laws had been framed in such a way as to guard against frauds, and to effectuate the professed intention of the laws. The act of 1838 defined what should constitute a settlement. It required a possession by personal residence on the land at the time of passing the act, and for four months next preceding. The present bill gave the right of pre-emption, generally, to all persons who should "inhabit and improve the land, and raise a log cabin thereon," without specifying what should amount to an inhabitation or improvement, or containing any limitation as to the extent of the improvement or the duration of the inhabitation. The bill, in this respect, was extremely vague and indefinite; and it was difficult to perceive what there was to prevent any one who should erect a temporary cabin, plant perhaps a rod or two of ground, and camp upon it a week or so, from securing to himself a title to the exclusion of all others. It was obvious that the facilities to fraud would be great; and it required no uncommon discernment to see that speculators and jobbers, rather than bona fide actual settlers, would receive the principal benefits of such very liberal legislation. Slight acts of settlement would answer the purpose, and nothing would be easier than for capitalists, men of wealth, to plant hordes of squatters upon the public lands, one here and another there, and in that way monopolize to themselves the choicest and most valuable tracts in the whole extent of the public domain. The last pre-emption law which had been passed was carefully guarded in this particular. It required from every person claiming the benefit of the law an affidavit that he entered upon the land exclusively for his own use and benefit, and not for the use or benefit of any other person, and that he had not agreed or contracted, directly or indirectly, to convey or transfer it to any other person. The present bill contained no provision of that sort, or indeed any security whatever against abuses, but left the way open and unobstructed to the practice of the most extended fraud and speculation. It was further to be observed that there was no limitation as to the time of payment for the land, and the settler might hold and enjoy his right to it not only for many years, under a credit without interest, but it might be for an indefinite period of time. The interests of the United States were not properly or sufficiently secured in several other respects which might be mentioned, but it was hardly worth while to go further into details.

The bill (Mr. P. said) was a measure, in his view, of a new and very extraordinary character. It was not only prospective and permanent, but most extensive in its operation. It covered the whole public domain. It extended to lands surveyed and unsurveyed. It exposed the richest portions of any and all to be picked and selected, to be seized upon and taken up, at the inconsiderable price of a dollar and a quarter an acre, as well to gratify the avarice and cupidity of greedy, rapacious speculators, as to satisfy the wants of the needy but hard laboring and meritorious cultivator. It would supersede and put an end to the whole land system; a system almost coeval with the Government, which had been in successful operation nearly half a century, had been tested and approved by long experience, and the beneficial effects of which had been seen and felt by all. To a measure of such tremendous import, involving consequences so much at variance with public policy, so seriously affecting one of the great interests of the country, Mr. P. would repeat, he could not give his assent.

MONDAY, January 11, 1841.

The question being upon the instructions moved by Mr. CRITTENDEN, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill be recommended to the committee that reported it, with instructions to report amendments thereto to the following effect:

1st. To distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States of the Union in just and equitable proportions.

2d. To grant to actual bona fide settlers upon the public lands the right of pre-emption to any quantity thereof not exceeding one half section, or 320 acres, including place of settlement, at the minimum price of $1 25 per acre, with such provisions as shall limit this right of settlement and pre-emption to actual bona fide settlers whose estate at the time of settlement shall not exceed the value of $1,000: and further with such provisions as shall effectually exclude the wealthy speculators from all benefits under this law, and shall prevent them from interfering with, or participating in, the privilege, and right of settlement and pre-emption which are hereby granted and intended for the sole advantage of the needy and honest settlers and cultivators of the soil.

Mr. CRITTENDEN addressed the Senate in reference to the instructions he had moved. He said he could declare, with great candor, that he had not made the motion to recommit with any expectation of delaying the Senate in its action on the bill; and was not a little surprised at the unexpected effect of that motion on the temper of a portion of the Senate. It had not been his wish that the instructions with which he had accompanied his motion should have given rise to so much discussion as had occurred. The proposition was a perfectly plain one; it spoke for itself. He would consent to vote for allowing the bona fide settler to have his land at the minimum price, free from the interference of the wealthy speculator, and therefore he proposed so to amend the bill as to confine its operation to the man who could make oath that his whole property did not exceed the value of $1,000. He would go for a pre-emption law if gentlemen would consent to unite with it the distribution principle.

Mr. BENTON made some remarks in reply, which were given in our paper of the 12th instant.

Mr. MANGUM of North Carolina said he was far from concurring with the honorable Senator [Mr. Benton] in the opinion that there was any incongruity between the bill under consideration, and the proposed amendment; and far less did he concur in the justice or the propriety of denouncing the amendment as monstrous, as an unfair mode of assault, as, in short, an enormity. The truth is, (said Mr. M.) there is no one who looks at the various movements which are made in relation to the public lands, and the various questions which come up here, that does not perceive that a consideration of one of them necessarily and properly calls up the consideration of all the rival and alternative propositions.

As to the pre-emption bill now before the Senate, it is impossible to form a just estimate of it, and come to right conclusions, unless we consider it in connection with all the other measures of its friends—unless we consider it (as it is) a part of a great system—as an element in the great scheme of a definitive and ultimate disposition of the vast public domain of the country.

It is, in truth, in the language of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. Anderson,] the first step to a final disposition of the public domain. I thank the Senator for this explicit and manly avowal of the purposes and views of the friends of this measure. The first step to a final disposition of the public domain! Yes, sir; it is the first step in the race where each struggles to be first in the great work of squandering and scattering this more than princely domain to all the winds of Heaven, by bestowing it in largesses, by giving it to schemers and speculators, and inviting to its occupation all the ends of the earth, the bandit of the Apennines, the mercenary Swiss, the hungry loafer of the cities of the Old World, the offal of the disgorged jails, penitentiaries, and houses of correction of foreign countries—all, all are invited by this bill to mingle with our American citizens, and seize upon the public lands, and appropriate them, excluding the old States, whose property in common with their sisters they are, from any substantial and equal participation in this common property of them all.

I confess, said Mr. M. that I am at a loss to determine which is the most objectionable, the principle or the details of this bill. To me, it seems the crudest, the most de-jure, and the least safely guarded that I have ever known to be introduced into the Senate. It being, however, a sort of wholesale disposition of this vast property, without equivalent or consideration, the details can be of but little moment, except to exhibit to a curious observer what vast results may be found in connection with the weakest bungling.

This bill goes to revolutionize the whole system of pre-emption itself, as that has heretofore existed, and in the end to abrogate the whole land system, which has been built up and consolidated through a series of years, by so much care and labor, and which has extorted praise and eulogium from all sides of this Chamber. Heretofore, when settlement had gone in advance of a regular disposition of the public lands, and the hardy pioneers had shown evidence of good citizenship by habits of honest labor, Congress, out of tenderness for the citizen, and a scrupulous desire that every one should enjoy the avails of his own labor, have overlooked the original intrusion, and in a liberal and parental spirit given the right of pre-emption, so that every one might continue to enjoy the humble dwelling and other improvements, the result of the sweat of his own brow and the work of his hands. This was pure bounty, unmixed gratuity, conferred by a Government unwilling to repress or thwart the energies and enterprise of these hardy men, who had sought upon the dark brow of the wilderness a resting place for their wives and their children. It was a kind of concession to the restless energies of this Anglo-American race of ours, which, though a little too unobservant of the rights of others, yet had the hearts, the hands, the wishes, the purposes, and the patriotic aspirations of American citizens—a race that loved their country, loved liberty, and were ready to peril all they had in enterprises, dangerous or otherwise, in defence of their country. It may be that, in any aspect, financial or political, the occasional and judicious interposition of Congress in their behalf was wise, as most indubitably it was kind, liberal, and parental. All these cases were retrospective, overlooking initiative error, and quieting these hardy pioneers in their homes, their titles, and all the fruits of their labor. If this legislation was somewhat unjust to the old States, yet it was kind, and upon the whole may not have been unwise.

But now, for the first time, it is proposed to hold out standing lures and temptations to the whole world to come and seize upon our public domain. To sustain this sweeping prospective measure I have heard doctrines avowed more objectionable than the measure itself, from which my judgment revolts, and which, I am confident, could they be submitted directly to the whole American people, would be indignantly, if not contemptuously, rejected. I say this bill invites the whole world, aliens as well as citizens, to come and take possession of our public domain; and how? Under any rule? According to any uniform regulation? No, no, sir. The bounty is held out to the swiftest foot and the strongest arm; these are to seize, and defend what has been seized, with all the means that God and Nature have placed in their hands. And all this worst of confusion and demoralization to be sanctioned by this grave body; ay, to be invited, solicited by our legislation.

If we were a weak and feeble nation, physically unable to defend our liberties, we might indeed hold out inducements to foreigners to bring to our assistance the protection of their physical force. But has it come to this: that we are obliged to invite foreigners to assist us in the defence of our heritage of liberty? To bring amongst us the arts of civilization? To enhance our power, either moral or physical? Can any one believe that we are reduced to a necessity like that? No, sir. The friends of this measure would cast back such a taunt with scorn and indignation. What then? Can any one doubt that this bill is the first step towards the squandering and wasting the public domain, so far as the old States are concerned? That the new States feel as a fetter, that galls their over-excited sensibility, the claim of the old States to land within their limits? To get rid of this, and to make the destruction of the rights of the old States sudden and complete, it is proposed to invest with the highest privilege of American freemen foreigners not naturalized. To give to alien strangers, who will come and take, what indisputably belongs to all the States in common. And this to assuage a painful sensibility, an over-wrought pride, that will concede nothing to those who have given them every thing. As if not content with the desecration of our rights of property, it is contended that these favored aliens shall also exercise the rights of suffrage—the highest rights of freemen, and be endowed by these States with the elective franchise, in disregard of Congress and all the co-States.

I mean not (said Mr. M.) to go into the argument of this incidental question, momentous and alarming as it would be, did we not feel confident that it will ever be met by the real people of the United States with a stern and uncompromising resistance. The doctrine is anti-national; it is incompatible with the very conception of a political community endowed with the power of perpetuating its institutions. No nation that I know of, that had risen to the dignity of an independent community, ever tolerated the indiscriminate admission of foreigners and alien influences to a full participation in its elections and its government. What is our case? Who effected our Revolution? The people of the respective States. They had formed independent political communities. These States, before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, did of right exercise the power of determining who should be considered citizens and entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens. They further rightfully regulated the terms and conditions upon which aliens might be adopted in the community, with all the rights and privileges of free citizens. Who did, and might rightfully do, all this? The people of the States. Who could gainsay it? Could the Englishman, the Hollander, the Italian, or the Pole? Unquestionably not. Who then? None but the people of the States.

By the adoption of the Constitution, each State conferred upon the General Government, as a common agent, all those powers which it could better exercise for the benefit of the whole than could the States respectively for themselves; reserving to the States such as could be best exercised by and for themselves. This common agent had in charge all our foreign relations, and had the regulation of all our intercourse with foreign powers. This Federal Government and these State Governments were made by and for the people of the United States and their posterity. The power of passing uniform laws of naturalization of foreigners was conferred on the common agent—the Federal Government. This grant passed the whole power. Such was the opinion of the enlightened and able contemporaneous writers in the Federalist; such has been the uniform opinion of every respectable writer on constitutional law, as far as I know; such has been the exposition in a majority of the States, as I suppose; certainly such has been the exposition in North Carolina by all its authorities, judicial and legislative. The distribution of political power in the States, as well as the General Government, rests upon a right enumeration of the people of the respective States. Our whole political scheme rests upon it. It was provident, therefore, that, in a matter so immediately affecting the relative power of the State, there should be some uniform rule regulating accessions from abroad of aliens, with habits, feelings, and principles often alien, not to say hostile, to the genius and spirit of our institutions. Such a provision is conformable to the general sense of mankind in all ages in well-regulated political communities. Hence I regard the provision in the Constitution of Illinois as in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and of course void, and that a persistence in the enumeration of aliens as citizens, so as to affect the relations of political power between her and the other States, and the permitting of them to exercise the elective franchise so as to affect the action of the Government common to all the States, would be in bad faith and clearly violatory of their common bond.

The question is not whether Congress can prescribe the qualifications which shall constitute a voter in the States. No one contends for any such thing. The States can each prescribe for itself in every respect, except where inhibited by the conferring of the power on the General Government, and those who are empowered to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature may also vote for members of Congress, and none others. The only difficulty is, not in the non-existence, but in the application of the remedy, in cases where the States shall transcend their constitutional authority. Wherever the authorities of this Government can reach the case, they can apply the remedy. If aliens shall vote for a member of the House of Representatives, upon a question of contested election, the House may take jurisdiction and rectify the error.

[Here Mr. Wright of New York, asked what will you do in the case of a Senator elected to this body by a Legislature in part formed by the votes of aliens?]

Mr. M. said the only difficulty consisted in applying the remedy. In the case put, great difficulty and inconvenience might arise, perhaps insuperable—and so in many other cases that might be put. What would the Senator do in the case where a majority of the States should decline or refuse to elect Senators to this chamber? In the latter case it would operate at once to the destruction of the Government, and yet I know of no remedy. The truth is, in our complex political system, much has been left, and, of necessity, must have been left, to the good faith of the States, the authors and creators of our system. And perhaps in every case where a practical remedy is not provided, it was deemed safe to leave it to the good faith and good sense of the parties to the covenant. But I have turned aside to this incidental question mainly to enter my protest against the doctrines avowed; and to show that North Carolina, in that good faith which has always characterized her relations with this Government, holds that the adoption of the Federal Constitution has abrogated her constitutional provision for the naturalization of aliens, and that she may not swell her relative power in the Confederacy, either by the enumeration of aliens or the permitting of them to exercise the elective franchise.

I said in the outset that I found great difficulty in determining, in reference to the present bill, which was the more objectionable, its principle or its details. In respect to the latter, they have been exposed by various Senators so fully and clearly that "he who runs may read." When before now has it been proposed to hold out temptations and rewards to infants who by law owe allegiance to the head of their family? When before now has it been proposed, for the sake of encouraging emigration, to break up domestic relations—those primeval bonds of society which it is of so much importance to keep sacred and intact? The ambition that looks to the highest office in the Republic may have an interest in inviting into the mélée all infants that, at the end of the next four years, may be invested with the rights of suffrage. This bill holds out the same benevolent intentions towards widows. How excellent a virtue is benevolence! And how cheap, too, is the beneficence that confers bounties out of other people's goods and chattels, lands and tenements! But, like the witch's prophecy, while it keeps the promise to the ear, it breaks it to the hope. The whole is mere delusion—it is worse—it is imposture. Such widows as reside in the immediate neighborhood of the lands to be settled may possibly get the benefits of the bill, but the great body of the destitute widows throughout the Union, and especially on the Atlantic frontier, will not be benefited a stiver.

Again, there is another principle in the bill more objectionable. Its operation is extended to land unsurveyed. The entire alien population of the globe, as well as our citizens, are invited and tempted into our national domain before a chain carrier has entered upon it. Proclamation is made to all to come and seize upon our best spots, and they shall keep whatever they take. Has any Government in the world acted upon a principle like this? Must it not inevitably lead to riot, bloodshed, and general confusion? Where have ever such lures been held out to alien interlopers, bandits, and scapegraces of foreign lands to come and seize upon so rich an inheritance, and hold it by strong arm, or at the muzzle of the rifle? All they are required to do is to come upon the land, to build a log cabin or some other dwelling, and call it a settlement, and the right of pre-emption is fixed. How long are they required to occupy? A week, or a day, is sufficient; for no specific length of time is required by the bill. How many settlements may be made by the same person? The bill as introduced prescribed no limitation. A reluctant limitation to one in the same State has been imposed by a vote of amendment; yet the same person may make the tour of all the frontier barrier of States and Territories, and in each the work of a day may secure a quarter section of land in the most favored spots at the minimum price, and that, too, on a credit, to be paid whenever, and only whenever, the convenience of the enterprising and travelled gentleman may seem best to admit of it. What a broadcast waste and squandering of this vast national property! The waste would be a reproach to the age; and the consequent riots, feuds, and confusion would mark this measure as an epoch in the career of profligate wastefulness of a discomfited, deflated, and desperate Administration. True it is, by an amendment, the same person shall be entitled to but pre-emption. But what may hinder him from getting one in each and every State and Territory? Where are the guards? What check is provided? None, not one!

One of the amendments declares that a man may not move off from a settled home and get a pre-emption by going on the public land in the same State. What prohibits his doing the thing by going into the next State or Territory? or all the other States and Territories? It is declared to be for the benefit of the poor; and yet a man on a fraction of forty acres may not have the benefit, while the wealthiest money-holder may avail himself of the privilege. Admirable equality. The friends of the measure have refused to confine these bounties to the poor; worth not more than $1,000 or $500, and yet the man fixed to a poor spot of little value, with his wife and children, shall be inhibited, while the rich in bank stock, money, or other personal estate, shall enjoy it. This is one of the beauties of a scheme conceived in a spirit of such ardent devotion to the interests of the poor and laboring man.

But an objection yet stronger, if possible, exists to the mode of adjusting and settling the disputes arising from conflicting claims among these settlers. The mode proposed in the bill is quite characteristic of the principles of the past and the present Administration which now lies stranded. It brings the masses of conflicting claims which now must arise under this bill within the range of Executive determination to be despatched summarily and with a sort of military celerity—the Executive agent disposing of a complicated and knotty question of private right with the facility that he would wheel a squadron of well-disciplined political troops. Sir, it erects a new sort of judicature, with vast and unrestrained powers, taking within the scope of its jurisdiction vast and complicated interests.

The registers and receivers of the land districts, subject to the regulation of the head of the land office, are to dispose of all the questions of conflicting claim in a summary way. Can any one fail to perceive that here is held out every conceivable lure, and temptation to fraud; that the bill opens the way to a regular system of corruption; that these powers will be devolved on men not most distinguished generally for ability, and yet with duties overtaking the highest ability? Will it not tend to corrupt both the Government and its dealers? May it not be wielded so as to subjugate the entire frontier, from the lakes to the gulf, to the will of their politico-judicial masters? A dozen men make a rush for a mill seat or water privilege or salt spring, and in case the rifle and bowie knife shall fail as judicial instruments to settle the controversy, then the appeal lies to this other eccentric judicial tribunal of the registers and receivers, whose judgments are to be final and definitive. I suppose we need not fear that the sword of Brennus, or the bowie knife, or other extraneous matters, will be thrown into the judicial scales.

But this is a log cabin bill. In its title it purports to be especially for the tenants of log cabins. Its friends are friends of the log cabin; it is designed to confer a bounty on the great body of those poor men who have no means to better their condition but to settle on a little spot of wild land and build themselves a log cabin. Yes! it is to provide a home for the log cabin men, for the poor, hard handed, honest, industrious settler! Admirable beneficence! I am glad to see gentlemen's sympathies awakened for this great body of our citizens—the greatest, indeed, whether we regard them for physical force, devoted patriotism, or for those homely, simple, primitive, untainted, and genuine virtues so much out of fashion in the saloons of the great and powerful. I respect them, I esteem them, and I would cherish them to the extent of my ability. Yet with what consistency have we seen the gentlemen act who hold to us this language? Will they consent to a $500 limitation? No. To a $1,000 limitation? No, sir. They invite to competition with them, not only the wealthy of our own country, but the whole world, of every tongue and clime, whether they come in rags or purple and fine linen.

And yet they talk as if the bill were especially for the poor. Who can believe it? Or who does not believe and know that the bill is what one of its friends described it, [Mr. ANDERSON,] the first step towards a final disposition of the public domain?

I am not, indeed, disposed, either as a private individual or a public man, to regard the public domain purely in a financial view. The General Government holds these lands as a trust. They should administer, or rather execute, this trust reposed in them, justly, but with liberality.

I am not for restricting the system to such rules as bind a master in chancery. I would, if I could, elevate myself to the position of a statesman. I would regard the public domain as a trust, in which all the States have an equal interest. While I am just, I would be liberal; but while liberal, I would be just. I ask, what right has this Federal Government to administer this trust but in such a manner that it shall inure to the benefit of all the States? Where do gentlemen find their authority? Nowhere.

To judge rightly of this specific measure, we must consider it in connection with the graduation bill. And who can doubt that the two united will cut deeply into the financial resources of the country?—but they will deduct large sums from the fiscal means of this Government? What is the first step in the practical operation of this bill? In the first place, all the lands likely to bring a price over the minimum established by law will be seized on forthwith, not only by our own citizens, but by the renegades and aliens of the old world. And then what remains—what gentleman call the refuse lands—will be brought under the auctioneer's hammer on behalf of the Government. Who will bid. No one. What next? These lands having been offered, and remaining unsold, the auction system will be withdrawn from them, and they will then be subjected to the Procrustean operation of the graduation system, descending rapidly from $1 to 50 cents, 25 cents, and 12½ cents, and then an unconditional surrender of the residue to the States respectively in which they lie. The average amount of the auction sales under the present Administration does not much exceed the minimum price. But let all the lands which in the first place would sell at prices greatly exceeding the minimum go off at the minimum; and then apply the graduation principle to the residue; is it not plain that the average income from auction sales would be greatly below the minimum?

On this subject my attention has been recently drawn to a very valuable and important paper, which discloses that system of delusion which has for many years been played off upon the public mind; such a systematic scheme of deception and imposture as I never could have believed to exist, had it not been proved by official documents. I refer to what has been constantly told us in reference to this principle of graduation. I will not detain the Senate by going through all the details, though they eminently deserve the most careful and attentive consideration, and I hope will have it from those more familiar with the subjects than I am; and if a gross delusion has been practised, as I conceive, for years upon the old States, I trust it will be corrected.

I find that, in pursuance of a resolution adopted by the Senate, the head of the land bureau caused returns to be made of all the public lands unsold, in the respective States and Territories, accompanied with such other information as was deemed useful in forming a just estimate of the value of this great national property. I find that, on the 30th of June 1828, there remained in Ohio 2,584,347 acres of public land unsold. The land officers estimated the value of this more than two and a half millions of acres, at $1,747,126, or nearly one million and three-quarters of dollars. These lands had been offered and in market from seven to twenty-eight years, but little less than the half of them had been in market twenty years and upwards. They are represented as inferior, and to effect sales the prices ought to be graduated. Well, sir, on the 30th of September, 1837, some nine years thereafter, upwards of two millions of acres of these lands had been sold at the minimum of $1 25 per acre, realizing to the Treasury $2,726,599—exceeding the estimates of the officers, who ought to have been well informed, by the sum of $979,473, or nearly one million of dollars; here then remaining on hand nearly five hundred thousand acres, the most of which has since been sold at the Government price.

I find similar startling discrepancies between the estimated values and the sums actually realized from sales, applying to Indiana, Illinois, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri. In the St. Louis land district of Missouri, I find that on the 30th June, 1828, there remained of public lands unsold 2,219,426 acres. These lands were represented as having been in market under the Spanish Government for forty years, and under this Government for ten years. It was further represented that they had been so "picked and culled" that there did not remain one quarter-section of first-rate land. They were valued at different prices, but the great mass at 12½ cents per acre. The total value was estimated at $333,000, or about the third of a million of dollars.

Well, sir, again. On the 30th September, 1837, or about nine years thereafter, the Treasury had realized $711,000 from these lands, a sum exceeding the estimated value of the whole of them by three hundred and seventy-eight thousand dollars, and leaving then unsold 1,600,000 acres, much of which, but how much I am unable to state, has been since sold at the Government price.

I have selected the St. Louis district simply because there we find a great bulk of intelligence, and might have expected more correct information from that than almost any other district, and yet from that what a startling difference between the estimates and the facts? I well remember how, nearly twenty years ago, these lands were invoked in favor of a graduation bill, and how solemnly we were assured that the lands on which it was intended to operate never would bring the minimum price. It was argued in reply, and I thought with great appearance of truth, that, as the country should come to be gradually settled, and lines of communication should be opened by turnpikes and railroads, or other facilities afforded for the transportation of produce, the unsold lands would come by degrees to be contiguous to infant settlements, and would then go off at the Government price. In a dense population, every foot of land fit for cultivation, though poor, which yields any sort of timber, will go off at that price, in many instances, if for no other reason than to keep off a too near and inconvenient settlement.

In looking into the history of our settlements, it will be found generally, if not universally, true, that, as the country fills with population, the inferior and refuse lands come to be prized, and go off. And so, precisely in proportion as the population advances westwardly, and fills each locality, in the same proportion does land once regarded refuse go off. And so it will be to the end, excepting only those lands covered with irreclaimable swamps, or some other obstacle of like difficulty.

Such has been the experience of the old States. In my own, in the portion that I know best, lands that had been much worn fifty or eighty years ago, turned out and recovered with a new growth, cannot be bought any where, there, as low as the Government price.

Sir, the grasping propensities of this Anglo-American race of ours, with its Anglo-Saxon blood, (said, I believe, sir, to be the greatest land robbers in the world,) would give the Government price, ay, and more, when the density of population threatened too near a propinquity of some disagreeable neighbor.

In Alabama, I find, from this table, the most singular and extraordinary results. There the population has filled, and is yet filling. In the Cahawba district nearly all the lands have been sold for three, four, and five times the amount of the estimated value by the land officers in 1828. And so it will be to the end. To the base of the Rocky Mountains, and when you shall have scaled their lofty summits, and passed to the western base, so it will continue to be, until the restless energies of our people shall be stayed by the broad Pacific. I would invoke the serious attention of Senators, more conversant with these subjects than I am, to the marked contrast between the estimates in 1828, and the actual results as proved by the sales. I will ask their attention to the singular accuracy with which the predictions of the opponents of graduation have been verified by the results. In Ohio they have been completely tested and verified. In Indiana, not so fully; but the experience is in a rapid process of development, and all the indications augur similar results. In Missouri, the experiment is in its initiative process, but so far as it has gone it gives the most flattering promise of results equally satisfactory. And so of all the rest.

There is another feature of the bill to which I feel no less objection; and which has been animadverted on by the Senator from Kentucky, near me, [Mr. CLAY.] I think it presents a strong objection to the bill. The Government once felt severely the inconvenience of the credit system in reference to the sale of our public lands. Its evils will not soon be forgotten. This bill revives that credit system, and substitutes it, to a great extent, for the cash system now existing. It extends credit, professedly, to one entire class of purchasers, and practically and substantially to all. A man seizes on a tract of land before he pays for it, and is to pay for it within a year. How are you to get rid of him if he does not pay? When the "Convention of the World," held in London, shall send here all its constituents, how are you to get rid of them if they fail to pay for their land? Does not your bill convert the system of cash payments into a system of credit? And what will be the consequence? We shall have petitioners besieging this and the other House of Congress; hosts of sturdy beggars, petitioning for a long day, then to take a part of our dues, and finally to forgive them their debt. We have seen all this; and are likely, should the bill pass, to see it again.

We all remember the effect of the national plethora in 1818 and 1819. You know how your ear was vexed with perpetual petitions; until at last you were wearied out, and you gave up 33½ of your demand, and allowed the debtors a long time to make up the balance. So it will be here. If a man pays you in cash, it will be a matter of voluntary liberality. All the better land which might sell well at auction will be at once seized upon, and credit of necessity ensues.

Gentlemen complain of the illiberality of the old States. They call them Shylocks, and say we demand our pound of flesh, and all that. I repel such imputations, as far as they are directed against me. I participate as largely in the pride excited by the progress of our Western States as the proudest of all our Western men. I see with wonder and joy the daily developments of that vast portion of our country, and I am fully aware that it is ere long to become the centre of our political world. My constituents do not demand of me to become a Shylock in their name; they rejoice, as I do, in the hourly expansion of this great Republic; they exult in the extension of its population, bearing with it, in all directions, the arts of civilization, the love of liberty, and an adherence to our invaluable Constitution. We are prepared to go as far as gentlemen from the West themselves in doing all that can with justice be done to give a stimulus to the growth of the new States of the Confederacy. But really, with, I acknowledge, but a very slight opportunity of forming an opinion, it does seem to me that the charge of illiberality is as little sustained by facts and reason as any accusation I ever witnessed in my life. What is the relation which these States bear to the Government while they yet remain in their state of territorial pupillage? Have they not all been in succession the firstlings and the nurselings of Congress? Have we not dandled them upon the knees of patronage, rocked them in the cradle of indulgence, and fed them, like petted infants, with the money of this Government? If any thing, we have indulged them too fondly, till, like other pets, they have been in danger of becoming spoiled by over-much kindness. Who can deny that the West has ever been treated, here, with the utmost liberality? Never have they asked for either public or private aid at our hands and been refused. We have given them lands and money, and we have poured forth the chivalry of the old States for their defence in danger. Surely they have no just grounds of complaint. Against me they certainly have not, for I am ready to lend them all the aid in my power toward attaining that commanding position which it is their destiny to attain.

But what, I ask, is likely to be the effect of such a bill as this upon the older States? The public lands constitute a trust fund, to be administered for the benefit of all the States, and not, for the sake of throwing into the West a preternatural plethora of growth and prosperity, to inflict injustice and injury upon the rest of the Union. And yet what must be the effect of such a bill on the strength and prospects of the old States? The enterprising, the adventurous young men, will all flee to the West, and leave the old States to weakness and decrepitude, and we are to be left to support the comparatively inert mass which they leave behind. Yet, in all that tends to elevate the human character—in all that fosters moral and intellectual excellence, they might have enjoyed at least equal advantages, had they remained at home. Certain it is that North Carolina has poured forth into the West and Southwestern country a mass of talent and energy such as, had it remained there, would have enabled my State to lift her head as proudly as any one of her sisters in the great family of the Union. And ought it not to be the aim of this Government to infuse an equal degree of health and vigor into every portion of this wide Republic? Do our Western friends desire to see us impoverished, in order that they may be built up and strengthened? I well know that, should we be invaded by a foreign foe, or our honor or safety threatened with danger, the men of the West would be the first to hasten to our side. A more chivalrous people does not exist upon earth; and generosity is well known as forming a prominent feature in their character. And sure I am that, could they but abstract their minds for a moment from the force of that prejudice which has grown up with a false system of administration of the public lands, the new States would be the last to desire, by excessive and unnatural stimulus, to withdraw the resources and prostrate the strength of their venerable mothers on the Atlantic board.

I ask the friends of this bill to point out, if they can, one single compensation it offers to the old States for tempting their population, even lads of eighteen, to leave their homes and their parents and go into the new States. I know of none. I can perceive none, unless it be to leave to desolation the patrimonial fireside. None, none.

But we are told by my friend from Missouri [Mr. LINN] that it is indispensable that this system of pre-emptions should go on, because the American people cannot be restrained from seizing on the lands of the Government, and that all attempts to put a stop to it must be vain and idle. I confess I was surprised at hearing language like this. I had entertained a very different opinion indeed of the American people; and my life on it—knowing that gentlemen as I do to be brave, prompt, and resolute—I am confident that were he President of the United States, and should the law be openly resisted, he could and would enforce its execution.

[Mr. LINN, (speaking across.) I would resign first.]

Ay, the Senator might resign. The kindness of his heart and his habitual indulgence of the wishes of his constituents might induce it. That proves nothing. But his energy could arrest what his kindness might tolerate. I know very well that, when vast throngs of lawless settlers shall have been accumulated on the frontier, it would be an odious task, and abhorrent to the feelings of every American citizen, to attempt to remove them by the bayonet. Happily, there never has a human being in the country suffered death in such a struggle since the foundation of the Government. But I have no doubt that this enlightened and law-abiding people, differing as they do from the population of any nation under Heaven, would respect their own authority too much to resist their own laws. In Europe, indeed, obedience must be enforced by a forest of bayonets, and a park of artillery, but here, in this free, self-governed republic, there is no law but may be enforced by the constable and his staff. Among my countrymen, a little scrip of parchment in the hands of a plainly dressed, unarmed citizen, works like a charm; no sooner is it exhibited than the uplifted hand falls powerless to the side, and, like genuine descendants of the Anglo-Saxon race, it is their pride, their choice, their glory, to bow to the majesty of the laws. If, indeed, you allow whole States to be filled up by squatters—I beg pardon, I mean by gentlemen who think proper to set down on land which does not belong to them, and without any pretence of title—we may prefer to pass a retrospective pre-emption law to pressing our demand and standing upon the rights of the Government. But, for the future, let the President place upon our new lands, not his uninformed soldiers, with their bayonets, but a corps of his marshals and their tipstaves, and let the first intruder be brought up and tried. I have no doubt that even there a jury of the vicinage would convict and punish him.

[Mr. LINN here shook his head and said, "Never; it has been tried, over and over."]

Sir, the failure must have resulted from some injudicious mode of bringing up the matter. Let the naked questions to the jury, the isolated facts be, "whether there was intrusion into the lands," and "whether upon authority from this Government," and all that I dare to put upon it I would put, that the verdict would generally conform to the evidence. In that case, your judges would do the rest.

But the gentleman from Tennessee goes for the bill because "the great West must avail herself of her natural advantages." I once acted on that principle in behalf of North Carolina, in the memorable matter of the branch mints. That bill was to enable North Carolina to "avail herself of her natural advantages." Now, I never yet rightly understood what that phrase, "natural advantages," means; and I cannot admit the argument which is founded on it till I understand it a little better. And the more especially, since that incomprehensible abstraction, that oily phrase, betrayed me into one of the errors, not to say follies, into which I fear I fell when I formerly had the honor of a seat in this Chamber. The natural advantages of the West; in what? In mere contiguity to the public domain? Is that it? They must have the land because they are conveniently situated to take possession of it! Why, might not any loafer about New York streets plead the same argument? Is he not as near to the vaults of the banks as our good friends of the West are to the public domain? What peculiar right have they, who have already received so much of it as a donation, to take the whole, because it is near, while the old States are to get none of it, because they are far off?

There has scarce been a movement on the subject of these public lands within the last two years that has not produced in my mind a melancholy foreboding as to the successful working of our system of Government. No one can shut his eyes to the fact that these lands are made the subject of a mere political game, in which political leaders contend for the power of vying with each other as to who shall make the largest gift—who shall obtain the largest vote, from aliens and all. Some disposition must be made of this matter, if we would not be subjected to perpetual excitements. I have seen it employed long enough as a great stake, always brought into our party questions, and so it will continue to be until it can be finally and definitely disposed of, and I hope it soon may be.

I do not regard the introduction of the subject of distribution as at all incongruous to the present bill, nor do I regard the amendment the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] has notified us that he will offer, as presenting any incongruity. I mean not now to discuss either the one or the other. I have long since, however, had them under the maturest deliberation that I was capable of bestowing on them. I have fixed and satisfactory opinions in regard to both. They are part and parcel of this great matter of the public domain.

They all must be considered; they must be decided. These great interests, with all their disturbing influences, must be withdrawn from the keenly embittered and exciting contests for the highest office in the country; or these contests will lose their purity and dignity, and descend to the level of a scramble of mere mercenaries—a struggle between political janizaries on one side, and the honest, undisciplined, and generally betrayed people on the other.

But this is really a log cabin bill—a bill for the poor man. I could not but regret to hear these party "catch-words" introduced into this Chamber, and still less could I have desired to see them introduced, with a sort of flourish of trumpets, into the title of this bill. But as they have been dragged in and pressed forward into prominence, it may be proper for us all to deal with them.

I may say, then, that I am pleased to see gentlemen on the other side taking lessons on this subject of log cabins. They have much aptitude, and I doubt not, with perseverance, that they may come, in time, to a respectable proficiency. They have manifested, on former occasions, a very commendable alacrity, not to say some sparkles of genius—perhaps that is too strong a word, if genius is supposed to be conversant with novelty and variety—in seizing upon certain "catch-words," and saying or singing them to the same tune, whether sleeping or awake, with a spirit of most admirable perseverance. Who has not heard the euphonious sounds of Bank! Bank! Monster! Monster! run and rung again, throughout the whole gamut?

These specimens inspire me with fair hopes that gentlemen will make very respectable progress with very extraordinary efforts. "Sh ho te deeri" is not always an unwise maxim; and I see that gentlemen are commending to themselves a sedulous study of it. But, as I profess to have made some progress in these log cabin doctrines, I trust gentlemen will not think me officious in offering them some wholesome suggestions that may aid them in their horn book.

Then, first, I will say to gentlemen that one great and radical mistake lies at the foundation of their former essays. The mistake consists in supposing that the people of these United States can be ruled, governed, and subjugated by means of patronage, largesses, and party organization. For instance, a bill that sets out to squander the whole domain, belonging to all, for the benefit of a few, is not the best way to control the grand results of the elective franchise. I grant you that, when people are cool, they may sit down and chaffer about paltry matters of selfish interest. They may be swayed to a certain extent. But I would commend to gentlemen the fact, worthy of all consideration, that the great mass of our people are honest, enthusiastic, devoted to liberty, and devoted to our institutions. To move the mass, you must appeal to their high and generous natures, to their patriotism, their love of liberty. You must kindle them with admiration of the glorious revolutionary achievements of their fathers—awaken their hatred and rouse their indignation against the rappers and misers of this fair and happy Government—against the spoilers—against the impudence that seeks to subsidize them with their own means—against the party hacks that would harness them, and then ride them "booted and spurred." If there be just cause for these appeals, the mass will begin to heave, to agitate frightfully and fearfully from the Canadas to the Gulf, and from the Atlantic to the base of the Rocky Mountains; and what think you would be the quieting effect of a little pre-emption bill thrown in upon this wild commotion, that agitates, and heaves, and shakes the continent? But as the minutest gossamer in a gale of wind.

When the log cabins shall be roused—when the high and enthusiastic love of liberty that characterizes their indwellers shall be strung up to intensity, then soap go the meshes of party; then patronage and largesses, whether in lands or money, are lost sight of or scorned. And these indwellers, too pure, too incorrupt, too untainted by the artificialities of high life to be wrought upon, come as the winds or as the "rushing of many waters" to the rescue of their Constitution and their liberty.

You cannot here, as in old Rome, gain the people at pleasure by largesses of corn, or money, or office; nor will it do any better to give them land. No. When they have risen up, as of late, as by the sound of the tocsin, to drive from power men who they believed had grossly abused their trusts, their force will be found irresistible.

This log cabin movement is no more like the little feverish excitements got up by party trick and machinery and bribery, than mimic theatrical thunder is like the resistless bolt that leaps from the cloud, echoes and reverberates throughout the vast concave of the heavens, and shakes the solid earth on which we stand.

We have seen, for the first time in this country, the attempt made to govern it by the force of patronage, of largesses, and party machinery. We have seen a band of officials at open war with the people by whose breath they had their political being. We have seen public opinion thwarted, scorned, and jeered. We have seen the most strange, sudden, and portentous conjunctions—entirely new phenomena in our political atmosphere. We have seen heaven and earth moved to sustain a tottering authority, a crumbling dynasty; but all, all in vain, in vain.

In such a contest as this, not all the wealth of all the Cæsars would have a particle of influence in repressing the indignant unburning energies of the popular power. The decree has gone forth that this Government is no longer to be administered by a system of official bribery. The people require a just and equal action in the system. They demand it. They will get it. And, in this matter of the public lands, gentlemen must remember that new States will not always be new; that they are rapidly becoming identified in interest with the old; and I tell my honorable friend [Mr. LINN] that even Missouri, before many years, will be found to stand side by side with North Carolina in the land question, as would her gallant population now, upon any exigency menacing from abroad the honor, the independence, or the integrity, of this our glorious Union.

Mr. LINN said that the remarks of the honorable Senator from North Carolina having made it imperative on him to say something in the way of reply, in following the honorable gentleman, he would endeavor to be a little more argumentative and a little less complimentary. There were few gentlemen toward whom, personally, Mr. L. cherished a higher degree of esteem. His brilliant talents, the Senate would all confess. In the remarks submitted by Mr. L. in a previous period of the debate, he had assumed the position that this Government had adopted the pre-emption system from the very beginning; and Mr. L. was in favor of keeping the beginning, the middle, and the end in consistency with each other, and for preserving a principle on which our country itself had been built up. He did not forget our origin. It was of the humblest and simplest kind. We had taken possession of the country as though we acted under the command given in the 1st chapter of Genesis—"Increase and multiply, and replenish the land and subdue it." We were all land stealers. The charge lay against the whole American people. They had stolen, so to speak, or conquered, as others chose to express it, or cheated the Indians out of it, which was probably nearer the truth. This general statement would apply as much to our fathers as to ourselves. On this principle our country had begun—on this it had proceeded and grown, and would continue to grow. He defied any one to gainsay this statement, or to prevent the onward progress of our population. As they advanced, like a mighty army, to subdue the wilderness, they were always in advance of the laws of this Government, and would always continue to be so. In support of this assertion, Mr. L. had referred to what had been so well stated by his friend from Arkansas, over the way, who had stated facts going to show that the whole force of the army of the United States would be insufficient effectually to remove that band of settlers who chose to set themselves down on the public lands. Our forefathers had all been squatters. By what he must consider an iniquitous treaty with an Indian tribe, Congress had taken off a large tract of territory, which had formerly been included within the bounds of Arkansas, and, in consequence, all those who had settled upon it were ordered to remove; and, as they showed no disposition to do so, a military force had been employed to remove them. They went into the country and drove off the squatters, but the moment the soldiers' backs were turned, the squatters came back, and so they continued to do until, at length, they carried their point, and received from the Government pre-emption rights. What could more plainly show how vain must be the attempt to drive them by military force from the entire extent of the public domain?

Mr. L. had a practical reply in regard to what the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] had said about tipstaves, and the profound regard of all American people for the majesty of the law. Suits had, in a great number of cases, been instituted against the settlers as trespassers, but as often as the case had gone to a jury, so often had the verdict regularly and uniformly been given against the Government, which had thus ineffectually expended many thousand dollars. How was this practice ever to be restrained? To do it by the constable and his staff had been tried in vain, and there remained but one other alternative, which was utterly abhorrent from the feeling of every American citizen. Could any gentleman cherish the belief that the American people could stand tamely by and see their fellow-citizens destroyed by military force, for the offence of building a cabin and cutting down a few trees on a tract of wild land belonging to the public? For Mr. L.'s part, had he an enemy in the world—and he believed he had but very few—he would not wish him a greater punishment than that he should be the man to issue the order for an attack of this description on poor unarmed cultivators of the soil, and their helpless women and children. Sure he was that the scorpion stings of that man's own conscience would be a punishment too heavy for him to bear. To that Mr. L. would be content to leave him. Besides, no President could ever get the gallant officers and soldiers of the American army to enforce the law against these people at the point of the bayonet. As he had already remarked, this band of pioneers preceded the law, and when they had opened the wilderness, Government by degrees brought the law up to them; and when things had reached this point, the settlers prayed for a pre-emption law to heal the breach, and Congress had always granted it. What! would the Government grant a remedial act to cover the delinquency of every petty bank in the United States that violated its charter by suspending specie payments, and refuse a similar act to the thousands of hardy settlers, whose only offence was that they had, by their labor, given value to the public domain?

Mr. L. would not ramble into general politics, nor attempt a reply to gentlemen who had spoken so warmly about offering bribes to the American people. If an enormous, if a tremendous bribe ever had been offered to them, it certainly was the distribution bill; and yet that was an unpopular measure in the new States. Mr. L. held in his hand the first law which had ever been passed by Congress to turn men off from the public domain. It had been first pointed out by the late Judge White, and its object was to prevent those who held inchoate grants from going on to survey the public lands. Congress had admitted the grant of a Spanish Governor to be valid if made before the 20th September, 1803, in lower Louisiana, or before the 10th March, 1804, in upper Louisiana. It was considered somewhat hard that a grant, if made on the 9th of March, should be valid, and, if by the same Governor on the 10th of March, good for nothing. Cases went up to the Supreme Court, and there it was decided that no grant should be valid until the land was surveyed. As soon as this was known, the settlers commenced surveying; but here is a law of Congress imposing a fine of $1,000, and threatening imprisonment to any grantee who should go on the land for the purpose of survey. This Mr. L. had denominated an iniquitous law, and so he held it to be; but it proved in effect a dead letter.

The honorable Senator from North Carolina had said that he would not treat this question of public lands as a mere matter of dollars and cents, but would look at it as a statesman. If he did so, he would take into view all the powerful considerations which urged men to settle on the public domain; and, so far from squandering the public lands, would go with Mr. L. for applying their entire proceeds to the support and increase of the navy, and for providing for the public defences of the country.

TUESDAY, January 12, 1841.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up, the question being on the proposition by Mr. CRITTENDEN to recommit the bill, with instructions to report a bill to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, which Mr. CALHOUN offered to amend, by substituting a bill to cede the public lands to the States in which they lie, upon certain conditions.

Mr. CALHOUN said: I regard the question of the public lands, next to that of the currency, the most dangerous and difficult of all which demand the attention of the country and the Government at this important juncture of our affairs. I do not except a protective tariff, for I cannot believe, after what we have experienced, that a measure can again be adopted, which has done more to corrupt the morals of the country, public and private, to disorder its currency, derange its business, and to weaken and endanger its free institutions, than any other, except the paper system, with which it is so intimately allied.

In offering the amendment I propose, I do not intend to controvert the justice of the eulogium which has been so often pronounced on our land system, in the course of this discussion. On the contrary, I believe that it was admirably adjusted to effect its object, when first adopted; but it must be borne in mind that a measure, to be perfect, must be adapted to circumstances, and that great changes have taken place, in the lapse of fifty years, since the adoption of our land system. At that time, the vast region now covered by the new States, which have grown up on the public domain, belonged to foreign powers, or was occupied by numerous Indian tribes, with the exception of a few sparse settlements, on the inconsiderable tracts to which the title of the Indians was at that time extinguished. Since then, a mighty change has taken place. Nine States have sprung up as if by magic, with a population not less, probably, than two-fifths of the old States, and destined to surpass them in a few years in numbers, power, and influence. That a change so mighty should so derange a system intended for an entirely different condition of things as to render important changes necessary to adapt it to present circumstances, is no more than might have been anticipated. It would, indeed, have been a miracle had it been otherwise; and we ought not, therefore, to be surprised that the operation of the system should afford daily evidence that it is not only deranged, but deeply deranged, and that its derangement is followed by a train of evils that threaten disaster, unless a timely and efficient remedy should be applied. I would ask those who think differently, and who believe the system still continued to work well, was it no evil, that session after session, for the last ten or twelve years, Congress should be engaged in angry and deeply agitating discussions, growing out of the public lands, in which one side should be denounced as the friends, and the other as the enemies, of the new States? Was the increasing violence of this agitation, from year to year, and threatening ultimately, not only the loss of the public domain, but the tranquillity and peace of the country, no evil? Is it well that one-third of the time of Congress is consumed in legislating on subjects directly or indirectly connected with the public lands, thereby prolonging the sessions proportionally, and adding to the expense upwards of $200,000 annually? Is it no evil that the Government should own half the lands within the limits of nine members of this Union, and over which they can exercise no authority or control? Is it nothing that the domain of so many States should be under the exclusive legislation and guardianship of this Government, contrary to the genius of the Constitution, which, intending to leave to each State the regulation of its local and peculiar concerns, delegated to the Union those only in which all had a common interest. If to all these be added the vast amount of patronage exercised by this Government through the medium of the public lands, over the new States, and through them, over the whole Union, and the pernicious influence thereby brought to bear on all other subjects of legislation, can it be denied that many and great evils result from the system as it now operates, which call aloud for some speedy and efficient remedy?

But why should I look beyond the question before us to prove, by the confession of all, that there is some deep disorder in the system? There are now three measures before the Senate, each proposing important changes, and the one, or the other, receiving the support of every member of the body; even of those who cry out against changes. It is too late, then, to deny the disordered state of the system. The disease is admitted, and the only question is, what remedy shall be applied.

I object both to the bill, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN] because, regarded as remedial measures, they are both inappropriate and inadequate. Neither pre-emption, nor distribution of the revenue, received from the public lands, can have any possible effect in correcting the disordered action of the system. I put the question, would one or the other contribute in the smallest degree to diminish the patronage of the Government, or the time consumed on questions growing out of the public lands, or shorten the duration of the sessions, or withdraw the action of the Government over so large a part of the domain of the new States, and place them and their representatives here, on the same independent footing with the old States and their representatives, or arrest the angry and agitating discussions which year after year distract our councils and threaten so much mischief to the country? Far otherwise would be the effect. It would but increase the evil, by bringing into more decided conflict, the interests of the new and old States. Of all the ills that could befall them, the former would regard the distribution as the greatest, while the latter would look on the pre-emption system, proposed by the bill, as little short of an open system of plunder, if we may judge from the declarations which we have heard in the course of the debate.

As, then, neither can correct the disease, the question is, what remedy can? I have given to this question the most deliberate and careful examination, and have come to the conclusion that there is, and can be, no remedy short of cession—cession to the States respectively within which the lands are situated. The disease lies in ownership and administration; and nothing short of parting with both can reach it. Part with them, and you will at once take away one-third of the business of Congress; shorten its sessions in the same proportion, with a corresponding saving of expense; lop off a large and most dangerous portion of the patronage of the Government; arrest these angry and agitating discussions, which do so much to alienate the good feelings of the different portions of the Union, and disturb the general course of legislation, and endanger ultimately the loss of the public domain. Retain them, and they must continue, almost without mitigation, apply what palliatives you may. It is the all-sufficient and only remedy.

Thus far would seem clear. I do not see how it is possible for any one to doubt that cession would reach the evil, and that it is the only remedy that would. If, then, there should be any objection, it can only be to the terms or conditions of the cession. If these can be so adjusted as to give assurance that the lands shall be as faithfully managed by the States as by this Government, and that all the interests involved shall be as well, or better secured than under the existing system, all that could be desired would be effected, and all objections removed to the final and quiet settlement of this great, vexed, and dangerous question. In saying all objections, I hold that the right of disposing of them as proposed, especially when demanded by high considerations of policy, and when it can be done without pecuniary loss to the Government, as I shall hereafter show, cannot be fairly denied. The Constitution gives to Congress the unlimited right of disposing of the public domain, and of course, without any other restrictions than what the nature of that trust and terms of cession may impose, neither of which forbid their cession in the manner proposed.

That the conditions can be so adjusted, I cannot doubt. I have carefully examined the whole ground, and can perceive no difficulty that cannot be surmounted. I feel assured that all which is wanting is to attract the attention of the Senate to the vast importance of doing something that will effectually arrest the great and growing evil, resulting from the application of the system, as it exists, to that portion of the public domain lying in the new States. That done, the intelligence and wisdom of the body will be at no loss to adjust the details in such manner as will effectually guard every interest, and secure its steady and faithful management.

In the mean time, I have adopted the provisions of the bill introduced originally by myself, and twice reported on favorably by the Committee on Public Lands, as the amendment I intend to offer to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] as containing the general outlines of the conditions and provisions on which the lands may be disposed of to the States with safety and advantage to the interest of the Government and the Union, and great benefit to those States. The details may, no doubt, be greatly improved; for which I rely on the intelligence of the body, and critical examination of the committee, should the amendment be adopted and referred. At the present stage, I regard nothing but the great principles on which it rests, and its outlines, to be at issue; and I do hope, that all who may concur with me on principle, will give the amendment their support, whatever imperfection they may suppose to exist in its modifications. A measure relating to a question so vast and complicated, can be perfected in its details, however sound the principles on which it rests, or correct its general outlines, only by the joint consultation and counsel. With these remarks, it will not be necessary for me, at this stage, to give more than a general summary of the provisions of the proposed amendment.

Its object is to instruct the committee so to amend the bill, as to dispose of all the public lands, lying in the States of Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, Missouri, Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, and Indiana, with the exception of sites for forts, navy and dock yards, arsenals, magazines, and other public buildings; the cession not to take place till after the 30th June, 1842, and then only on the States respectively agreeing to the conditions prescribed in the amendment; that is, to pass acts irrevocable to adhere to those conditions, the most prominent of which is to pay annually, on a day fixed, to the United States, 65 per cent. of the gross proceeds of the sales of the lands; that the land laws, as they now stand, and as proposed to be modified by the amendment, shall remain unchanged, except with the consent of Congress; that the cession shall be in full of the 5 per cent. fund thereafter to accrue to those States; that they shall be exclusively liable for the cost of surveys, sales, extinction of Indian titles, and management generally; that the States may, within certain prescribed limits, gradually reduce the price of the lands that may remain unsold after having been offered for sale ten years or upwards; may grant, for a limited period, the right of pre-emption for ninety days to the actual settlers, at each step in the reduction of price; and finally, that if the conditions of cession be violated by a State in any particular, all titles or grants to land thereafter sold by the State to be null and void—thus giving the measure the force and solemnity of a compact, and placing the whole under the protection of the courts, which would pronounce the titles to be void, if made after an infraction of the conditions of the cession.

It is not my intention to go into an investigation of these various conditions at this time. On a question of reference, where the principle only is at issue, it is not necessary. It is sufficient to say that the leading object is to make as little change in the land system, as it now exists, as is consistent with the object in view, and to adopt such provisions as will enforce the faithful performance of the terms of cession on the part of the States, with the least compensation for their expense and trouble, and loss to the Government, in a pecuniary point of view, consistent with the arrangement. If it can be made to appear that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the States will faithfully comply with these conditions and that there will be no pecuniary loss to the Government, compared with the system as it now stands, in consequence of the proposed disposition, it would seem difficult to conceive what substantial objection there can be to the measure.

I am thus brought to the great, I might say the only question admitting a doubt as to the expediency of the measure. Will the States adhere to their contract? or, to express it differently, would there be danger that the Government would lose the land, in consequence of the States refusing to comply with the conditions of the cession? And if not, will the pecuniary loss to the Government be such as to make it inexpedient, even if there be full assurance that the terms of cession will not be violated?

Before I enter on the discussion of these important points, it will be proper to make a few remarks on the extent of the interest that would be embraced in the cession. Without it, there would be but an imperfect conception of the subject.

The quantity of public lands lying in the new States, and embraced in the amendment, was estimated to be, on the 1st of January, 1840, about 160,000,000 of acres. It has been reduced since by sales, the exact quantity not known; but it will not materially vary the amount. The Indian title has been extinguished to nearly the whole, and about three-fourths has been surveyed and platted, of which a larger part has been long in the market (much, more than twenty years) and has been picked and culled, over and over again, with the view of taking all worth having, at the present price, even during the great expansion of currency, and consequent rise in price, and speculation in public lands, in 1835, '36, and '37. If compared in quantity to the remainder of the public domain, it will be found to be not equal to one-sixth part of the whole. In this respect, it is a far more limited measure than that proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, to which mine is an amendment. That embraces not only the proceeds of the whole public domain, exceeding 1,000,000,000 acres, but includes, in addition, the large sums drawn from the duties on imports, which are annually expended on its sales and management, all of which he proposes permanently to distribute. It is also more limited in its application than the original bill, which embraces all the lands to which the Indian title is extinguished, as well Territories as States, which greatly exceeds the quantity lying in the latter.

Having now shown the object and the character with the scope of this measure, I shall next proceed to the great, and I must say, in my opinion, the only question that admits of controversy—will the States adhere faithfully to the terms of the cession? Or, on the contrary, will they violate a compact solemnly entered into, on just and liberal principles, mutually beneficial to both, and which will place them, as to their domain, on the same independent footing on which the other States stand?

I would ask, at the outset, is there any thing in their history to justify a suspicion of a want of good faith? Have they been in the habit of violating contracts? If so, point out a single instance? Instead of giving ground to excite suspicion, I rejoice to say their history affords many and striking examples of exact and faithful compliance with their engagements. They all have standing compacts with the Government, entered into on their admission into the Union, which impose important limitations on what otherwise would be their unquestioned right as independent members of the Union; and, among others, the important one, not only of not taxing the vast portion of their domain held by the United States within their limits, but also, for the period of five years after sale, the portion held by purchasers. To their honor be it said, that in the long period which has elapsed from the admission of the oldest of these States, there has not been a single instance of a violation on their part of their plighted faith. With so striking an example of fidelity to engagements, with what justice can it be objected that the States will violate their plighted faith to a contract every way advantageous to them, as well as the rest of the Union?

But I take higher ground, and put the question, with what propriety can we object to the want of faith on the part of the States to their engagements? What is our Constitution but a compact between the States; and how do we hold seats here but in virtue of that compact? And is it for us to turn round and question the faith on which our system stands, and through which we have our political existence; and this, too, when it is notorious that the State Governments have adhered with far more fidelity than this to the constitutional compact? Many and great violations are charged, and truly charged to us, while few, very few, can be justly attributed to them.

But, admitting there might be danger of losing the lands, should they be disposed of as proposed, from the want of good faith on the part of the States, I boldly assert that the danger of their being lost is far greater, if the present system should unfortunately be continued, and that, too, under circumstances vastly more disastrous to the peace and safety of the Union. What I have asserted comes from deep and solemn conviction, resulting from a long and careful examination of this vast and complicated subject.

Those who have not given special attention to it, and the progress of our land system, can form no just conception of the danger to which the public lands are exposed. The danger is two-fold: that they will be lost by the mere progress of settlement, without payment, in consequence of the vast quantity beyond the wants of the country, to which the Indian title is extinguished; and if that should not be the case, they will be from the growing conflict between the old and new States, in consequence of the rapid increase of the latter, and the great difference in their respective views of the policy proper to be adopted in reference to them. Both causes are operating with powerful effect; and if they do not speedily attract the attention of the Government and the country, they will certainly terminate before long, either by their separate or joint action, in the loss of the public domain. Nothing but a full understanding of the causes of danger; and the application of prompt and efficient remedy, can prevent it; and what I propose is to present a brief sketch of my views in reference to both.

As important as it is, few have turned the attention it deserves to the almost miraculous extension of our land system. In the comparatively short time in which it has been in operation, the Indian title has been extinguished, in round numbers, to 320,000,000 of acres, of which there has been sold 81,000,000, and granted away, for various purposes, 12,600,000, leaving in the possession of the Government, on the 1st of January, 1840, 226,000,000, a larger portion of which is surveyed, platted, and in the market, showing that the progress of extinguishing the titles of the Indians has far outrun the demands of the country for Government lands, as great as it has been. In fact, the reality far exceeds the statement, as strong as that is; for, of the eighty-one millions of acres sold, upwards of thirty-eight millions were sold in the years 1835, '36 and '37, during the great expansion of the currency and rage for speculation in lands, of which but a small portion, perhaps not a third, was for settlement; and of the residue, a greater part, say twenty millions, is still for sale in the hands of large purchasers. Making proper allowance for the speculative operations of those years, the actual sale of the public lands for settlement, during the period of fifty years, which has elapsed from the beginning of the Government, would not probably exceed sixty millions of acres, about one-fourth as much as that to which the Indian title is now extinguished.

But numbers can give but a very imperfect conception of the vast extent of the region to which the Indian title is extinguished, and of which the Government is the sole and exclusive proprietor. To form a correct idea of its great magnitude, it will be necessary to compare it to portions of the Union, the extent of which is familiar to all. To enable me to do that, a friend has furnished me with a statement, from which it appears that if all the land now unsold, and to which the Indian title is extinguished, was grouped together, it would be equal in extent to all New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and a third of North Carolina. But this falls far short of the vast extent of the region throughout which it lies dispersed—a region equaling all the old Atlantic States, taking in all Florida, the States of Alabama and Mississippi, and half of Tennessee. Into this vast and unoccupied domain, our people, with a multitude of foreigners, are pouring yearly in one incessant tide, by thousands on thousands, seeking new homes, some with the means of purchasing, who select the best lands; others with insufficient means, who select their place, and settle, with the hope of purchasing in a short time; and a large class without means, who settle on spots, without any fixed intention but to remain so long as they are undisturbed, generally on tracts of inferior quality having the advantage of a spring, with a small portion of more fertile land, sufficient for their limited cultivation, but not sufficient to induce a purchaser to take it at the Government price. This class of settlers has greatly increased, if I am correctly informed, within the last ten or fifteen years, and are rapidly and still increasing, especially in the West and Southwestern States, where the proportion of good to inferior land is comparatively small, and must continue to increase with accelerated rapidity, so long as the present land system remains as it is.

Those who have had an opportunity of witnessing the effect of such occupancy on the minds of the settlers, will not be at a loss to anticipate the consequences which must follow unless arrested. Occupancy long and undisturbed, accompanied by improvement, however limited, cannot fail to be associated with the idea of property, in the soil. It is that, in fact, which constitutes the primitive right in land. This will be felt in common by all the occupants similarly situated—will be sure to create an esprit de corps, accompanied by mutual respect for each others' rights, which would not fail to make it dangerous for any one to disturb the rights of another. This feeling will not be long in showing itself towards the emigrant intruder, as he would be considered, coming in with the view of purchase. He would find it not a little hazardous to enter and purchase a spot held by a mere occupant, or squatter, if you will, and oust him of his possession. In a short time, no one who regards his peace and safety, will attempt it; and then, the feeling, which began with the poorer class, will extend rapidly upwards to the more wealthy, until, finally, none will look to any other title but occupancy and improvement, and all, the rich and poor, will become squatters, with a common interest to maintain and defend each other, when the public lands will be lost, and cease to be any longer a source of revenue, if nothing be done to stop it. For the truth of the picture I appeal to the Senators from the new States, especially from the Western and Southwestern. We have thus presented the difficult question, what is to be done to remedy it?

It is perfectly natural that the first impression should be, to keep out intruders on the public lands. The lands belong to the people of the Union as common property, and it would seem contrary to reason and justice, that any one should be permitted to enter on and appropriate the use of that to himself, without paying for it, which belongs to all; and we accordingly find not a small portion of the Senate, who insist on keeping out and expelling all intruders as the proper remedy. But in this case, like many others, we must look beyond mere abstract right. What seems so plausible would, when tried, prove impracticable. We need no other proof than the fact that no Administration has ever undertaken it, even when it would have been an easy task, comparatively to what it now would be. How is it to be done? By the marshals and their deputies? Can they expel from their homes the vast host of occupants on the public lands, all hardy and bold men, familiar with the use of the most deadly of weapons? Would you employ the army? It would be found almost as impotent as the civil authority. If the whole military was employed in this to the neglect of all other service, there would be more than five hundred and fifty square miles for each officer and soldier, supposing your establishment to be full. No; were it possible to employ the military in so odious a service in this free country, you would have to double your force, at a cost greater than the annual income from the land; and the work would be ever beginning and never ending. If you drive them away and destroy their improvements, as soon as the force was withdrawn, they would return to their possession. I had some experience, while Secretary at War, of the difficulty of expelling and keeping off intruders; and I found that the message which brought intelligence of the withdrawal of the force was immediately followed by that which brought information that the intruders had returned.

But the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] deems all this as merely imaginary, and asserts that intruders may readily be kept off the public lands. I will not attempt to reply to his reason for this opinion. He and his political friends will soon be in power, with a chief of their own selection, and in whose firmness and energy they express high confidence. In six weeks the time will come round which brings him into power, and we shall see what will follow. Without pretending to the spirit of prophecy, I feel I hazard nothing in predicting, that what is deemed so easy to be done when out of power, will be pronounced impracticable when in. The Senator would have too much prudence to give the advice, but, if not, the President elect will, I conjecture, have too much discretion to act on it.

If, however, I should be mistaken, and the attempt should be made to expel the occupants from the public lands, I hazard nothing in predicting that the Administration will go out of power with ten times the majority with which it came in, as great as that was. The bitterest enemy could not give more fatal advice.

If, then, this powerful tide of emigration, which is flowing in on the public lands, cannot be arrested, what ought, or can be done, to prevent the loss of the public domain, by the action of the causes already explained? This is the difficult question. In answer I say, we must do as we are often compelled to do in our progress through life—accommodate ourselves to circumstances; to mitigate evils we cannot overcome, and retard or lessen those we cannot prevent. Such are the laws to which beings of our limited powers and control over events, must necessarily yield.

Without, then, undertaking the impossible task of arresting the tide of emigration, or expelling the settlers, I would advise the adoption of the most judicious and efficient measures of converting them into freeholders, with the least sacrifice consistent with effecting that object. The first step towards this, should be to unite the interest of this Government with that of the States within which the lands lie, so as to combine the power and influence of the two for their preservation. Without it, nothing can be done. If they should not be united, the necessary consequence would be, that the interest of the States would be invariably found to be opposed to that of the Government, and its weight thrown on the side of the settlers on all questions between them, of which we have daily proof in our proceedings. In the end, their united power and influence would prevail. If this indispensable step be not taken, in a short time, instead of graduation and pre-emption, we shall have a demand not to be resisted, for donations and grants to the settlers. A leading inducement with him to dispose of the lands to the States, was to effect this important union of interest. It is the only way by which it can be accomplished, and to render it sufficiently strong to effect the object intended, I am in favor of a liberal compensation to the States, for the expense and trouble of their management.

But something more is indispensable to prevent the loss of the lands; and that is, to hold out adequate inducement to the settlers to become freeholders by purchasing the land. This can be effected with the least loss to the Government, and greatest advantage to the settlers, by a judicious system of graduation and pre-emption; and it is with that view that provisions are made for both in the amendment which I intend to offer. It provides, that the States may, at their discretion, reduce the price of all lands which have been offered at sale ten years and upwards, to one dollar per acre, after the 30th of June, 1842; and all that may be in market for fifteen years and upwards, to seventy-five cents per acre, after the 30th of June, 1847; and all that may have been twenty years and upwards, to fifty cents per acre, after the 30th of June, 1852; and all that have been twenty-five years and upwards, to twenty-five cents, after the 30th of June, 1857; and all that have been thirty years and upwards, to twelve cents, after the 30th of June, 1862; and all that should remain unsold five years thereafter, to be surrendered to the States; with the right, also, at their discretion, to allow pre-emption for ninety days to settlers, at each step in the reduction of the price. It also provides, that all lands, after having been offered for sale in those States, shall, at the expiration of ten years from the time of being offered, become subject, in like manner, to graduation and pre-emption.

The object of these provisions is to hold out inducements to the settlers to purchase, by bringing the lands, within a reasonable period, to a price which would not only justify, but hold out strong inducement to them to purchase. One great difficulty in the way of purchasing, as the system now stands, is, that the great body of the lands are not worth, in reality, the price of $1.25, which they are sold by the Government. There appears to be a great mistake on this point, which it is important to correct. Instead of almost every acre, as is supposed by some gentlemen in debate, to be worth that sum, the reverse position is true, that none was worth it but that which was, at the time, coming in demand by purchasers. I rest the assertion on the well established principle that demand and supply regulate price, and the fact that an article which is in the market at a fixed price, open to the demand of all, and is not taken, is the best proof that the price is above the market value at the time. It is in vain to talk of intrinsic value—a thing wholly different from price. There are many things of the highest intrinsic value that have no price, as air and water, while many of but small value would, from their great scarcity, command a very high one. In the language of business, a thing is worth what it will sell for, and no one is willing to give more, unless compelled by some particular reason. The occupants of the public lands partake of this feeling. They are unwilling to give for the inferior lands, which for the most part they occupy, $1.25, when a small part only of the best lands offered for sale would command that; and feel that they have something like justice on their side in not giving so high a price for their possessions.

This feeling must be met; and it is proposed to meet it by the provisions for graduation and pre-emption which I have just stated; a policy so liberal towards a large, though poor class, not less honest and patriotic than the rest of the community, could not fail to have a happy effect, not only in reference to them, but in a more enlarged point of view. One of the most important would be the great increase of the number of small freeholders, which, in the hour of danger, would prove of vast importance, especially in the weakest portion of the Union—in the Southwestern States—where the provision would have the greatest effect. It would be the class that would furnish the hardiest and best soldiers, with the advantage of being inured to the climate. Combined and modified as they would be, they cannot but have a powerful weight in inducing the occupants to purchase. It will work a revolution in his character. He will regard himself, on his little domain, more a freeholder than a squatter; and as the price in the descending scale of graduation approaches the price that lands such as he occupies would sell for, his industry and economy will be exerted to be prepared with the requisite means to make the purchase. The liberal character of the policy would impress him with deep feelings of respect for the justice and care of the Government; and the security it would afford would put an end to the esprit de corps, which otherwise would be so strong; and all, combined with the influence of the States on the side of the Government, would, I feel confident, guard effectually against the danger of losing the lands, as far as the occupants are concerned, in the only way that would be practicable.

The amendment proposes to leave it to the States to graduate and grant pre-emptions or not, at their discretion, within the limits prescribed. The conditions of the several States are very different in reference to the expediency of exercising the right. In the uniformly fertile region in the upper portion of the great Valley of the Mississippi, it may not be necessary to resort to either, or, if so, to a very limited extent; while in the Southwestern States, including Arkansas, it would be indispensable; and hence the propriety of giving the right, but leaving the exercise to the discretion of the States. Each State would be the most competent judge whether it should be exercised or not, and to what extent.

Having considered the provisions intended to guard against the danger of losing the lands from mere occupancy, without payment, I next propose to make some remarks on that of their being lost, in consequence of the conflicting policy between the new and old States in reference to them, should the present system be continued. To understand this danger, we must have a just conception of the cause in which it originates, which I will endeavor first to explain.

In the nature of things, it is impossible that the new and old States can take the same view of the policy proper to be adopted in reference to the public domain. Their respective position, interest, and extent of knowledge in reference to it, are wholly different, which cannot but have a correspondent effect on their views. The old States stand in reference to the new somewhat in the light of an absent owner of a large estate, and not without some of his feelings, while the new stand, in some degree, in the situation of those who occupy and work his estate, with feelings not a little akin to those which belong to that relation. That such is the case, and that it leads to diverse views of the policy that ought to be adopted, and that, again, to conflict between them, the questions now before us, the discussion now going on, the feelings it excites, and the yearly and violent agitation of those questions for the last eight or ten years, abundantly prove. Nor is it less clear that they have increased, and must increase with the growth and influence of the new States, over the action of the Government, till their rapid growth will give them the ascendancy, when they will decide it in their own way, under the high pretensions and excited feelings of real or supposed injustice which must necessarily grow out of a long continued and violent conflict. It is, in like manner, clear that the evil originates in the ownership and administration by the Government of the lands lying in the new States, and constituting a larger portion of their Territory. If, to these considerations, it be added that the question growing out of this great subject must extend to and embrace, and influence in their bearings, every other question of public policy, as is illustrated by the amendment for distributing the proceeds of the sales of the lands among the States, which, in its consequences, takes in the whole circle of our legislation, and that it must enter into and influence all our political struggles, especially that in which all others are concentrated—the Presidential election—some conception may be formed of the distracting influence, the agitation and danger which must grow out of this great question, if not speedily settled.

If something be not done, it is not difficult to see that the danger from these causes and that from occupancy must run together, and that their combined forces will be altogether irresistible. The occupants on the public lands lying within the States are voters, with a weight at the polls equal to the most wealthy, and, of course, an equal influence over the election of President and Vice President, members of Congress, and State Governments. I hazard little in asserting that, if they have not already, from their numbers, a decided influence over all the elections in many of the new States, they will, in a very short period, from their rapid increase, if nothing should be done to arrest the evil. That influence would be felt here, and movements would be made to satisfy the demands of so numerous and powerful a class, till with their growing influence, the proposition will be boldly made, to give, as has been stated, the land without purchase, to which, from the necessity of the case, the Government will be compelled to yield, in order to avoid the danger of being seized and kept in open defiance of its authority.

Against this, the only ground that can be devised, as far as I can see, is the one I have proposed; to dispose of the land to the States—to part with ownership and administration, the root of the evil—on fair and equitable conditions, with the best possible provisions that can be devised to ensure the faithful performance of the compact. If that, with the provisions against the danger from occupancy, cannot prevent the loss of the public lands, I know not what can. I have as strong confidence as the nature of the subject will admit, that it will when perfected in its details by the wisdom of the Senate, prove all sufficient, not only to prevent the loss of the public domain, but to arrest the many and growing evils, to which I have alluded, as incident to the system as it now exists. But, if in that it is possible I should err, with all the caution I have taken to come to a correct conclusion, I feel assured I cannot, in asserting that the danger would be far less, under the amendment I intend to propose, than it would be should the system continue as it now stands; and that if the public domain is to be lost, it is far better it should be under the former than the latter. It would be with far less intermediate hazard, and, in the end, with less violence and shock to our political fabric. In the one case we could lose nothing but the value of the land, which I shall presently show is far less than usually estimated, while in the other no one can estimate what the loss may not be.

Having now, I trust, shown to the satisfaction of the Senate, that nothing short of disposing of the public lands, on just, equitable, and liberal terms, can remedy the evils, and guard against the dangers incident to the system, under existing circumstances, it only remains to consider what would be the effects of the measure on the revenue, compared with the present system. Should I be able to prove, as I hope to do, that even in that respect it will bear a highly advantageous comparison, it would yield more, and that when most needed, now, when the Treasury will require replenishing, every solid objection to its adoption would, I trust, be removed.

There was a great and prevalent mistake as to the true value of the public lands, as I have just intimated. They are estimated as if every acre was worth $1 25 paid down, without taking into account that only a small quantity could be sold annually at that price, and that by far the greater portion of the income from the sales can only be received through a long series of years, extending to a very remote period. In estimating what is their true value, we must not forget that time has the same effect on value, which distance has on magnitude; and that, as the largest objects in the universe dwindle to a point, when removed to the distance of the stars—so the greatest value, when it can only be realized at remote periods, diminishes almost to nothing. It is in consequence of this difference between present and future value, that a sum paid down is worth twice as much as an equal sum to be paid sixteen years hence, estimated at 6 per cent. simple interest, and four times as much as a like sum to be paid at the end of thirty-two years. I do not take fractions of years into the estimate. The principle is familiar to all who are in the habit of calculating the present value of annuities for a given number of years, and is as applicable to regular annual incomes from land, or any other source, as it is from what is usually called an annuity. On the same principle, discounts are made on payments in advance. But we are in the daily habit of overlooking this plain and familiar principle, known to every business man in the management of his own affairs, in estimating the value of the public domain. In consequence of such oversight, the 160,000,000 of acres lying in the new States have been estimated to be worth $200,000,000, at $1 25 per acre—a sum nearly eight times greater than its real value, supposing that it would give an annual income averaging $2,500,000 annually, and admitting every acre will be sold at $1 25—a supposition far greater than will ever be realized. The Committee on Public Lands, at the last session, assuming these data, proved incontestably that the true present value did not exceed twenty-six millions and a half of dollars. They showed, in the first place, that a permanent income forever of $2,500,000 would be worth but a fraction more than forty-one millions of dollars in hand, as that sum, at six per cent. would give an equal income. They next showed, that to derive an income of $2,500,000 from the hundred and sixty millions of acres in the new States, would exhaust every acre in eighty years; and that, of course, instead of being a permanent income, it would be one only for that period, which would reduce its value to about thirty-four millions of dollars, which would be its present value, if there was no expense attending its sales and management. That is, however, far from being the case. Applying the same rule of calculation to the annual expense incident to their management, including what would be saved by the Government, if the cession should be made, ascertained to be about $550,000 annually, they find the present value of the land to be the sum stated, ($26,500,000.) The result, assuming the data to be correct, is incontrovertible; and that sum would constitute the entire amount of the loss under the present system, if the lands were really to be given away by the proposed cession, as has been most unfairly charged on the other side of the chamber.

I propose to apply the same principle to the same lands, to show its present value, under the operation of the measure I intend to propose. Should it be adopted, the whole of the lands in question would be sold, I assume, in twenty-five years from the time they become subject to the graduating process—which is much more probable than that the whole would be sold in eighty years at the present price of $1 25 per acre. I next assume that equal quantities would be sold during each period of graduation. I next assume that the portion not yet offered for sale, and which, according to the amendment, would not be subject to graduation, and which is estimated in the report of the Committee on Public Lands, to amount to a little more than 62,000,000 of acres, would yield an average revenue during the ten years, equal in proportion to what the 160,000,000 acres are estimated to yield. It is probably much less than what they would, as they will, for the first time, be offered for sale. I also estimate that the lands that have been offered, and which have not yet run ten years, and will of course be held till then at $1 25, will, with that which will be sold on the first reduction to $1, average $1 12½. I have also estimated the whole period including that which is now in progress towards ten years, and the first period of reduction, as one period of fifteen years, and that the entire amount sold during the entire period, will only equal the average of the other periods of graduation, (five years); an estimate greatly under the truth.

On these data I have based the calculations which have been made, with great care, and I find the present value of the lands would be more than a third more under my proposed amendment, than under the existing system; and that the excess would be sufficient to pay the 35 per cent. proposed to be allowed to the new States for their expense and trouble, leaving the 65 to be received by the Government, equal to the entire present value of the lands, under the existing system. Such is the vast difference between receiving a smaller amount by annual payments, during half of a long period and a much larger one in like manner during double of the time.

There are but two of the data on which the calculation is based, which can be supposed to have any material effect on the result, which can possibly prove to be over estimated; the one, that all the lands will be sold during the period of graduation, which, however, is quite as probable, to say the least, as that all will be sold in eighty years at $1 25; and the other, that equal quantities would be sold during each step of the reduction. It is not improbable this may not prove to be the case, and that larger quantities would be sold towards the latter stages of the graduation, at low prices, than during the earlier stages, at higher prices, which affect the result. The other suppositions, that equal sums would be received at each period, would, probably, be much too low; and the truth may probably prove to be between them; but even on that assumption, the present value, under the measure I propose, would greatly exceed that under the present system; so much so as to be quite sufficient to cover the 13 per cent. proposed to be allowed to the States for their trouble, above the expense of managing the lands, including the saying to the Government by the cession. I have assumed that additional allowance, because it nearly corresponds to that proposed to be given in the bill for distribution, (introduced by the author of the scheme,) to the new States, above that allowed to the old. I refer to the bill that passed both Houses, and was vetoed by the President. That allowed 12½ per cent. which, for the sake of facility in calculating, I have enlarged to 13 per cent.

I have, I trust, now successfully met the only two objections which can, in my opinion, be urged with any plausibility against the measure I intend to propose, by proving not only that there would be reasonable assurance that the States would abide by the terms of the cession, but that it was the only measure which could be devised to prevent the almost certain loss of the public domain, under the operation of the system, as it now stand, and that, instead of a loss, there would be a clear pecuniary gain. If I have succeeded in doing so, I have done all that ought, according to my conception, to be necessary to obtain the support of the body. But I cannot be ignorant that there are members from the new States who prefer supporting this bill to the measure I intend to propose; not that they think it better, but because they believe it has the best prospect of passing. In this I think they are mistaken. It is not probable that either can pass the present session. It is now but a few weeks to its termination, and it is impossible, in the midst of the crowd of other business, that any important measure, not indispensable, can get through, especially a system of pre-emption and graduation which has been so long struggling, unsuccessfully, to pass both Houses. But if it could not pass now, there was little prospect that it could the next four years, against the opposition of the coming, when it could not with the aid of the present and late Administrations.

With this prospect, I put it to my friends from the new States, is there not danger in pressing these isolated measures, which cannot settle the vexed and dangerous questions of the public lands, and which, at best, can be pressed on grounds only interesting to those States, that they will lose not only a favorite measure, but cause the passage of obnoxious to them of, all measures, that of distribution? I ask them, can you hope to oppose successfully a measure so seductive to so many members of the Union, by a measure so partial in its operation, and which, so far from appealing to the reason or sympathy of two-thirds of the States, secures but a reluctant vote from any of them; more from party feelings and associations, than any conviction of its justice or expediency? Let me tell my friends, that if the struggle is to continue between this bill and the scheme of distribution, it is, on their part, a desperate one. Defeat is certain; and there is no way to avoid it, (if it be not already too late,) but to enlarge the issue—to raise it above mere local or pecuniary considerations, to the broad and elevated ground of a final settlement of this deep and agitating question, on just and satisfactory principles, and thereby arrest the countless evils rushing through that channel on the country. It is only thus that an antagonist of sufficient strength could be reared up against the dangerous and corrupting scheme of distribution. A measure seductive to many of the States, unfortunately overwhelmed by debt, could only be successfully opposed by one which would make a powerful appeal to truth, justice, and patriotism. As strong as may be the appeal to the necessity of embarrassed States, a still stronger may be made to the higher and more commanding considerations of duty and patriotism. Such an issue, I believe, the measure I propose would tender to the country. I solemnly believe it to be founded on truth, and sustained by justice, and high considerations of policy; and all it needs to ensure its success, if I mistake not, is the earnest and determined support of the States which not only have no deepest stake, but whose independence and equality, honor and pride, as members of this proud Republic of States, are involved.

Having now presented my views of the amendment I intend to offer, with a motion to strike out the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, and inasmuch as I shall conclude with a few remarks in reference to the leading feature of his amendment, the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the States.

It is not my intention to enter on the discussion of a measure which I cannot but regard as palpably unconstitutional, as well as dangerous and corrupting in its tendency. I do not deem it necessary, as I expressed my opinion fully on the subject at the last session. I intend at this time to make a few remarks, in order to show that, viewed under every possible aspect, it must be regarded as either foolish, idle, or unjust.

It is admitted on all sides that the Treasury is embarrassed, and that no part of the revenue can be withdrawn without making a corresponding deficit, which must be supplied by taxes on the people, in one form or another, and that the withdrawal of the revenue from the land would cause a deficit so to be supplied, of not less, probably, than $5,000,000 annually. The whole process, then, would consist in giving to the people of the several States their proportional share of the five millions of the revenue from the lands, to be collected back from the people of the United States, in the shape of a tax on imports, or some other subject, the same amount. Now, sir, I ask, is it not clear, if a State should receive by its distributive share a less sum than the people of that State would have to pay in taxes to supply the deficit, it would be, on their part, foolish to support the distribution? So, again, if they should receive the same amount they paid instead of a loss, would it not be idle? And if more, would it not be unjust? Can any one deny these conclusions? How, then, can a scheme, which implies the one or the other of these alternatives, (laying aside all other weighty objections,) have any chance to be adopted? But two answers can be given. The one, that the States, which would receive more from the distribution than their people would have to pay to make up the deficit, can outvote the others, and are prepared to act on the principle of the strong plundering the weak; and the other, that a majority of the States want the money to pay their debts, or to spend in favorite schemes, and prefer shifting the responsibility of taxing to the General Government to assuming it themselves, without regarding whether their people would contribute more or less than they may receive. They are afraid to lay taxes, lest the people should see the sums extracted from their pockets, and turn them out; and to avoid this, would transfer the task to the General Government, because they can take from the people, through the tax on imports, without being detected as to the amount.

I take the opportunity, before I sit down, to tender my thanks to the honorable and high-minded suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. LINN] considering the interior quarter of the Union from which he comes, to set apart the proceeds of the lands as a permanent fund for the navy.

[Mr. LINN, in an audible voice. The navy and the defences of the country.]

I would rejoice to see such a disposition of it, and do hope that he will move an amendment to that effect. I would gladly receive it as a modification of my amendment, and would regard it as a great improvement. The navy, sir, is the right arm of our defence, and is equally important to every section—the North and South, the East and West, inland and seaboard. When I look at the condition of our country, and the world, I feel that too earnest and too early attention cannot be bestowed on the arm of defence on which the country must mainly rely, not only for sustaining its just weight and influence in the scales of nation, but also for protection.

Mr. HUBBARD called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the substitute of the Senator from South Carolina.

After a few words between Messrs. CRITTENDEN, CLAY of Alabama, and MERRICK—

The PRESIDENT again stated the question, and

The CLERK commenced calling the list, but he had not proceeded further than the name of Mr. ALLEN, who voted for the substitute of the Senator from South Carolina, when

Mr. CRITTENDEN rose and observed that he had hardly ever felt more surprised than in listening to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina. In offering the amendment which he himself had proposed, his simple and unobtrusive purpose had been merely to put on record the views he entertained, and what he was willing to do on this subject of pre-emption. He had been desirous that his views should not be misunderstood or perverted, and he had drawn up and offered his amendment for the purpose of showing that he was willing to go for pre-emption, if it was combined with the just distribution among the States of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. For these two measures, if united, he was willing to vote. He had been desirous of putting this on record, and that was his whole purpose in offering his amendment. For the audacity of making such a proposal, he continued, I—no, not I—but my proposition itself has been denounced in all the variety of epithets which the eloquence of the honorable Senator could supply. It has been pronounced to be "idle, unjust, or foolish." This was the sententious condemnation passed upon by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN]. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] had directed against it a storm of epithets yet more ponderous. According to the thunder of that gentleman's elocution, the proposition was "enormous!" "monstrous!" So monstrous and so enormous was it that I shrink from all attempt at defending it, and the honorable Senator did not wonder! Now these argumentative epithets of the Senator will, I rather imagine, make no very great impression on the understanding of the country or on the Senate. It is not by epithets that either of those gentlemen, high as they may believe themselves to stand, can put down measures in this body. Great as may be their power of animadversion, it is not on that power that the fate of this measure is to depend. The gentlemen may suppose I shrink from the very thought of defending my amendment, because I do not choose to occupy an hour or two in debate—on what? On a measure new to the Senate? Not at all. The bill before us is to grant a prospective pre-emption on the public lands. Did the honorable Senator expect I was about to take up the time of this body in unfolding the advantages and disadvantages of a measure of this kind? To him, at least, all such discussion must be, in an eminent degree, flat, stale, and unprofitable. Pre-emption and graduation have been abundantly argued, both now and heretofore; there remains but one more proposition to be considered, which is distribution. Is that to be debated now? Does the gentleman suppose that I am going to debate that question with the vain hope of carrying it now? Surely not; and yet, because I have abstained from this, I am accused of shrinking from the defence of my amendment. I thought that it would be abusing the patience of the Senate if I should attempt such a thing. And though, from the manner of the honorable Senator from Missouri, my frankness must have surprised the Senate, he has multiplied a repetition of his thanks for my proposal of a measure perfectly stale from repetition. The propositions have been repeated for years. What is there about them so "monstrous?" Is it pre-emption? Is that so atrocious? It is distribution? Is that "idle, unjust, or foolish?" If it be, let Congress take the burden of these denunciations on themselves. Pre-emption laws we have passed again and again, and a bill for distribution passed both the Senate and House of Representatives by triumphant majorities, and would have been the law of the land long ago but for a most extraordinary and unparalleled instance of Executive interposition. Was this the measure that was so "monstrous," so "enormous," so "outrageous," as to deter any gentleman from even an attempt at its defence?

But the honorable gentleman from Missouri seems to consider this proposition so monstrous and so outrageous, as a measure over "cunning," that I will now say a word or two on that point. It is, on my part, no cunning proposal. I have very little of that quality in my composition; it is a thing I know not in my public course; to work by cunning is a thing I leave to older and more practised politicians than myself. It was not my purpose or design to do any thing cunning when I offered the amendment to the present bill; I wished, as I have said, to put my exact position on record, that all might see it. I do not see any thing so very "cunning" in this. I knew, before I had said a word, that all who will not yield their unquestioning assent to depredations on the public lands may calculate on being denounced here as enemies of those hardy and adventurous men who are our precursors in subduing the wilderness. I never was their enemy. I am the son of a pre-emptor, and was myself born on a pre-emption; and if I have been restrained from going the full length with gentlemen on this subject, it is from no enmity towards the pre-emptors, but from a sense of duty to the Union, as one of the trustees to whom has been confided the management of their common property. I rejoice to find that there is now a way in which I may at once gratify my sympathies with the industrious and hardy settler, and at the same time do my public duty to all the States; that I can make a compromise between the rights of the settler and the rights of the Union. I am now ready and willing to give a pre-emption right of 320 acres of the public land to every real bona fide settler who is not worth over one thousand dollars. I am prepared to protect him in his possession against the host of rich and grasping speculators who, under the pretext of your pre-emption law, and under the deceptive mask of an intention to settle and improve your lands, are seeking to get the public domain into their possession, that they may convert it into an engine to enrich themselves. Is there any thing in this proposition so very unreasonable—so "monstrous"—so "enormous"—so "cunning?" If we are to have a pre-emption at all, for whose benefit is it to be granted? Gentlemen, in very moving tones, demand our sympathies and demand our bounties for the poor and needy. This proposition meets their sympathies and complies with their demands; it holds out a bounty to the poor and the needy—a larger bounty than the gentlemen themselves propose to give; and all it asks is a guard that this bounty shall not be given to the rich. Is that "monstrous?" What do gentlemen desire? What would they have? Do they want to give pre-emptions to the rich? To make the rich richer? If not, why do they reject my proposition? Mine has the very essence of a pre-emption law; and it is the only sort of a pre-emption law that can be honestly vindicated. Few men worth over a thousand dollars seek for themselves a home amongst the distant wilds of the public lands. Very small indeed is the number whom such a restriction will exclude; but it will shut out the men who make their wealth out of the public plunder. Do gentlemen resist it on that account?

I would not occupy a moment of the Senate's time were I not bound to show that I am not ashamed of the measure I have proposed, and have no thought of "shrinking" from its defence. What objection can be urged against that part of my amendment which proposes to unite with pre-emption the principle of distribution? It would be idle at this time to repeat the history of the cession to the Union of the public domain—on which cession rests the right of the States to a participation in its proceeds. These lands were ceded, be it remembered, in 1784, at a time when the old confederation was the fundamental law of the Union—when the Treasury was supplied by requisitions on the States, according to the amount of territory in each State; it was ceded with the express purpose that it should be and remain for the common benefit of all the States. The proceeds were to be divided according to the quota furnished by each State to the expenses of the General Government; and how was that quota regulated? According to an estimate of the amount of improved lands in the several States. But is that the rule of the States' contribution now? If the proceeds of the public lands go into the Treasury, does each State get its share now in this proportion? No; not unless the taxes were in exact proportion to the lands in each State. This rule has been altered. You have changed the means of taxation. But you cannot change the words of the acts of cession under which you hold your public lands; and the only way to fulfil the intent and meaning of that cession is to go according to the terms in which it is expressed. The revenue from the public lands is not like the rest of the revenue under the Constitution. Those lands were ceded to us, not under the Constitution, but under the Confederation; and the purpose of the cession can only be fulfilled by as near an approximation to the very words of the deed as circumstances now render possible.

But this proposition is very "dangerous." The honorable gentleman from Missouri reminds us that when, some years ago, we were about to distribute the surplus then in the Treasury by depositing it with the States, he uttered the prophecy that the practice of distribution would not stop there; that if the States once began to lap that blood, it would eventually become their common food; that the General Government would be stripped of its revenue; that the States would seize upon the money in the Treasury, and would have the General Government to collect the deficit as it could; in a word, that the States, having once got the taste of blood, would fasten on the General Government like so many vampires, and would drain its veins of the last drop of their vitality. Well: the honorable Senator last up seems to think (and I concur with him) that we ought to repose the fullest confidence in the good faith of the States, and rely without hesitation on their fulfilling all their contracts. But what does the argument of the Senator from Missouri imply? Confidence in the fidelity of the States? What a magnificent compliment has the honorable gentleman paid to the States of this Confederacy! In his opinion, they are so many vampires—they are to lap the blood of the Government—they are to feed upon its strength and suck its veins. Why, what is the General Government? Is it not their own offspring? And is the parental sentiment so weakened, so destroyed, so reversed, that the parent will devour the child? The States, it seems, are not to be trusted; they are a set of vampires; they will lap the heart's blood of the Government, and drain its veins. That is the Senator's opinion of them. I believe no such thing, but he does; and we were told all this, yea, and a great deal more. The States, if they once get their hands upon this money, will apply it to unwise purposes; it will corrupt them—destroy their dignity and sense of independence! In our pure hands alone there is no contamination. The States are a pack of idle spendthrifts, tempted by the sight of money, intoxicated by the touch of their own property, corrupted by its possession, and led into all sorts of folly and mischief; therefore, we, as a sort of wise guardians, must keep these our little wards from juvenile indiscretions—must defend them from themselves, by—keeping their inheritance!

The States have a right to demand this distribution; and if they have, their circumstances render it desirable that they should have what is their due. They have debts to pay; and under such circumstances, think you that they do not, like private individuals, like to receive what is due them? We are their debtors; we owe them this money; and they ought to have it. If it is their just right, then it is no argument to say "we need this money; we cannot spare it; our Treasury is at a very low ebb, and if we take out this amount to pay it to them, we shall have to lay taxes to make up the deficiency." We have no right to use their property for our purposes. We possess ampler modes of raising funds than the States do; and, if paying your just debts leaves you with a deficit, it is much easier for you to supply it than for the States to lie out of their dues. That is my answer to the honorable Senator, and all he says about the monstrosity of my proposition.

It is said to be "idle" to pay over this money to the States if by taxation we must raise an equal sum. But that is a fallacy. I have shown that the rate of distribution is to be regulated by the principles which prevailed under the old Confederation, and not according to the ratio of taxation established by the Federal Constitution. The principle of distribution applying to the proceeds of these lands is special and not general; it is regulated by the terms of the original cession, which was made while the Confederation was yet in force; but we have gone very wide from the rule then laid down. Give this money to the States, and every man in the State, rich and poor, will share in the benefit. It is their right, and they ought to enjoy it. I might stop there, without going into any question of consequences. But if, by distributing to the States the proceeds of their own property, we are driven to taxation to make up the deficit, have we not ample means? Are there not luxuries on which a very small tax will be sufficient for this purpose, without reaching the poor man at all? Lay your tax on these luxuries of life, and you tax the rich only. This you can do if your Treasury is in straits. I hope, too, that the abstraction of this money may operate to bring back the Government to a just and economical administration—such an administration as gentlemen all profess to desire. But how has it been administered during the expiring dynasty? Has the little stream of money flowing in from the sale of the public lands had any other effect than to increase the extravagance of the Government? More than thirty millions a year has been expended during the Van Buren administration. It would seem that this landed revenue, of which the gentleman from Missouri talks to us so solemnly, has done little but feed their extravagance. There is nothing, rely upon it, that so promotes extravagance in expenditure as to feel plenty of money in one's pocket. I do not want this Government to have any such feeling. I wish it to have no money flowing insensibly into its possession. I want it to have none but what it gets by taxation—so that the people may know and feel where the money comes from. Give a Government an income independent of taxes, and the people do not feel what they are paying. Such a mode of filling the Government coffers must be dangerous. I do not desire it to continue; and I hold, therefore, that justice and expediency alike require that this great subject of the public domain shall be settled as soon as possible. Give the amplest provision you please to the poor bona fide settler; I do not object to it; I am ready to do it, and I will do it freely and cheerfully; but while I do this, I would at the same time do justice and discharge my duty to the States, by giving them their just shares in the proceeds of the whole domain.

I hold this to be greatly preferable to the scheme of cession proposed by the Senator from South Carolina. I was, I confess, greatly surprised by many of the demonstrations of that honorable Senator. He reduced the value of the one hundred and sixty millions of acres of the public land, lying within nine States of this Union, to twenty-six millions of dollars! He reverses the position that each acre of that land is worth a dollar and a quarter, and holds, on the contrary, that not an acre of it is worth that price.

Mr. CALHOUN explained. He had meant to be understood that the lands were none of them worth a dollar and a quarter cash in hand value; and that none were worth that but such as could now be purchased in market.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The Senator thinks he can reduce the total value of the whole domain to its value as a sum in hand; and he insists that this sum, put out at interest, will bring us more than the lands will. Why, what is the value of land covered with the ocean which no man can drain? Or what is the value of land with no human being to cultivate it or to enjoy the fruit of it? What is the value in hand, of land so situated? Yet the Senator concludes that, because such land is of no value now, we ought to sell it now for nothing. That is the substance of his argument. What is the selling price of land under the sea, not drained, or land at present inaccessible to settlement? No man can get at the one or want the other—and, while things so remain, it has no present value at all. But would a prudent man, or a prudent Government, therefore, part with it for nothing? The value of a thing consists in the use of it—that is the value of land, and that only. Its value depends on the demand for it. Till the demand advances, we must content ourselves to wait. When it comes to be wanted, then it will have its value.

It is disgraceful to witness the manner in which matters are now proceeding—to see the sale of valuable lands postponed as it has lately been. The sale is advertised to take place in the midst of cold inclement weather, and when this is complained of, the Secretary then writes a most gracious letter declaring that, though he is in very great want of money, yet he will condescend to put off the sale a little longer. The Treasury wants a little money: does not know where to get it, until it is resolved to get up a pre-emption law; then Mr. Secretary, in all haste advertise the lands for sale, at a time proper or improper, no matter. Just as a spendthrift hastens to sell off a piece of his patrimony to-day to pay for the extravagance of yesterday, and to get what he needs for more extravagance to-morrow.

The whole basis of the honorable Senator's argument is perfectly idle and visionary. To talk of the present value of one hundred and sixty millions of acres of land, when every body knows that not more than five millions of it are wanted in a year? What demand is there for one hundred and sixty millions of acres of land? What is the price such a tract will bring if put up to sale? Had we not better husband it and sell it off, little by little, as it is needed? Can we not hold the property and sell it off for homes to settlers as homes are needed? Can we not keep it for posterity, when they will want homes too? This is not a subject to which to apply the calculations of annuities. The land is not wanted now, and therefore there is no ground on which to calculate its value at this moment.

But this notable scheme of cession is to remove at a stroke all our evils. This to put an end to our angry debates; this to put far away the danger of the lands falling into the hands of the settlers, or of the States. No more jealousies are to be felt between new and old States; no more Executive patronage is to be felt in this body or elsewhere; no more landed bribes are to be offered by ambitious seekers of the Presidency—nothing of all this is to be felt any more—all, all is to be at an end; and moreover, the cession is to bring you in more money for your lands! Now, I differ entirely from the learned Senator in all these calculations. I will show you how it is he makes the land produce us more money; by calculating, in the first place, what the land would fetch, if set up at auction when no one wants to buy, and then contrasting this with what we are to get for it from the States to which we are to cede it. But will this remove one solitary evil of all those he has enumerated? The States will be our debtors, and they are to promise to pay. Can the gentleman's perspicacity see no possible matter of controversy in the interpretation, and in the compliance with this contract? We have here individual States asking us for graduation and pre-emption laws, and it produces a vast deal of prolonged and angry debate; if we substitute money for land, will that diminish the debates? Shall we not have all the angry controversy then we have now? And more? Now, the General Government acts on individuals; it grants pre-emption to A and B, and it has them in its power; and yet he says there is the utmost danger of resistance, and of our losing the lands; but give up the whole and take a State bond, and then all will be peace and quiet.

ness. Why, will there not be as much danger when all who might oppose our authority are consolidated into one, as when we could deal with them as individuals, and take them one at a time? Can we act on a mass with more effect than on a single man? Is it so easy to deal with States and to compel them to fulfil their engagements? Was it found so in the days of the Confederation? Under the Confederation you acted on States—on States who had made promises; and did the plan work well? Was it perfectly easy to raise the respective quotas of the States, even under the most urgent pressure of the wants of the continental army, fighting for the liberties of us all? No; it was found to be a contest of Government against Government, and it was found that Governments are not as likely to pay as individuals; and, if they refused, it was much harder to coerce them. Hence that form of government was changed; and our Revolutionary forefathers were so "idle, or unjust, or foolish" as to think they gained by the exchange! and the Federal Constitution stands a monument of their wisdom to this day. But now, forsooth, we are to travel back again to the principles of the old exploded Confederation! We are to give up the land which is ours, and in the sale and management of which we have to do with individuals only; and we are to convert this vast and wide landed inheritance into debts of particular States. I do not distrust the honesty of the States, or their good intentions; but we know that it is not always convenient to pay to-day. Do debtors never ask indulgence as to terms or as to time? If we take these State bonds, are we perfectly sure they will never become a subject of controversy? May the States not say the progress of graduation is too slow? it keeps our people waiting too long; give us a modified graduation law with shorter periods of reduction, so that we may get the land at nine pence the acre so much the sooner? His peace-making proposition only changes the ground of controversy, it does not remove it. Its whole operation is to part with all the grounds of controversy we know, and look out for new sources of discord at present unknown. Shall we leave the ground we have so long trod, and with every foot of which we are familiar, to plunge into a sea of troubles new and untrod? I say no. And then we are to purchase all this trouble at a price.

A few years ago the proposition of the honorable Senator was to give up half the public lands. Was this fair, to surrender by cession to the use of a few that which is equally the property of all? To pacify the clamors of nine States, shall we give up one-half of 160,000,000 acres of land? Is not such a price rather high? And have we a right to pay it? I hold we have not. The entire scheme seems to me to be one of the wildest, most wasteful, most visionary conceptions that ever entered into the brain of a statesman.

But the object of the scheme is to get rid of Executive patronage. Now, I am not an advocate of Executive patronage. But, let me ask, what a vast patronage will there not be exerted by giving away, in one single act of generosity, an entire moiety of the public domain. Seldom, indeed, is one individual so fortunately placed as to be able, by a single act of magnificence, to make a present of eighty million acres of land—a vast and royal donation, to be sure. Yet the honorable Senator, while making this popular largess of eighty million acres of land belonging to the whole Union, is terribly opposed to patronage; and he tells us, as one of his "demonstrations," that, if we refuse to make this gift, nine States will be able to seize and carry off the whole property in a body, against the will of the other seventeen States. The "demonstration," I confess, does not to me appear to be very logical. I do not believe these States will ever be so unjust, so rapacious, so profligate, as to attempt thus to seize upon the property of their fellow-citizens. But if there is such great and imminent danger that these States will thus seize upon the lands, if we refuse to cede them, can not the honorable gentleman suppose, on the same ground of reasoning, that the States may tear up the bonds if we do cede them? If he considers them so utterly unprincipled, so impudent, and shameless as to seize upon and appropriate to themselves lands which belong to the whole family of confederated States, what will there be to restrain them from vacating their bonds after we have surrendered the land into their possession? One part of the gentleman's argument supposes the States to be all virtue and good faith, the other all rapacity and violence. There is great danger, imminent danger of our losing the whole domain, and we must give it away before the States take it by force; but when these entire lands shall be converted into the shape of a bond, then these States are to be all purity, all honesty, all fidelity. For my part it seems to me that if we cannot depend on these nine States for their fulfilment of their constitutional obligation to the Union, we cannot depend on any voluntary engagement they may now enter into.

I apprehend no such danger. I do not call upon the Senate to cede the public domain on any such ground. If that is to be the ground of our procedure, I say let the lands go. I will not be one to encourage the spoilers. I will never be one to say this thing must be done and will be done. On their own heads be it. I will take neither part nor lot in the responsibility.

I repeat that I have no objection whatever to consent to pre-emption, provided the rights of all the States can be respected. That is all I ask. That was all my amendment proposed. I am sensible that I have occupied too much of the time of the Senate, but, challenged and called out as I have been as one who had offered a proposition so outrageous, so enormous, so monstrous, that I shrank from all attempt to defend it, I could not refrain from saying a word in explanation and reply. The whole subject I know is perfectly stale. Not a word can be said upon it that has not been better said already. Yet, as my proposition was pronounced an enormity, I wished to show that I did not shrink from its avowal and defence. The enormity of which I have been guilty is a simple act of obedience to the instructions of my State Legislature. The plan is before the country, and denounced as it may be, and outrageous as it has been called, it is a plan which has received the public approbation wherever I have been. My own State has passed a solemn resolution giving it the seal of her approval. In offering it here, I have but obeyed her voice, and no denunciation, however loud and swelling, shall turn me aside from the course she has marked out for me to pursue. She understands her interests; she judges calmly; she asks nothing but her plain recorded right, and I ask nothing more in her name.

Mr. BENTON said that a part of the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] were in reply to a poor speech made by himself (Mr. B.) some days before, and were of a nature to require some answer from him. He would give the answer which the case required; but before answering the arguments of that Senator, he wished to set him right on a couple of small points on which he had fallen into error.

The Senator supposes, said Mr. B. that I applied the term cunning to him some days ago—that I spoke of him as a cunning man; and under this supposition, he repulses a term which he feels to be injurious. The Senator is certainly right in the repulse, if such a term was applied to him; for certainly there is nothing in his character to warrant the application. But I do not think it was so applied. I have no recollection of it. Certain I am that I never thought it, and I am not apt to speak what I do not think. Cunning is a quality which I had never thought of attributing to the frank and high minded character of that gentleman. On the contrary, if there was any defect in his character, (and what human character can be without some alloy?) if there was any little defect in his, it was the reverse of cunning—it was the excess of his amiability—and the obliging facility of his temper. I have thought him not quite cunning enough—not quite sharp enough to keep himself out of scrapes which others contrive; and that, on the present occasion, he has given evidence of that amiable facility by standing father for a very ugly child which is no son of his. The Senator appears as the present mover of the land distribution bill; a measure bad enough at all times, but too bad for its own author to move in at the present time, when the Treasury is so nearly empty, and when the proposition to abstract the land revenue from the annual income, and distribute it among the States, and supply its place by new taxes, is about equivalent to a proposition to put an end to the Constitution, and to let Congress go on to do what it pleases, without a guide to its steps or a restriction upon its will. I think if the Senator had been a little more cunning, he would not have moved that bill at this time; anxious as he might have been to oblige a friend, I think he should have demurred to the time, and begged off until the Treasury was full.

Mistaken as the Senator was in the supposition that the term cunning was applied to him, he has been equally so in the application of a term of his own to this side of the chamber, and doubtless intended for me—that of older politicians who could give him lessons in cunning. The Senator supposes that politicians older than himself—giving to the phrase a pointed application by a smiling glance in this direction—would be masters of a cunning to which younger politicians, himself for example, could not pretend. Now granting that there may be old politicians who are too cunning for that Senator, yet I deny that there are any such on this side of the chamber; and especially affirm that I am not. It is not on this side, but on his own side of the chamber, that he should look for these wily elders. There are none of them here. We are all his juniors. Between himself and myself he is most respectfully my senior. He was here long before me. I remember very well to have read with much satisfaction—the more, because the speaker was then on my own side in politics—the lively speeches of the Senator from Kentucky, delivered on this floor, long before Missouri was admitted into the Union—when I myself was a mere provincial attorney in the Territory of Missouri. The gentleman was therefore a politician, a distinguished one, of rank Senatorial, when I was nothing but a provincial attorney! This settles the question of political seniority between that Senator and myself. It leaves him far ahead of me. I believe I can also settle it up quickly for all the members on this side of the chamber. Immediately before me (pointing to Mr. KING of Alabama) sits the oldest sitting member of the House—not the oldest gentleman by any means, merely the oldest sitting member. The gentleman is not yet married, and it would be doubly wrong to wrong him in a question of time. The united terms for which he has been elected amount to twenty-eight years, six of which remain yet to be served. He has been here twenty-two years; he is the longest sitting member. He has seen many exits and entrances upon the Senatorial boards; but he has not been here long enough to have seen the first appearance of the Senator from Kentucky. That Senator had made his first entrance, and his first exit also, before the Senator from Alabama had taken his first seat here. He had served out a term, and was gone, before the oldest sitting member now here, had reached this floor.

[Mr. CRITTENDEN said: I have never been a politician since.]

Mr. BENTON continued: It is not on this side, but on his own side of the chamber, that the gentleman's remark can find its application. He must look on his own side—in his own neighborhood—on his right hand—for a view of the only Senator on his floor to whom his remark can apply.

Having disposed of these two small matters, Mr. B. would proceed to larger ones, and first would express his regret at having so signally failed in almost the only quality in public speaking which he aimed at; and that was intelligibility. He did not say perspicuity, for that was a high quality in speaking and in writing, and one to which he did not pretend. But intelligibility he did pretend to. He aimed at being intelligible—at being understood—at making his hearers comprehend his meanings; and in his aim at this quality, meritorious though humble, he greatly regretted having so signally failed. The Senator from Kentucky is astonished at the violent denunciation of a measure which has been so long before the country: he is astonished at the violent epithets which are lavished upon the land distribution bill—a bill for years before the Senate, and often recommended by State Legislatures. He is astonished at this denunciation, and these epithets; but has wholly failed to understand why I used them. I endeavored to make myself intelligible on this point, and therefore dwelt particularly upon the chronology of his movement. Bad and indefensible as the distribution of the land revenue was at all times—unconstitutional and mischievous as such a measure must forever be—it seemed to me to be stamped with peculiar enormity at the present time, and in the present circumstances of the Treasury. In was in respect to this time, and these circumstances, that I felt myself called upon to speak, and to speak in language which the Senator qualifies, perhaps very truly, as violent, unexpected, and uncalled for by the occasion. He understands me as directing all this violence against the measure itself; no part of it as being induced by the time and circumstances under which it is moved. Yet, upon these latter points, I intended to be full and pointed—explicit and emphatic; and upon these points I expected to hear from him; I expected to hear from him on the point of bringing forward a distribution of the land revenue at a time when the Treasury needed every dollar of the money; and when, if the abstraction should be made, an immediate resort must be had to loans or taxes to fill the chasm thus made in the public income. I expected to be understood on these points—to be replied to upon them—and the denunciation shown to be unfounded, if unfounded it was, which qualified this conduct as a naked, flagrant, breach of the Constitution! as much as if we levied taxes, or borrowed money, in the first instance, and by name, to be distributed among the States. I considered this conduct as flagrantly unconstitutional—as admitting of no argument—as being an exercise of our revenue-raising power, not for the Union, but for the States—not to support the Federal Government, or to pay its debts, but to support the State Governments, and to pay their debts. I relied upon the time and circumstances to give this flagrant character to the present movement in favor of the land bill; and upon these points I wished to be understood, and to have an answer. The Senator has not answered me: I presume he has not understood me—that I have not been able to make myself intelligible to him; otherwise he could not have been so entirely silent on the main points, while so profuse of answers on small ones.

The Senator has been dead silent upon the charge of flagrant unconstitutionality in creating a deficiency of revenue by distribution, for the purpose of supplying it by taxation. He has not denied but that it is equivalent to an original imposition of taxes for the purpose of distribution. He has neither answered this charge nor denied this proposition. Nor has he done another thing which I called upon him to do: he has not told us in what manner he would have the deficiency supplied—whether by loans, or taxes, or issues of Treasury notes. The gentleman shakes his head at this last alternative; he seems to eschew the Treasury notes. If so, we shall be together at that point; for a Treasury note issue is to me worse than loans or taxes. The gentleman would not tell his resource—whether to borrow or to lay duties; but, without the benefit of a declaration from him, I believe I am sufficiently acquainted with his alternative. I believe I can name it for him. I think I have heard enough upon this floor to be able to name it. It is a tax upon luxuries—upon silks and wines—upon French silks and French wines—which is intended to supply the place of the land revenue. This is the resort and the resource. He hopes to make his tax palatable by laying it on luxuries. But let me say to the Senator, that, in point of unconstitutionality, there is no difference between taxes on luxuries and on necessities. The point of expediency is open between them; but in constitutional authority there is no difference. It is just as unconstitutional to lay taxes upon silks and wines, for the sake of raising revenue for the States, as it would be to raise the same revenue by a tax on sugar and salt. As to the expediency of doing so, that is another question. When revenue is needed for a constitutional object, a luxury presents itself as a proper subject for taxation; but when it is not needed, a tax upon any thing is unconstitutional. As to French wines and French silks, a systematic effort has been going on for some time to have them taxed. To any one who will look at the table of the importation of these articles for a few years past, a reason may be seen for the efforts which are made out of doors to subject them to future duty. The importations have been immense—sufficient to supply the country for two or three years to come, and the effect of a tax would be to enrich present holders, not to replenish the Treasury. Present holders of silks and wines would add the duty to the price of the articles imported free of duty; new importers could not contend with them; for they might be undersold, and ruined; and thus a tax upon silks and wines, while enriching individuals who have been accumulating these articles, would add but little for some time to the Treasury receipts. The only effect would be to enrich individuals, and injure commerce, without material immediate benefit to the Treasury. The importations would be diminished until the present stocks were sold off; this diminution would be an injury to commerce and navigation—an injury to Southern commerce and to Northern navigation. The injury would fall upon the South and West—upon Southern and Western cotton and tobacco. Large quantities of these articles go to France. Nine pounds out of ten of the foreign cotton which she consumes, and four pounds out of five of the foreign tobacco which she uses, go from the United States; and how does she pay for them? Like other nations—in her products, and these products are chiefly silks and wines. Diminish the import of these silks and wines, and you diminish the export of cotton and tobacco, and besides dry up, or lessen one of the sources for obtaining specie. For these silks and wines, received in return for tobacco and cotton, are many of them exported from this country—carried to foreign countries—to the West Indies, Mexico, South America—there to be exchanged for specie, or valuable productions; and thus become the means of supplying us with money, while giving double employment to our navigation.

Mr. B. said it was an easy business to lay taxes; it required but little capacity, or knowledge, or thought, to draw up an act to lay so much per centum on the importation of a foreign article; but there was something else which was not quite so easy—which required judgment, knowledge, thought. It was to trace the workings of that tax through its multiplied consequences—through its effects on agriculture, on commerce, on navigation, and on the present pursuits of individuals. I do not profess to be able so to trace the operation of our taxes; but I can say that I have the annual document of our commerce and navigation for twenty years back—that I keep it at my room in this city—and that not for show, but for use. I study it from time to time, and endeavor to follow, and to understand, the vast subject of our foreign commerce, its connection and dependence on agriculture, and the effect of legislation in relation to it; and I am now ready to say, that let this question of taxing silks and wines—French silks and French wines—(for these are the kinds often mentioned, and always intended;) let this question come when it may, I shall hold myself ready to prove a tax on silks and wines to be a tax on Southern and Western productions—on Southern and Western agriculture—on Southern and Western cotton and tobacco. All that I have to say at this time is, that if this tax is to be laid for a necessary and a constitutional purpose, the people of the South and the West will be ready to pay it; but if proposed to be laid for an unconstitutional and unnecessary purpose—for the purpose of raising money, either directly or indirectly, to be given to the States, and chiefly to the States which raise no cotton or tobacco—then I say that they ought to resist the proposition—ought to oppose the tax by the united voice of their delegations in Congress, and should summon their brethren in every part of the Union to desist from a measure fraught with ruin to the Constitution, and injury to the one-half of the Union.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN]

is pleased to remember an expression which I used some days ago, and which was only a repetition of what I said four years ago, when the distribution of public money among the States was first proposed in this chamber. He remarked upon my expression that if the States once began to lap that blood, they would, in the end, prefer it to all other food, and suck it until the last drop was drawn away. I certainly said it, and not merely a few days ago, but four years ago. I used the metaphor, coarse, but strong; and I used words in their literal sense at the same time. I said if the States once began to receive supplies of money from the Federal Treasury, they would go on to supply themselves from that source, until the Federal Government was stripped of its property and its money, and left in the helpless and defenceless condition of the old Confederation, dependent upon the States for its support, and destined to die of inanition. I said then that the deposit with the States was a distribution—that not a dollar of it would ever come back to the Federal Treasury—that from dividing surplus revenue, we should come to the division of that which was not surplus—that the States would take what they wanted, and let the Federal Government supply itself as it could—that the public defences, and all the proper objects of Federal expenditure, would be stinted and sacrificed, that the money might be taken to be divided among the States. This is what I said four years ago; and short as the time has been, we have seen it more than realized. The twenty-seven millions deposited with the States until needed for the uses of the Federal Government, have been needed, are now needed, and cannot be had. They are gone forever! The public man is not in existence who dares to call for it, or any part of it. Even those who reproached me for saying it would not be returned, cannot venture to ask its return; and if they did, they would be told it could not be paid—that the States, far from being able to refund what they had received, were compelled by their necessities to call upon us for more! The public defences have almost disappeared from public view. I endeavored for some time to make a stand upon this point; I endeavored to rouse the Senate and the country to the necessity of attending to the public defences. With what effect? None, but to make myself an object of derision! to be literally laughed at, and cried down under the clamors for distribution! My worthy colleague [Dr. Linn] now ventures to mention it again, as a proper direction to be given to the public land revenue: he makes the proposition as the antagonist of distribution: the friends of distribution will overwhelm his proposition. Sir, I saw and foretold many evils from the commencement of this distribution policy; but I did not foresee all the evils of it. Things have taken place already which my imagination, gloomy as it was, and boding evil as it did, could not foresee. I did not foresee that, in six short months after the first deposit bill passed, a second one should be offered, and not only offered, but saddled, contrary to all parliamentary rule—contrary to all fair legislation—upon a bill of a totally different character—upon a fortification bill, which was actually sunk and lost under the foreign and unnatural load. I did not foresee this in June, 1836, when I declaimed against the evils of the distribution scheme; but I did see it in January, 1837, when it actually happened! Neither did I foresee an accusation of fraud against the United States for not depositing nine millions more, when she had nothing to deposit or to use, and was driven to the issue of Treasury notes for her daily support. Neither did I foresee the motion of this day—the motion of the Senator from Kentucky to make distribution of the land revenue at a time when the Federal Treasury was in want of every dollar which the lands, and the customs, and every other source of revenue can bring to it. I did not foresee these things; but they have happened. They have come upon us; and they confirm me in my original opinion, that this distribution policy is the most fatal step ever yet taken in our Government. It brings the States upon us for their supplies; it makes them look to us for all the money which they want; and they have the power to take what they please. The Union has no Senators or Representatives in Congress; these functionaries belong to the States. In every question between the States and the Union, the delegation of every State must take part with its own State. Demand what the States please, and they must have it. First, surplus revenue; then the public lands; then current revenue; then taxes laid for their benefit; then loans made for them, credit stretched for them, and debts assumed to sustain them. We must all vote the wishes of our States, or give place to those who will do it. There will be none to defend the Union—none to protect its existence—none to form a life guard around her. The President is the only part of the legislative power which is elected by the Union, and responsible to the whole Union. He has a negative voice upon our legislation, and is peculiarly bound to exercise that voice when the safety of the Union is endangered by the encroachment of the States. He, and he alone, is the representative of the Union. His veto power balances two-thirds of the two Houses; and as the representative of the Union, he should use it when the Union is endangered. We have had one President to do this—one President to prevent the passage of a land distribution bill—and to protect the property of the Union from the seizure of the States. We have had one to do it; and for doing it, we hear him daily denounced by those to whom the late elections have transferred all power. We have had one President to discharge his duty to the Union which elected him; he is denounced for it; and according to all that we can see and hear, we are not to have another for four years to come at least. Sir, the danger is reversed. Formerly the States were in danger from the Federal Government; now the Federal Government is in danger from the States. It is now a moneyed, and not a political action, which creates the danger. The encroachment of the Federal Government upon the States was political; that of the States upon the Federal Government is pecuniary. The States go for the money, and for the property of the Federal Government. They help themselves to it; they take what they please. No veto power is now to arrest their arm. Twenty-six States fasten themselves upon the bosom of the Federal Government; they hang themselves upon every vein and artery which circulates life-blood through her body. How long will it be before they suck her dry, and leave her dead?

Mr. B. touched again upon the public defences. He lamented the loss of the twenty-seven millions which had gone to the States, and which had been to them what a prize drawn in a lottery is to a thoughtless young man—the mere incentive to extravagances, which lead to debt and misery. Every State is worse off since she received this money. The Union has lost it from the defences, and to the States which received it, it has been a curse. More than that: it has destroyed all thoughts of national defence! Banished all idea of fortifications, armories, foundries, steam ships, and the whole armor of defence. The cry for distribution stifles the voice of patriotism; and in doing so, invites the foreign powers to intrude and trample upon us. The nation, like the man, which will not use its means for defence, invites aggression. It invites insult, depredation, outrage, war. This is enough for me to say at this time. I will not give to the general remark an individual application. I have forborne to speak of the boundary question, so often agitated here, and which I consider as nothing but one link in a chain of questions. Though a Senator for twenty years, and this question a prominent theme the whole time, I have forborne to speak upon it. I have sat silent, and observant, while all sides of the chamber were eager to speak out. Why have I done this? Because I had no opinions? Certainly not; for I have never been without a decided opinion. Because I was afraid to avow it? Not at all. I have no reason to be afraid of my countrymen, and still less of foreigners. Why, then, not speak out? Because the public mind is not ripe for the reception of my sentiments! because the public ear is not ready to hear them! It would be nonsense to speak my sentiments on the English questions—I will not limit myself to the boundary question—but speak in the plural; it would be idle for me, in the present state of the public mind, to speak out. We must await the progress of events. In the mean time, I shall take the liberty to say that Congress is inviting aggression by neglecting defence, and crippling the Union by surrendering its money and its property to the States.

We have just had one humiliation, said Mr. B. and we do not want another. We have seen what no Government has experienced before. It was believed that the degradation of Governments had reached their lowest point, when a company of English merchants were seen in Asia dethroning princes for the balance of an account, and seizing kingdoms in payment of a note of hand. The imagination of Sheridan and Burke could conceive nothing beyond that; the magnificent oriental drama of the trial of Warren Hastings could present nothing beyond it. But we have seen something beyond it. We have seen the election of an American President made a stockjobbing operation on the London Exchange. We have seen English bankers and money dealers "turning their attention to the internal politics of America," and "trying a change of the American Executive," in order that stocks might rise, and themselves pocket per centums on the American securities which they held! We have seen this; and it seems to me that, to have the "change of the American President" converted into a stockjobbing operation on the London Exchange, is to reach a point of humiliation which no Government has ever seen before.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The Senator has based his whole reply to my remarks on the assumption that the States do not possess the right to demand of the General Government a distribution of the proceeds of their common estate in the public lands. I went on the assumption that they have that right. That is not denied, and has not been disproved. True, the money has to pass through the Treasury, but still it is their money. This point the Senator has not touched; every thing has been argued but the principal point in the argument, on which all the rest hangs and turns.

The honorable gentleman, in his concluding remarks, made a very extraordinary assertion indeed. Alluding to the late Presidential election, and the influence of foreigners in this country, he ascribed the change in the Executive Administration of this Government to the bankers and stockjobbers in England and in this country. Can this be possible? Sure I am that, if such an influence does exist, it has not reached the part of the country where I reside; nor can it have operated where the honorable Senator himself lives, as the vote of his State for Martin Van Buren conclusive proves. It is not at that end of the Union, then; and I am sure it is not in the centre: where, then, is this dangerous and irresistible influence which has revolutionized our whole party history? Where, I ask, has it been at work? Here are collected representatives of every portion of the entire Union; to each Senator I put the question, Was it your State whose vote has been controlled by the trickling, stockjobbing capitalists of Europe? Which of the States is it that lies under this foul stigma? Or is it branded on the forehead of the whole American people? Is this entire Republic to be considered as justly charged with this dishonor? Is it true that the two or three millions of voters who constitute that majority whose votes have brought in a new Administration, have been influenced, swayed, bought up with foreign money?—the meanest and basest of all influences. Where is the evidence that fixes a blot like this to the American name? For myself and my constituents, for the noble and beloved State I represent in part on this floor, I put the charge far from me. If there has been such an influence at work, it has not been among us. No one man of the twenty-six thousand majority of votes cast in Kentucky for General Harrison has acted, as I in my soul believe, from any such base, unworthy, degrading influence. Loth I am to believe that any free-born American citizen has acted so unworthily of his name and his birthright. And again I ask, where is the proof of it? Does the Senator believe that proof to be found in a correspondence between an agent in the State of Missouri and some financiering gentleman in England?

Mr. BENTON. A director of the Bank of England.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Well; a director of the Bank of England, with respect to the sale of a portion of Missouri stock? Is that what the Senator relies on? The agent here writes to his correspondent in England as to the influence likely to be exerted by public events in this country on the price of American stocks. Is there any thing so wonderful—any thing so "monstrous," so "outrageous" in this? Can any thing be more natural, more in course, than such a correspondence on such a subject? Suppose, instead of speaking of the price of stocks, he had been writing about the probable price of cotton, might he not have referred to a probable change in our financial system as likely to affect that article of trade? Does not every body know that the very slightest change in public affairs has an effect on the commercial world, and immediately affects the state of prices in the market? And why should not this be mentioned in regard to stocks as well as any thing else for sale in the market? That is all the proof I have heard in support of this mighty charge about British stockjobbing influence in American elections.

Mr. BENTON. Not the tenth, not the hundredth part of the proof.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. No: I will tell the honorable Senator what has produced this astounding political change. The gentleman shall not escape from the argument—from a fact so notorious. It would indeed be but a melancholy consolation to the gentleman and his friends, to ascribe their defeat to the dishonor of their native country. Were I in their situation, sooner than cast a stigma like this on the land of my nativity, and on so large, so vast a majority of my countrymen, I would admit that my party had mismanaged public affairs, or that at least the people thought they had; or, somehow or other, they had lost the public confidence. Never, never since the foundation of the Government, did so many American freemen cast their votes with one special and specific understanding as to the grounds of their united action. That is my opinion. The result of the late election is not the effect of British gold, but the sense of the American people as to the management of their public affairs, publicly and palpably expressed. Let not gentlemen attempt to get out of the position in which that election has placed them, by stigmatizing the people of the United States with corruption. No, no: this expression of opinion comes from the old genuine Republican stock who set up the Government: it is a spark from the old Revolutionary flint, and it has blown the gentlemen sky high. Let them not, now that they have reached the ground, and are rubbing their bruised and broken limbs, try to disguise from themselves the truth as to what hurt them. Strange indeed would it be, could the magic wand of British gold be applied to produce such a result. All the natural causes, on that subject, seem to point the other way. We might expect that Kings and Presidents, who try to be, and to live, like Kings, feel a natural sympathy with each other. They do not seek to put down the throne to raise the cottage. If the real truth could be come at in the matter, I verily believe that there was more foreign sympathy with the reigning President than with his plain, humble, Republican opponent. There is not a State, no, nor a county, through this wide Union, that was swayed in its late vote by any influence from the London Exchange. Gentlemen are sadly puzzled to account for the result. Some say, "Oh, it was all the work of British gold!" Others say, "It was nothing but the senseless cry about log cabins and hard cider." All sorts of devices are used to disguise a fact so appalling. Some say it was all the effect of coon-skins. And one very distinguished, intellectual, argumentative Senator assured us that, if the principles of the Whig party were to be carried out, they would lead only to this, that we should pull down this magnificent Capitol, the proud hall of American legislation, and build in its place a log cabin hung round with coon-skins! But the gentlemen do not, or will not, understand what they see. It is no cry about log cabins or hard cider that has thus moved, as one man, almost the whole American people. It was something greater, higher, deeper. I know that the election of William Henry Harrison is to the politicians a stumbling block, and to the Van Buren men foolishness; but to any unbiassed, candid, intelligent observer, it must appear to be the wisdom and the power of a great people. I can tell the gentlemen that it is not so very politic to sneer at log cabins. They are the emblem, the visible type, of the power of the people. Long will it continue to be dear to them as a remembrance of the fact that they were able, by the peaceful fiat of their will, to take the man they loved from a log cabin, and set him in the palace of their dominion. It is the practical, visible, tangible symbol of their power—which may God preserve! Think you to win their favor by treating it with scorn and derision? You forced it on us by your taunts; you laughed at our candidate as the inmate of a cabin; and you have seen, and you now feel, the effect of your own wit; and, if I am not very much mistaken, you will never need another lesson to teach you the danger of sneering at log cabins. The people are coming, on the 4th of March, to show you what it is to set your foot upon them. They are bringing the man of the log cabin, and they mean to place him in yonder White House. You puzzle your heads sadly to account for it; but we will work out the sum for you.

Mr. BENTON rose again immediately after Mr. CRITTENDEN, and said that he had again failed at the point of intelligibility—had again failed in the only quality which he aspired to in public speaking—had again failed in the humble effort of trying to be understood. The Senator from Kentucky mistook him. He had not attributed the result of the late Presidential election to any one cause, much less to the sole interference of British bankers. He spoke of the degradation to which we were subjected when these money dealers had the audacity to interfere in our Presidential election in order to raise the price of their stocks. It was the disgrace of the interference of which he spoke, and not the effect of the interference. The Senator from Kentucky was mistaken in supposing that he had attributed the result in every State to the interference of the London money dealers. He (Mr. B.) knew very well what he had said; and what he had said he was able to prove, and meant to do it on a proper occasion. He had the evidence on hand, and that not merely in the Huth letters, and in the London high Tory papers, but in more formal and considerate productions. I said that the change of the American Executive had been made a stockjobbing operation on the London Exchange—that English money dealers had interfered in our election, and interfered for the purpose of raising the price of stocks—for the purpose of enabling them to pocket per centums. This is what I said. I was speaking of national disgrace, and not of election results. Doubtless these foreigners contributed much to that result; but I have never attributed the whole to them. I ascribe the result to many causes; but since the official returns have come in, I confess the result is, to me, incomprehensible. These returns show the Democratic candidate to have been defeated after receiving an immense, and almost incredible increase of votes. Mr. Van Buren received, in 1840, no less than 370,000 votes more than he received in 1836; he received nearly double as many as General Jackson received at either of his elections; he would seem to have received an increase as votes equal to the increase of the whole voting population; he had received all this, and still he is defeated! This, sir, is incomprehensible to me. Perhaps the Federal census may throw some light on the enigma.

The question now recurring on the amendment moved by Mr. CALHOUN—

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky reminded the Senate that the amendment contained a blank which should be filled before the vote was taken.

Mr. CALHOUN said he left the blank to be filled by the Senate as it might think proper. If the amendment should prevail, the blank might be filled afterwards.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said there was no need of filling the blank at this moment.

Mr. PRESTON said the proposition was one of importance, and he required a little time to reflect before he voted upon it; and he thereupon moved that the Senate adjourn.

The motion prevailed, and
The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 13, 1841.

The Pre-emption bill coming up as the unfinished business, and the question being on Mr. CALHOUN's proposition to strike out Mr. CRITTENDEN's amendment, and insert a provision ceding the public lands, on certain conditions, to the States in which they lie—

Mr. PRESTON expressed his regret that, on his account, the Senate should have gone through the formality of an adjournment, since he had nothing to say which would at all compensate for this delay. He had intended to offer but a few necessary remarks, and he now therefore rose under circumstances somewhat embarrassing. He felt it, however, to be a duty which he owed to himself, before he gave the vote which he intended to give on this measure, to state some reasons why he could not yield it his support; more especially as he had formerly felt somewhat inclined to favor some such scheme: for he had been ready to embrace almost any measure which should divest the Federal Government of the trouble, vexation, embarrassment, contests, and particularly of the patronage which arose from these public lands lying within the several States. The management of them seemed to be generally conceded to be very burdensome to our legislation, and he had been very anxious that no effort should be omitted to deliver Congress from its perpetual exactions; and he still considered it as one of our misfortunes to be so often called to discuss and decide upon difficult questions connected with this intricate subject, and so frequently to exercise the powers of the General Government within the limits of the States.

A long course of observation, however, had diminished his apprehensions as to the subject of most difficulty, viz: the danger of Executive patronage, arising from the possession and management of this extensive domain. Reason and experience had long since taught him that all the powers which Congress assumed, whether legitimately or not, whether constitutional or otherwise, ultimately found their residence in the President of the United States, whose person was the great and ultimate depository of the powers of Government, and most especially of all unauthorized and doubtful powers claimed by it. Having resisted all irregular exertion of Executive authority with great anxiety, and having felt its effects very severely, Mr. P. had been extremely desirous to see the prolific source of patronage diminished or cut off. When he saw, from day to day, so many of the Senators, representing new States of the Confederacy, voting habitually with the Executive, and sustaining all those measures which he then thought, and the result has proved, to be most disastrous, he inferred that there was a source of influence in the public lands which produced a course so much to be deprecated. He perceived that the control of this public domain enhanced the powers of Congress, and that Congress was disposed to surrender its powers to the Executive.

He, however, said that the deep and painful anxiety he had once experienced on this subject had been somewhat diminished. He was happy to find that he had been mistaken as to the extent of the evil; that, after all, the free spirit of the inhabitants of the new States was competent to resist this malign influence—of asserting its independence, and this gave a pledge, and furnished a happy augury of the continuance of our free institutions. Mr. P. admitted that he had been taught a lesson of great value. The landed States, which he had once supposed to be bowed and subjugated by their condition into a spirit of subserviency to the Executive will, had, in the late Presidential election, proved that a large majority among them were animated by a spirit superior to local and temporary influences. Five out of nine of these States, embraced in this cession, had ranged themselves against the existing Administration, in spite of its patronage, and the open and daring use of it for its purposes, and out of sixty-three, had cast forty-two votes for General Harrison. Mr. P. asked pardon, therefore, of these patriotic new States for the fears which had once possessed him. He here took back the opinion he had once held and expressed. He congratulated the country on so favorable an omen for the future, and was now prepared well to believe that the sturdy independence of our brethren in the West would ever be ready to assert itself when circumstances required. Mr. P. said this in no spirit of acrimony towards any one, but to explain and vindicate some change of opinion which had been mainly founded on these views.

He did not desire to be understood as saying that he had or could at any time have approved the project of cession now presented to the Senate, but he had once expressed himself in favor of surrendering in some way to the new States the exclusive control of the public land within their limits, hoping thereby to exempt Congress from all further responsibility and anxiety respecting it, and to relieve those States from the influence of a dangerous patronage. He did not think that, even under the powerful action of these motives when operating on his mind in their fullest force, he could have voted for the measure proposed by his colleague. He certainly could not do so at this time.

He was aware that the entire subject of the administration of the public domain was now thrown open for discussion, but it was not his purpose to enter at large upon the subject, not only because there was not now time to do it justice, but because he had already spoken to the principle of pre-emption contained in the bill.

And now, with regard to the amendment before us, let us first look at the nature of the powers of Congress in controlling the public land. By an express provision in the Constitution, we are authorized to make such regulations in regard to them as Congress shall think proper. This provision resulted from the cessions by Virginia and Connecticut, and from the subsequent ordinance of the old Congress. Undoubtedly these grants did look to the power exercised under the Confederation in establishing the rates of contribution of the different States to the expense of the General Government. I hold in my hand these deeds of cession and the ordinance to which I have just referred. I shall not go fully into the extent of the control here authorized, or the duties of Congress growing out of it. By these deeds it is declared as follows:

Deed of Cession of Virginia, March 1, 1794.

"That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not received for or appropriated to any of the before-mentioned purposes," &c. "shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become or shall become members of the Confederation or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia included, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

Deed of Cession of Connecticut, Sept. 14, 1788.

"All the right, title, interest, jurisdiction, and claim of the State of Connecticut," &c. "shall be included, released and ceded to the United States," "for the common use and benefit of said States, Connecticut inclusive."

South Carolina deeded August 9, 1787, "for the benefit of the said States." North Carolina deeded "as a further means as well of hastening the extinguishment of the debts, as of establishing the harmony of the United States," and declared that the lands "shall be considered a common fund." Georgia deeded on the same conditions.

Resolution of Congress, Oct. 10, 1790.

Resolved, That the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States, by any particular State, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States.

What, then, are the powers and duties of Congress in reference to this fund? The first thing that strikes one is, the cession of Virginia a fund was ceded—expressly and emphatically a fund—to be used in the general charge and expenditure, for the use and benefit of all the States; and then, by way of greater caution and more explicit declaration, adds, "and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." It is manifest that Virginia had in view a money transaction—the creation of a fund to be in the hands of Congress, to be disposed of for money purposes. While she ceded the jurisdiction of the lands, her object was to enable Congress to discharge moneyed dues, and effect fiscal operations. I contend that this was a trust fund, to be used for the benefit of the United States, on certain conditions, and under restrictions, and that our control over it is limited by the nature of the trust. Here, then, we have a fund created—a trust confided—and the objects of both specified, viz: to relieve the States from the burdens imposed by the Confederation, and each State was to receive the benefit, according to its usual proportion in these burdens.

We must perform in full faith whatever duty was confided to us. Yet, considering the whole scope of the deed of cession, we cannot conclude that, in the administration of this trust, we are to regard it exclusively in a money point of view, as mere pounds, shillings, and pence. There are other and very high considerations which cannot themselves with the subject. We must remember that, while we act under trusts from Virginia and Connecticut and other ceding States, we also act under other trusts, of a very comprehensive nature, from all the States, and that each of these trusts must be administered in reference to the other, so as not to trench upon or be inconsistent with it. If, because it is a fiscal trust from Virginia, we act upon a calculation of mere pounds, shillings, and pence, then we immediately run foul of the other trusts which we hold from the whole Union. While we look that we are faithful to the one, we must see that we are not unfaithful to the other; we must keep an eye to the whole, and carry on all our trusts together, as harmoniously, with respect to each other, as we can. We must destroy none, but promote all, as far as it shall be possible. I am not for looking exclusively to the financial aspect of our power, but for remembering that, in the discharge of them, there also political relations which must of necessity be evolved. No doubt, the first motive which led to the cession was a political one—the States owning no land, seeing that the vast domains of other States might lead to an undue ascendancy in the Confederacy, therefore proposed a cession for the erection of new States.

We are entrusted then with a general fund which we are bound to administer in a spirit at once of liberality towards the new States, of just economy as regards our Treasury, and of mere policy as regards the general good of our Union. These new members of the Confederacy have been made States much more quickly than ever was anticipated; they are treated as children, and have ever been treated as favored children. They have grown and thriven with vast and unexpected rapidity; they are filling up with a teeming population, and are fast becoming of themselves a magnificent empire, which stands in the presence of the other States, not as a child in the presence of its parents, but as one of full growth and proportions, on a footing of entire equality with the Old Thirteen, and destined, at no distant day, even to assert superiority of them. But, on the other hand, it should not be forgotten that while we have been so fulfilling the trust reposed in us as to promote and foster the well-being of the new States, we hold a trust for all the States of the Confederacy, and hold it on the ground that this public domain on which these new States have sprung up, is a fund—a common fund for the use of all the States. What was the feelings of Virginia when she made a cession in terms so guarded? She states the purposes for which she makes the cession, and then she adds that it shall be applied to these purposes, and to no other use or purpose whatever. And to show the spirit of caution in which she proceeded, she would not leave it to implication that her own rights were of course to be regarded with the rights of all her sister States, but added the words "Virginia included," thus making assurance doubly sure. There is not on the records of civilized nations a more illustrious instance of long-sighted, wise, and devoted patriotism than this very act by the Commonwealth of Virginia. She thus dismembered herself of an extent of territory larger than her own limits, and freely gave it to the whole Republic. She begged herself that she might bestow this munificent donation upon the Union at large. And now, in her advanced age, when her lands are worn out, and, instead of being covered with waving harvests of wheat, are covered over with broom-sedge, when her finances are embarrassed, and we may almost say that in her old age she is actually improve-rished, is it right, is it becoming, is it honorable, is it grateful to turn round and say to her, you are no longer entitled to any share in the benefits of this your own donation? Were there no other State in the Union which could put in any claim to a share in the proceeds of this public domain, surely it is our duty, it is your duty, it is my duty to stand up for the rights of the Old Dominion, and to see that she shall retain some portion in that inheritance, which, with a regal munificence, she has freely bestowed upon us all.

In the administration of the public lands, we are not to oppress and pinch the West, so as to wring out the very last dollar the lands can be made to produce; we are not to act the part of a miserly landlord. We have not acted in this spirit. Never. On the contrary, I aver that we have acted towards these new States the part of a true-hearted and generous parent. We have nurtured, and fed, and clothed them, till they are grown to the height and stature of adult strength long before they are of age. From being feeble and helpless and tottering, they have become strong and rich and able. But would I stop here? Not at all. I would act towards them in the same spirit still—a spirit liberal, affectionate, and generous. I would foster their growth and improvement, and promptly defend them from Indian aggression; but, at the same time, as a trustee, I would look for some return of profit to the other States of the Union.

Now, in the application of these general principles to the amendment which has been proposed by my colleague from South Carolina, in the first place I inquire whether his is a financial scheme at all; and if so, whether it is such an one as, under the relations in which we stand, it is just and proper for us to adopt? I cannot but regard it as it respects the cession under which we have received these lands. I will not quibble about the terms. Virginia did certainly cede these lands to the United States, and the equivalent was the securing of certain rights to herself, together with the incidental advantages which would grow out of the cession to herself and her sister States. But was it a sale? Was it a financial agreement? Did she reserve for herself a fund from the proceeds? Was it a mere act of bargain and sale? Nothing like it. It was a deed of boundless liberality; it was a cession of all her interests in this vast territory; it was an act in which she sacrificed herself and looked only to the good of the country. The present amendment purports to be a "cession." We are to give away to the new States the public land. But can we give these lands away as Virginia did? Is this Territory ours, as it was hers? Not at all. She held it in fee-simple. She held it in entire and absolute property. It was her own; she might do with it what she would, and she chose to give it away. But we cannot give it. It was hers in fee simple; it is ours only in trust. She held it in her own right; we hold it in right of others. She held it as proprietor, we hold it as trustees for all the States. That we have a right to sell the land, I have no doubt; and that, in execution of other trusts confided to us, we may, in certain cases, give portions of it away, I do not deny; but we have no constitutional right to destroy the trust: that is an act which transcends the power of Congress. And further, if we part with it under a mere colorable sale, it is an avoidance of our high trust, and a violation of the Constitution. If we sell at all, we must sell in good faith, for a valuable consideration, and for the benefit of the United States.

What is the consideration reserved in this act of cession? It purports to be 65 per cent. on the sales; in other words, it is a proposition to cede 35 per cent. of the proceeds of the public lands to certain selected States. What consideration for this 35 per cent? We have been now for fifty years administering this trust, and we have not yet got through with it. It is, in fact, continually opening upon us. There seems something magical about it. It grows on us as we proceed. A portion of the trust estate has been destroyed, and yet, just as fast as we have sold and consumed it, it has increased upon our hands. In proportion as we have ascended in our legislation, a wider horizon has opened. At first, there was a wall of Indians and of foreign territory all around us; but with every rolling year its limits have been rolled back. It is not now bounded by the Miami, nor by the Wash, nor by the Mississippi; no, nor by the Rocky Mountains. But my honorable friend here [Mr. Linn] invokes the Senate to extend its view to the mouth of the Columbia river. We have not done with this trust, nor half done with it: we have built up an empire, and yet we are only on the threshold of our possessions. To show how little we have yet made by it in a financial view, let me state that, from the returns as brought up to a very recent period, our expenses have exceeded our gains. We are not yet repaid for the expenses of the trust: we are more than five millions yet in debt. I speak of the whole domain, however derived. The cost and charges of managing this property have been $102,000,000. The income from it has been not quite $98,000,000. Nor is this difference the only balance against us. Thus far, the sales of the public lands have not reimbursed the expenses of their acquisition and preparation for sale. The following is the official statement of the account current of the United States with their public lands:

Statement of the cost in the acquisition and management of the public lands, and of the receipts arising from the sale thereof, to the 30th September, 1838.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
REGISTER'S OFFICE, February 1, 1839.

T. L. SMITH, Register.
NOTE.—The records of this office exhibit no specific appropriations for suppressing Indian hostilities until 1836; prior to that year, the cost of wars with the Indians was paid out of appropriations for the Army generally. The expense of Indian hostilities from 1st January, 1836, to 30th September, 1838, amounts to $15,232,868 64.

This account does not include the heavy disbursements for Indian wars, which, swelled by the recent enormous expenses in Florida, may be safely set down at forty millions of dollars. With this very large balance standing against the land yet in possession of the United States, if the calculation of the value of that residue made by the Senator from South Carolina be correct, the whole will not reimburse us, much less the 65 per cent. which he proposes to reserve. And thus we shall have squandered not only what Virginia and the other States gave us, but also a large sum of money contributed by the old States in the form of taxes upon their citizens before the States now proposed to be benefited were in existence. In this most obvious view of the case, we give out of the Treasury, to a few favored States, thirty-five per cent. of many millions of dollars collected from the other States. By this operation, Virginia will not only have given her lands but her money also. She will have transferred her property and paid a sum to those who take it. The quantity of land proposed to be surrendered by this act of cession is, according to the report of the select committee, one hundred and fifty-four millions of acres, lying in various portions of the nine selected States. Thirty-five per cent. upon this quantity is upwards of fifty millions of acres, certainly a munificent donation. The average annual income from the sale of public lands for the last twenty years is about five millions of dollars. Assuming this ratio, the annual grant in money to these nine States is more than a million and a half of dollars. It is equal to the civil list of those States. It is the assumption of the public debts of those States. It is the distribution of the whole net proceeds of the public lands amongst nine States.

It seems to me that the mode of calculation by which the mover of this amendment brings down the value of the public lands is erroneous; but, whatever that value may be, we have no power to cast it away. One thing is certain, that the sales yield an income of five millions, and that, in all human probability, they will continue to do so for the next thirty years. Their value for a sum in hand, therefore, is correctly estimated by a very obvious process. The annual receipts should cover the annual interest, and provide a sinking fund for the capital. By this mode of calculation, then, allowing the income from the public lands to terminate at the end of thirty years, the present value in hand would be upwards of fifty millions; and the proposition thus reduced results in a donation, in present, of seventeen millions of dollars to the nine States. The eagerness manifested by the Senators representing those States is natural. There is a grandeur in this munificence which subdues the imagination, and casts into shade the vast donation of Virginia—differing from that, too, in this: that, whereas Virginia gave to all the States, herself included, this proposition gives to one-third of the States, containing less than one-sixth of the population.

That the average of the last twenty years is a just, or at least a sufficiently low, criterion of the proceeds of the public lands for the future, will be apparent from the consideration of the great increase of the population, which furnishes the demand for new lands. The United States now contain 18,000,000 of inhabitants, an increase at the rate of about 700,000 a year. The demand for new settlements will increase in a corresponding ratio with the population. It may be safely put down as increasing at the rate of four per cent. Experience, heretofore, has shown that the rate of purchase does not diminish, as the land has been picked and culled; but, on the contrary, those lands which have been longest in market are most freely sold, in proportion to the quantity in market. Thus, lands are more rapidly taken up in Ohio than in Arkansas, for the obvious reason that a dense population makes inferior land more valuable in the midst of it, than more fertile districts in an uninhabited country. There is but a million of acres of United States land now remaining unsold in Ohio, and even this is diminishing with an accelerated ratio. It therefore may be well assumed that from this source the United States may enjoy a revenue of five millions, until very much the largest portion of the domain within the nine States is disposed of, and long before that period Florida, Iowa, and Wisconsin will have brought their contributions to the general fund, and extended the period of this income to future generations. Reasoning upon data known to be correct, in thirty years from this time the demand for the public lands will be in proportion to a population increasing at the rate of two millions a year.

But there are other serious objections to this amendment, and I invoke the attention of Senators from every quarter of the Union to that which I am now about to state. The proposed mode of disposing of the public lands is altogether and to an enormous extent unequal in its operation. What I insist on is, that there shall be at any rate a perfect equality; that there shall not be discrimination and bounties in favor of one State and against another; but here there is a degree of inequality which, were there no other objections, would be sufficient to compel my decided dissent. It is proposed to cede the public domain to each of the States respectively within whose territorial limits they lie. It is given to the States, not to individuals. It is given to them, not as being all the States, but as being part only of the States of the Union. Should it be ceded to all the States, it would be a violation of the original cession of the Constitution, as the advocates of this measure contend. It is to be ceded to the States, not in proportion to their contributions to the public burdens, or in proportion to their size or population, but simply as States. And what will be the result, as between one of the States and another? Ohio exceeds Missouri in population four to one; and how does this amendment propose to distribute the public lands between these two States? The share of Missouri is to the share of Ohio as more than twenty-eight to one, making the population of Missouri receive over the population of Ohio more than one hundred to one. Can Ohio stand by and see the public domain given away in this proportion? Nor is this all; for the one million of acres which Ohio gets is of lands which have been in market for more than forty years, and have been picked and culled during all that time, while the thirty millions which are given to Missouri consist of fresh and fertile lands but recently surveyed. Now let me ask, what will Virginia get? She contributes to the public burden six times as much as Missouri. Missouri is to get 35 per cent. of thirty millions. How much does Virginia get? Nothing. This is not thirty millions to one; it is thirty millions to nothing. Besides, Ohio has now passed her chrysalis condition. She has now become one of the old States of the Union. A million of acres is nothing to her. But this amendment gives her her dividend but of one million of old and refuse land, while it gives Missouri her dividend of thirty millions of new land of the very best quality.

Let us now look a little at the operation of this scheme in its details. I have here the report of the learned Committee on Public Lands, made at the last session, stating the quantity of public lands within the various States. Ohio, it appears, contains one million of acres of second, third, and fourth rate lands, while Arkansas has forty-three millions of acres.

Mr. SEVIER. Yes, and rich.

Yes, said Mr. P. Arkansas is rich; and this is one of the schemes to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer. Arkansas has forty-three times as much of the public land as Ohio; at the same time Ohio has a million and a half of inhabitants, while Arkansas has one hundred thousand. Thus, one hundred thousand people are to be benefited at the rate of forty-three millions of acres of land—rich land, as the Senator tells us—while a million and a half of people in another State are benefited at the rate of one million of refuse land. Arkansas is to get two hundred and fifteen acres to each inhabitant, and Ohio one-third of one acre! being a difference of six hundred and forty-five in favor of Arkansas. Each inhabitant of Arkansas, therefore, will get six hundred and forty-five times as much as each inhabitant of Ohio. And so of the rest. Michigan has thirty-one millions to Ohio's one million. Yet she has less than one hundred thousand inhabitants. The proportions are enormous. The original cession said that the avails of the public domain were to be shared among the States according to their several portions of the general charge and expenditure. Yet, here an inhabitant of Arkansas is to get six hundred and forty-five times as much as an inhabitant of Ohio; or, if you regard the two as States, one gets forty-three times as much as the other.

But it does not stop here. New States of the Union are selected as beneficiaries: are they, then, to be confined to the avails of the land they receive? Not at all: after receiving that, they are then to come in and be common sharers with the rest of the States. We are to give them all their own lands, and a portion in ours besides! Virginia is to get one twenty-sixth part of one-half of these lands, and Arkansas, after having got her own thirty-one millions, is to share this one twenty-sixth part with Virginia. I should really hope, if the land must be given away, it will be at some rate more reasonable than this. The entire quantity of lands remaining unsold within the States enumerated in the Senator's amendment is 154,000,000 acres: one-half of this will be 77,000,000, one-third is 50,000,000. And the bill gives these 50,000,000 to nine States, the other States to give no portion of it.

I could run out this illustration yet further: but I refrain. Ex pede, Herculeum. These are sufficient.

These are to me striking views, but they are not the considerations which weigh most heavily upon my mind, and which I should be most glad to see removed if this amendment is to be adopted, and is ever to become a law. In arguing this whole question I feel the difficulty of our situation as arguing against the wishes and expectations of those who are to receive the benefit. The nine States who are to get this magnificent donation have eighteen Senators amongst those whom I am addressing, who have, of course, a more direct interest in the adoption of the amendment than any of the rest of us. This, of itself, presents a powerful motive to secure their support to the measure: and this fact alone ought to make us pause before we hastily adopt the plan. The benefit to be granted is not common to us all, but peculiar to them—it is exclusive as to us. They are to be benefited: we are to be injured. In alluding to the strength of the motive here presented as likely to band together eighteen Senators in support of this scheme, I mean to make no personal or offensive reference to those Senators; it is a motive likely to act on all men placed in their circumstances. They desire, very naturally, and very properly, to benefit their constituents: and, under the pressure of that desire, with such an opportunity for its gratification, the understanding even of the strongest is very likely to be warped in its conclusions, and seduced to believe that the measure is perfectly just and proper. We must entreat gentlemen so situated, as I do now entreat them, to raise their views from the immediate interest of their constituents in such a cession as is now proposed, to a just administration of the sacred trust which has been confided to them for the benefit of the entire Union. Is it right—is it just—is it generous—to find their own peculiar interest in our loss and sacrifice? I throw myself upon them, that they will consider this subject in an enlarged point of view. Especially do I wish Ohio to do this, who is passing out of her state of minority and becoming of ripe age. Will Ohio consent thus to squander our common patrimony? I put it to Indiana, who is soon about to become the third State in this Union: and I ask her whether to promote a transient interest to-day, she will be willing to sacrifice the permanent and abiding interest of to-morrow? and whether she will lend herself to the delusion that it is just to deprive the old States of the inheritance they have received from our ancestors?

The amendment will produce a state of things I earnestly deprecate. In the administration of this domain something is due to our past experience. We all remember the large amount of debt which was once accumulated under the credit system of the sale of the public lands; you remember that the debtors declared that they could not pay, and would not. The very same spirit which prompts men to take the land without a legal right prompts them to stand out for the money they ought to pay for it. Circumstances made it difficult, perhaps impossible for them to pay; and I well recollect the terror with which the politicians of that day looked to the results of such a state of things. I remember with what anxiety, not to say terror, Mr. Monroe contemplated a debt of nineteen millions owed by one section of the Union. Congress looked with dismay at the mass of debt due from settlers on the Lower Mississippi; and, in contemplation of the mischievous effects arising from the credit system, in relation to the public lands, you determined to alter your terms of sale; and it was wisely decided to sell, in future, for cash alone.

But if a scattered debt, due from individuals, be an evil of so dangerous a character as to excite their terrors, how fearful will it become when this debt, instead of being dispersed among a number of individual settlers, is consolidated into one mass, and owed by a section which has already, from time to time, made claim to an indefeasible title in all this land! Can you collect it? You cannot drive your debtors from the land. Will you call out the force of the country—send your army—sell the land under them, and take possession of it for the United States? It cannot be done. To individuals, in such a case, you can afford to yield, and make a compromise; but how will you stand when you have made States your debtors? The amendment establishes the relation of debtor and creditor between this Government and entire States—with neighboring, with contiguous States—with a mass of States, all having one common interest in the question, one common character, and one common debt. Do you expect from a debtor like this to collect your debt by any process? The thought is idle. I estimate the honor and fidelity of the States as much as any man; but what have we heard for the last few years, from the other side of the Senate, but wild denunciation of State extravagance—State profligacy—and the dear, blessed people to be taxed to pay State debts? Suppose there comes a short crop, or an Indian war, or any other of the like contingencies, would it not be urged as an excuse for not paying the State debt? And would you venture, under such circumstances, to call upon them for your money? You dare not. Gentlemen have told you, in one breath, that you cannot protect your lands from the squatters either by your stipstaves or by your soldiers; and in the very next breath they say you can force whole States to comply with their contracts by the power of the Judiciary! Your army cannot remove a handful of individuals, and yet you are going to drive the States by your Judiciary! You cannot turn off a poor squatter, who has no sort of title, or evidence or pretence of title; and yet you are, by the most nugatory provisions of this bill, to oust a citizen of a State, having a deed from the State in his pocket, and the whole State power interposed between him and you! If a State shall declare that they will not pay you, do you expect that individuals of that State will? God forbid I should ever see the day when this comes to be tried, or that I should contribute to the possibility of superinducing it. You place the man between two fires. The State tells him to hold his land; the General Government orders him to give it up. He is to be hung by the State if he disobeys the State Government; and if he obeys the State, then he is to be hung by the General Government! You never can enforce your contract; the Judiciary is utterly incapable of it. The remedy which the amendment provides for the case is utterly inefficient. It is, that if the States refuse to pay, then the deeds made by the States to individuals shall be vacated. Pshaw! Why, as I have said, with no deed at all, the settlers have stood out against you, and you have been forced to yield, over and over again. Think you that, with a State deed to show, and the State authority to shield them, they are going to march off their farms at the bidding of your marshal? He would be a bold man who would carry a process there. I say, then, that there is great danger in your establishing the pecuniary relation of debtor and creditor with the States. If they cannot pay, what will you do? They will resist in masses. They have eighteen Senators on this floor; and it is already their boast that in ten years from this time they will hold the balance of power, and that they will take the land upon their own terms. The remedy proposed by the amendment is altogether fallacious. It proposes to divert a vested right, and to drive a man from lands that he has bought and paid for.

Something of the same kind was once done by Congress, (and the measure, I admit, was supported by myself, among others,) by which the States became debtors to this Government for a distribution of the surplus in the Treasury. And what has become of your debt? Who asks for it? Who dare move such a demand? Have we not, in the very face of this debt of twenty-six millions due from the States, borrowed money to supply the wants of the Government from day to day? The Secretary of the Treasury tells us of these twenty-six millions on deposit with the States, and in the same breath asks for an issue of five millions of Treasury notes! A debt from the States! The States cannot pay it; they will not pay it; and we dare not ask them for it. I would not give you a groat for your whole debt. Some difficulty will occur concerning it, and you will forgive them all. Let us not, then, take the first step—let us not make debtors of States too powerful for your management. A contest will arise, and if they are too strong for you, you will be subjected to them; and if you are too strong for them, it will be yet worse, for they must be subjected to you.

On these grounds I am opposed to the scheme of the Senator for a cession of the public lands. I trust I shall always be ready to promote the interest of the new States; but I am not willing to see such an inequality of division among them as that one man shall receive 625 acres of this domain, while another man gets but one acre. I cannot consent to establish the relation of debtor and creditor with the States, and so lose all.

There is one other objection to the measure, to which I shall barely allude. I am strongly impressed with the idea that, while the Old Dominion, in making us the cession of her territory, wisely and cautiously provided that the benefit should be ratably divided among all the States, (and therefore among the Western States with the rest,) yet the main point of view in which that cession is to be regarded is as a financial transaction. In regard to the proposition for a distribution of the proceeds, commonly known as the land bill of the distinguished gentleman to my right, (Mr. CLAY,) I occupied a peculiar position. As an independent proposition, I have been against it; but, in connection with the surplus revenue, I was for it. I was for a distribution of the surplus revenue accumulated in the Treasury, and of the proceeds of the public lands as forming a part of it. We distributed both the landed revenue and that from the customs. We have now the subject of the tariff opened again, or soon to be opened. All questions before us in regard to the lands are complicated with the financial system of the United States. If I had the control of matters, I would set down five millions as the income from the public domain, and I would then have a moving scale of duties in proportion to the wants of the Government. But this is scarcely likely to be done. The tariff, I suppose, will be fixed, and not moveable, with a view to give permanence to our great interests. That they will, to a certain extent, be permanent, no man, I think, can doubt. How the proceeds of the public lands are to be adjusted is a different question. I think they should be adjusted contemporaneously with the tariff, or else suspended till the tariff is settled.

I cannot but regard the proceeds of the sales of the public lands as a portion, and a very important portion, of the public revenue at all times, but more especially now, when there is a public debt actually existing, and a proposition before Congress to increase it. One of the peculiar purposes to which the old Congress appropriated the income of the public lands was the payment of the national debt. We have, at this moment, an acknowledged debt of near five millions. The Secretary of the Treasury demands an increase of five millions to meet pressing emergencies; and no one doubts that, in deferred payments, in existing charges, in unsettled balances, and unadjusted claims, there are five millions more outstanding. Thus, on the 4th March next, there will be a national debt of fifteen millions. This is no time to give away any portion of our income, neither to all the States nor to a portion of them—neither to twenty-six States nor to nine. If these proceeds are to be abstracted from the general Treasury, it were manifestly best that they should be disposed of to the States generally. That would be an approximation to justice and equity; but the highest justice and equity—the most honest and obvious performance of our trust—is to apply these funds to the payment of the national debt.

The proposition of the Senator from Missouri, to appropriate these proceeds to the Navy and the public expenses, is conceived in so high a spirit that it is well calculated to enlist our sympathies and captivate the imagination. I heartily concur with him in his estimate of the propriety of doing something for the Navy. That important branch of the public service has been too much neglected. It merits, at all times, the highest consideration. Its actual condition exacts our most anxious attention. Its glory and its usefulness cannot be too highly estimated, and I fear it has fallen into great dilapidation. It might be invidious to inquire how this disastrous condition has been superinduced, but it is due to our most precious recollections—to our highest interests—to all that pride and patriotism can enforce—that it continue no longer. That Administration which shall build up the Navy, reinvigorate its energies, and revive and stimulate its wonted spirit, will deserve the eternal gratitude of the country. As far as the public purse can contribute to this, I would not circumscribe our appropriations to any special fund. If there be any one thing amongst us which may be called national, it is the Navy. I would not limit it to any sum, however ample. Its only limitation should be, the capacity of our commercial marine to man it, and up to that full extent I would enable it to be present with our commerce in the four quarters of the world, equipped and inspired to protect it and our honor against all opponents.

THURSDAY, January 16, 1841.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up, the question being on the proposition by Mr. CRITTENDEN to recommend the bill, with instructions to report a bill to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, which Mr. CALHOUN offered to amend, by substituting a bill to cede the public lands to the States in which they lie, upon certain conditions.

Mr. SEVIER said he knew of no political question, except it were a question involving national or State honor, or a question of war with a foreign power, in which his constituents felt an interest so deep and universal, as they do in a just, speedy, and final disposition of the public lands.

In the adjustment of this great question, they desire what is just and liberal, and nothing more; and they will never be satisfied, as they ought not to be, with any settlement of it which falls short of ample justice and great liberality. Senators from the old States have had the power, and yet have the power, to vote down every reasonable proposition upon this subject, as they have frequently done from time to time for the last half century. But, thank God, selfishness, and avarice, and injustice, like all things else on earth, have a termination! Human extortion and annoyance, either individually or by States, in the wise dispensations of a merciful Providence, cannot last forever! What influences a sense of justice, in conflict with pecuniary interest, or a knowledge of what the future will inevitably bring to pass, may now have upon the minds of Senators representing the old States, will be determined by their votes upon the proposition now before the Senate. Ten years hence, after the next census, should a settlement of this question be so long deferred, and should we at that time have no traitors in our garrison to betray us, it will be a matter of slight concern with us, further than to have, what would be at all times desirable, the friendship, good will, and co-operation of our brethren, whether the Senators from the old States are willing to settle the land question or not. We shall then have the power, and we shall then exercise it, too, of disposing of this great question to suit ourselves. And when that settlement takes place, we shall hear no more of this Government peddling in town sites and town lots; no more of the relationship of federal landlord and tenant, in lead mines, salt springs, and Indian reservations; no more of penal statutes prohibiting emigration and settlement upon the public lands; no more of suits of trespass or ejectment; nor of our illustrious army, crusading under your orders, not against the enemies of the country, but against our own flesh and blood; and acquiring distinction, not on the battle field, but by burning down the dwellings, cutting down the crops, and driving into the woods to starve, or perish by exposure, unarmed, inoffensive and harmless citizens of the United States, with their helpless families! We shall then hear no more of these enormities, nor of the thousand other vexations which the frontier settler has had to bear, without remedy or redress—without daring to complain, lest he should be denounced as unmannerly, impudent, impertinent, a bandit or robber. We shall then have the power, and shall find, when that blessed day shall arrive, in politics as in war, that a bomb shell or cannon ball flung into the camp of the weaker party, will have the usual happy effect of hastening negotiations, and of settling rapidly, and to every body's most perfect satisfaction, knotty points of dispute between us of long standing. You, sir, have read the history of the last days of Napoleon. Had he been satisfied, in his first reverses, with the empire and with France, an heir of his, in all probability, this day would be seated on the throne of the French. He wanted more; he wanted provinces; and vassals and income, and in striving to retain them, lost all. Profit, sir, by the lessons of history; for men and things are the same in every age and circle of the globe. Will you, sir, profit by these reflections? Will Senators from the old States profit by these reflections, and come to a fair adjustment of this great interest, in a spirit of brotherly love and generous magnanimity, of which we hear so much and see so little? If so, I, for one, will promise them a pardon for the past, and love and confidence for the future. But, sir, I feel no such consolation. I feel that the sordid considerations of money, money which they collect from others than their own constituents, will be found too powerful with them for any patriotic sacrifices which would give quiet, peace and harmony to every member of the Confederacy. They now have the power to prevent our emancipation, and they now calculate that their strength will increase in an equal ratio with ours. They calculate as the West, the Northwest, and South give new States to the Union, that new States will become old in interest, and join them as allies in plundering the balance. Already they consider Ohio and Indiana as belonging to them. And hence we find, with the exceptions of my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] of my friends from New Hampshire, and a few other generous, lofty spirited Democrats from the old States, who have stood by us heretofore, and who stand by us now, the old, inveterate and uncompromising opposition to every land measure desired by the new States. And what are these measures, and why are they opposed? There are three of them now before us. The first, the pre-emption bill; the second, the distribution bill; and the third, the cession bill.

The pre-emption bill proposes to authorize any citizen of the United States to give one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre, for one hundred and sixty acres of land, provided he will improve and cultivate it. The friends of this bill support it with a view of protecting the labor of the poor man against wealthy land speculators. They allege, and prove it by official documents, that land sold at auction, and without a pre-emption right, yields to the Government but two or three cents an acre more than the pre-emptor pays; and as the loss to the Government is so trifling, and as protection to the settler is so important to him, as well as to the State in which he resides, they urge the passage of this bill. During the last forty years, we are told, and truly, that several pre-emption laws have passed, but all of them retrospective, and applicable only to settlers on the public land, at the time, or prior to the passage of those acts. And such bills of late years have been opposed, on the ground, among other reasons, of their unconstitutionality; because it was said to be a law lacking uniformity; because it granted privileges only to certain citizens of particular States, and not to all the citizens of all the States. To obviate this objection, and at the same time to save the trouble of constant applications for the passage of such laws; and to save the time and expense of Congress in passing such laws; and lastly to obviate the constitutional scruples of very conscientious gentlemen, the friends of the measure have proposed this bill, which is of a prospective character, extending to the citizens of all the States the same rights and privileges that former pre-emption laws conferred to certain citizens of particular States. With the single exception of its prospective feature, it is precisely the same bill which has been passed frequently, at different times, for the last thirty or forty years.

This is the pre-emption bill, sir. I have given you, in a few words, its length, and depth, and breadth, and a few of the reasons which influence its friends to support it. Its passage is opposed by gentlemen for sundry reasons, some of which are avowed, and some of them concealed; and by all of its opponents it is opposed for the same reasons, whether avowed or concealed.

One of the main reasons, though not avowed, for opposing the pre-emption bill, is to prevent the emigration to, and the settlement and improvement of the new States. The wealthy of the old States desire to retain their poor citizens among them for what they call operatives, (that, I think, is their polite term for the class I allude to,) for the purpose of working on their farms and in their shops and factories; and by so doing to keep down the price of labour by increasing the demand for employment. They oppose it because they imagine that such a bill is calculated to keep down the price of land in the new States, and in that reduction they imagine emigration will be successfully encouraged; that the poor will then become elevated in condition; that laborers will become scarce among them; that the price of labor will increase, and that by such a process the value of their real estate will be affected and diminished. This wealthy class have now, as they ever have had, their representatives in this chamber.

The politicians of the old States (always excepting my Democratic friends I have before alluded to,) oppose this bill because they are jealous of the rapid growth of the new States, and fear a loss of political power and consequence; and therefore, considering this bill, as they do, as a temptation to emigration, and as leading to a loss of political power, they oppose it. To keep these people on their muster roll, that they may be counted in the census, they would sooner see them in poverty, rags, and misery in their country, than rich, happy, and prosperous in ours. Their reasons for opposing this bill are well understood in the new States, and thank God, properly appreciated. This is not all. The old States want the land in the new to bring the highest possible price, that they may have annually more money packed over the mountains, to be spent among them on their wharves, light houses, buoys, and breakwaters, and the Lord knows what; not satisfied in placing on our shoulders a protective tariff on the necessities of life for their benefit, we must also be saddled with a high land tariff, a sort of English corn law, that they may thrive and fatten at our expense; and, most generous souls! when they were kind enough to modify the tariff in 1832, to save the Union, a reduction, at that time, of the land revenue, never entered into their imaginations, no, never. These, Mr. President, are some of the concealed reasons for opposing the pre-emption bill. I will now consider a few of those which have been avowed.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] objects to the passage of this bill, because, he says, pre-emptors are an unworthy class, a lawless banditti! His idea of the settlers upon the public lands in the new States, is that they are a sort of North Carolina blue beards, who are ragged, dirty, brawling, browbeating monsters, six feet high, whose vocation is robbing, drinking, fighting, and terrifying every peaceable man in the community.

Mr. MANGUM here rose to explain, and said he referred to aliens.

Mr. SEVIER said he had not so understood the Senator, but no matter, they are all God's creatures, and a portion of them are his constituents. This is the idea he has of them; but now, sir, no description on earth is further from the truth than the one he has given of them. On the contrary, sir, the settlers upon the public lands, constitute the best part of the population of all the new States; and that is saying a good deal for them. It is saying that they constitute the best portion of the population of the United States; and that is saying a good deal for them. Sir, I never was in Europe, and never intend to be, and therefore am unable to contrast the settlers upon the public lands, with the better part of the population of the old world. But, sir, I have been in North Carolina. I was born and lived in sight of Buncomb; from the door of the house of my nativity, though in a different State, I could look out and see the high blue mountains of that celebrated country. I knew, in the early years of my life, many of its inhabitants. I have since been in Wilmington, the seaport city of that State, and have travelled through the turpentine region, which I understand is the best part of the State; I have met with her citizens at home and abroad, and must willingly bear testimony to their worth and virtues. And yet, sir, I assure the Senator that I should not blush, or dread a comparison of my constituents upon the public lands, with the best his State offers, by any standard of virtue, intelligence or worth, which he or others could suggest. I have heard a great deal said about the settlers upon the public lands. This is not all. I have seen written descriptions of the emigrants to the new States, and only the other day I met with a description of them, which will, I dare say, whether he considers it poetry or prose, afford him some amusement, if not instruction. The extract is taken from Hall's Magazine. He says:

"First in order, as he is always first when speculation is concerned, comes the hardy, enterprising New Englander. Of all the emigrants to the West, Brother Jonathan alone knows where he is going to—the cheapest mode of travel, and what he is going to do when he gets there; he alone has read the pre-emption laws, and knows what sum he must take with him, or notions in the way of trade, to secure a home in the wilderness. Already, before he gets there, he converses fluently about ranges, townships, and sections, has ascertained the number of acres in each subdivision, the amount reserved for schools, and is ready on his arrival to avail himself of his new position."

"Behind the rest, some distance in the rear, comes the lone some looking couple from old North Carolina. They had evidently, from their appearance, ventured their all, such as it was, upon the enterprise. An old one horse tumble, with two high creaking wheels, and an old store box for a body—drawn by a lean pony of the preceding generation, constituted their mode of conveyance. A bed, a spinning wheel, a pair of cards, a bag of dye stuff, and a few hanks of coopers colored cotton, with six sickly looking children, made up their stock in trade. As they moved slowly along, the man walking before, and the wife behind, the tumble, their lean pony occasionally stopping to crop the tall grass which stood by the way, it was evident to all who saw them, that they had long since arrived at that term of life which the magistrate alluded to, who married them, when he said "better for worse."

Well, now, sir, if the Senator is ashamed of his o'd neighbors and friends, who probably have stood by him in many a hard fought political battle, I assure the Senator that I am not. They are a good sort of people, and I wish we had more of them among us. I had expected the Senator would back these friends of his, and do something for them, give them at least a pre-emption, if not a donation of land, to support the wife and the poor little sickly creatures, as well as the lean but faithful pony. But it seems that I have mistaken the man, and I am sorry for it.

The Senator objects to this bill for another reason. He says that this bill allows more than one pre-emption. Well, suppose it did. Suppose it allowed the settler to pay for every place he found vacant and unimproved, on which he should build a habitation and cultivate; is there any very great outrage in that? If a poor man settles upon, improves, and pays for one tract of land, and he should afterwards sell it, what harm is there in letting him settle and improve and pay for another quarter section of land? I can well imagine, it might be to his advantage to pursue such a course—I can well imagine, there might be cases where it might require, as in the case of the emigrant from North Carolina, I have already referred to, some two or three removals, before he would find himself in a condition to stick comfortably. Such an indulgence is calculated to encourage industry and enterprise, and to improve both the state and condition of the settler; and, at the same time, to get rid, for a valuable consideration, of that most odious of all monopolies, a monopoly of the public land, by the great non tax.

paying power, the General Government. I think such indulgence right and proper. But the Senate think otherwise, and have already obviated the Senator's objection. He is violently opposed to any such indulgence. He says, one of our Western hunters can travel without difficulty, the whole of our frontier, from the St. Peters to the Kiamichie or Red river, and be able to select, and to squat upon, and locate, the very best tract of land on the whole route! What unparalleled monstrosity! He would not only not permit such a fellow, with his flap and leggins on, to have a tract of land, even if he could sell bear meat and peltries enough to pay for it. No; not he. He would not even permit him to camp upon the public lands for a single night, lest such abomination would pollute even the soil upon which he slept. He would remove him forthwith from the public lands. Not however with the militia! Oh, no, sir. Mr. Poinsett, you know, Mr. President, gave us some trouble about the militia bill, of which, perhaps, the honorable Senator has heard something—and the Senator is rather too smart to be caught tinkering with men in uniform. He would send a constable to remove him with his warrant and staff of office! Would his constable succeed? Oh, yes! quite likely—quite likely, sir. Friendly persuasion often effects what force would fail to accomplish, and it has been said, that a poor man, in any extremities, when forsaken by the world, can safely count upon two friends, two inseparable companions, that will never desert him: his dog is one, and the constable is the other.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HUNTINGTON] also objects to the passage of this bill. He cannot bear the idea of a poor man having the privilege of entering by pre-emption, a hundred and sixty acres of rich land. Because, the brute may have the audacity to select a spot of land where there may be water privileges!—water privileges! Why, sir, he loses the equanimity of his temper at the thought that a poor devil make stake his thirst by drinking from a spring of pure water, or of having a tub-mill to grind meal for his family. Water privileges! I have heard of this objection before, but never heard of it without feeling as though I had swallowed a dose of tartar emetic or ipecacuanha. All the Senators who oppose this bill, represent it as a revival of the credit system. Yes, sir, credit system! and upon that hypothesis, they have favored us with some learned discourses upon the evils of the credit system. Sir, when I heard these eloquent harangues, coming from a certain quarter of this chamber, I felt something like the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] did, on his return from Richmond, a year or so ago; when he wished to express his surprise at something he heard in this chamber, he exclaimed, "Where am I, Mr. President? Am I in the Senate chamber, or no? Do I see you, Mr. President, or not? Is that the chandelier I see there, or not? Is that the picture of the father of his country which I see suspended over you, or not?" He could not have been more surprised on that occasion, than I have been at the philippics and tirades of certain honorable Senators against the credit system—some of them the advocates of the reception, for dues to the Government, of the paper of broken, suspended, and non-pecie-paying banks—and all of them the advocates of depositing the revenues of the General Government with the States! The credit system, indeed! Sir, all their fears are without foundation. We propose to sell no land by this bill, or any other, upon credit. We do not propose to part from our land without the cash. It is true, we propose to delay the sales of the lands, to which there are pre-emption claims, for twelve months, except it should be thought advisable to sell the land at an earlier day; and of that matter, the President of the United States is the sole judge; and whenever it is sold, the cash must come. It is merely a question between March and May, and June and September. The pre-emption bill may hasten, but, in no event, can it retard the sales; and whenever it is sold, to-day, to-morrow, six or twelve months hence, the money must be paid down or the claim is forfeited, and is subject to be sold to any one who will buy it.

Another objection to the passage of the bill is that settlers upon the unsurveyed lands are placed upon an equal footing with those residing upon the surveyed lands. These settlers have always been upon an equality, and they ought to be upon an equality. If the lands are not surveyed, it is our fault, and no fault of theirs; and if you are determined to cripple our States in this manner, you have only to refuse, as you have the power to do, to pass the appropriations to carry on the public surveys, and you accomplish your purpose. You survey when and where you please, and are not more in the habit of consulting the wishes of the settlers upon this than upon any other question—that is to say, sir, they are never consulted by you upon any subject.

Sir, I do not desire to be tedious, and must now pass on to the other bills under consideration, which are offered as substitutes for the original bill. The next bill in order is the distribution bill. Well, sir, I am not going to discuss this bill at this time, if I ever do. I made a speech against such a proposition twelve months ago, and am not disposed to repeat now what I said on that occasion; and especially as I have been anticipated by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON]. He, sir, for this session at least, has given this bill its death blow—it has fallen dead under his Herculean blows—he has demolished it, killed it, murdered it; and I have no disposition to take up the time of the Senate in mangling the carcass of the deceased.

I was glad, however, to find, from the course of his remarks, that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] intended to vote against the distribution bill, because he considered it inexpedient and unconstitutional. There is some consolation in this, sir; for at a future day we may need his services in resisting the passage of this identical bill.

The next bill which is proposed as a substitute, is the cession bill. This bill proposes to cede the public lands to the States in which they lie, on certain conditions. Taking the cession, as qualified by the conditions, and it amounts to little more, if any thing, than a transfer of the management from the National to the State Governments. The lands are now managed by the General Government, and at its sole expense; and if this bill passes, the lands hereafter will be managed by the States respectively in which the lands lie, and at their exclusive expense. And as an indemnity to those States for their trouble and expense in managing this great interest, and as a consideration for the surrender of the five per cent. on the sales of land in their limits, hereafter accruing, to which they are entitled by the terms of their admission into the Union, the bill proposes to give to the States thirty-five per cent. of the gross proceeds of the sales of the land. This is the bill—a bill which has been most falsely characterized as a bill to give away the public lands. It is my favorite bill, because it embraces the cession clause, by which we get the heavy, crushing, Federal foot from off our necks, and because it puts it beyond the power of a future Congress to raise the price of the public lands, as a future Congress will do, if the growing avarice of the old States should continue to increase, and they should have the power to accomplish it.

It is my favorite bill for other reasons. It embraces the pre-emption and graduation clauses: of the former of these propositions I have already spoken; and of the latter, I have but a word or so to say, as the subject of graduation is familiar to every Senator; and what I purpose saying, is elicited by a remark made the other day by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM]. He opposes the graduation principle, because, in the course of time, the refuse lands may bring a dollar and a quarter an acre, and therefore, he is unwilling for the Government to make such a sacrifice. He states, as a justification for his argument, what is doubtless correct, that in 1836, the public lands had brought a great deal more than what they had been estimated at in 1828. No doubt of it, and what was it that did not bring a great deal more in 1836 than it did in 1828? Will the Senator select that year as the proper time to test the value of land, or any thing else, in either old or new States? Does he not know that the inflated prices of land, and every thing else in 1836, broke the banks, merchants, and traders, and the United States, if not the world? Most certainly. I should select any other than 1836 as the proper time to estimate the true value of any thing. Where is the old State that has refuse lands to dispose of, that holds them up to any thing like the prices to which you hold up the refuse lands in the new States? No where, sir. No Legislature of any State in this Union would dare pursue such a policy; nor would any Senator here, with all his feigned independence, dare to pursue such a policy, were they but within the reach of the citizens of the new States. They pursue towards the new States, who are not their immediate constituents, a course of policy they dare not adopt in regard to their own States. What a commentary upon that good old rule of "going as you would be done by."

My friend from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] has shown conclusively, I think, that the intrinsic value of land, or any thing else, is six per cent. upon the sum it yields annually. He has thrown over this subject such a blaze of light, as to carry conviction, I think, to every unprejudiced heart. He has shown, by an unanswerable argument, that it is better for the Government to receive speedily a moderate price for their property, than to hold on to it for a great series of years, with the view of getting an enhanced price for it; and yet, with these convictions, without even the flimsy apology of subserving the financial interest of the United States, we find Senators moving heaven and earth to keep quantities of the inferior lands out of market, by holding up the price beyond their value. Why is it, then, that such a course is pursued? The answer is obvious. It is to prevent the settlement and improvement of the new States, and to prevent them from raising a revenue by taxation upon their lands. Sir, if the United States, the great land monopolist, like every honest land holder in the State, were to pay the State taxes upon their lands, we should have far less grounds of complaint. The Government pays no taxes, nor will she suffer the lands to be sold at a fair price, that somebody may be induced to purchase them, by which the States in which they lie may, by taxing them, receive a small revenue to support the State Governments.

The friends of this bill anticipate many beneficial results from its passage. The reasons which influenced the committee in reporting this bill, and the reasons which influenced the author of it to offer it to our consideration, have been presented to the Senate. I shall not repeat or dwell upon them. The views of the committee, and of the author of the bill, are met and opposed by the adversaries of the measure!

They oppose the bill, in the first place, with an exaggeration of the quantity of land subject to its provisions. The true quantity, (if there be any truth in our official documents,) in all of the new States, which is subject to the provisions of the cession bill, is one hundred and fifty-four millions of acres. Some of the opponents of this bill represent the quantity, I think, to be ten hundred millions of acres! Now, sir, I care but little what the quantity may be; our arguments apply to the principle, and not to the number of acres. I should not, therefore, notice this bombast at all, but that I wish to disabuse the public mind as to the extent of our possessions.

Where do we find these immense possessions, amounting, in acres, to numbers which I have not mathematical skill to compute? I have no objections to go on a trip of pleasure with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] to the peaks of the Rocky Mountains, on whose elevation he perched himself, to be able to begin to form some idea of our countless acres. Where are they? Are they there? Do we not all know that all the country west of Arkansas and Missouri, and south of the Missouri river, and east of the Rocky Mountains, is held in fee by a patent from the President, by the Indian tribes; and by treaty, with Mexico or Texas? Do we not all know that the angle of country formed by the Missouri river, Iowa, and the Canada line, is either held in like manner by Indian tribes, or else is totally uninhabitable? Do we not also know that all the country west of the Rocky Mountains is held by Indians, and is claimed, though unjustly, by a foreign power, and that we have not to this day had nerve enough to wrest it from him? We all know these things, and yet, they would have us and the world believe we have as many acres of land as there are grains of sand alone the sea shore.

The adversaries of this bill also exaggerate the benefits it proposes to confer on the States. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] states, that my State (yes, sir, he has done her the honor to select her for his illustration,) will, by the provisions of the cession bill, receive forty millions of acres of land! Has the Senator ever read the bill? I doubt it; for if he had, I am satisfied he would never make such a statement in the face of the Senate. I have already shown that in consideration of the surrender of her five per cent. to which she is now entitled, and for the trouble and expense of managing and selling the public lands, that the bill proposes to give her thirty-five per cent. and no more, and not the whole of it, as the Senator argues. The Senator also misstates the quantity of public land in that State. It is a little over hirty instead of forty millions. This thirty-five per cent. it will also be observed, she is to receive gradually throughout the period of eighty years—and from sales of land in her own limits to her own citizens—but, when she defrays the annual expenses of managing and settling this land, by paying surveyors and land officers and all that, and when she has had deducted her five per cent. which she now receives, and which she is entitled to receive in virtue of her compact of admission into the Union, without expense, she will have remaining out of her thirty-five cent upon the gross proceeds of the sales, which the bill proposes to give her a trifling sum, not worth a week's debate in the Senate, so far as money is concerned. Sir, I think if this bill be liable to objection, so far as money considerations are involved, the bill gives her too little instead of too much. But I am willing, as one of her representatives, to receive it, in order to get this land question finally disposed of.

The Senator also opposes this bill because it violates the terms of the compact with Virginia and Connecticut. He tells us these States ceded their lands to the United States to be "disposed of" for the common benefit. I have read the Virginia compact the Senator refers to, but not lately. As his objection seems to be founded on the words "disposed of" as being incompatible with the word "cede," as used in the bill, I hope the author of the bill will accommodate the gentleman, as I think he can do with propriety, by substituting in the bill the words "disposed of" for the word "cede." Either term I fancy will be acceptable to the friends of the measure. The Senator tells us that the leading and only objects of those two States, in making the cession, was money. Well, sir, Connecticut at least, has long since received, for what was at best a doubtful claim, an ample consideration for all she ceded. The objects of these grants being money, as we are now informed, he argues, that these lands cannot properly be disposed of for the common benefit, for any thing else. This construction I consider rather too restricted. Congress, I apprehend, can dispose of these lands for other things than money, provided it be for the common benefit. Congress certainly have often exercised such a disposition of them, and probably will do it again. There is no stipulation in the compact, that I am aware of, requiring those lands to be sold at a certain price per acre, nor any stipulation, prohibiting Congress from selling those lands at a price less than one dollar and a quarter an acre. They have full power over the subject, and can sell on what terms they choose, and either to individuals or to States. I know of nothing to the contrary. But whatever force there may be in the Senator's objections, they do not apply to this bill, because it goes on the ground that the lands shall be sold for cash, and upon the further ground that the money accruing under its provisions shall be paid in the public Treasury for the common benefit.

The Senator objects, further, to this bill, because it establishes, as he alleges, the relationship of debtor and creditor between the national and State Governments. I am against any such relationship; and if there be any such obscurity in the bill on this point, I hope the author of it will modify it, by making it the duty of every purchaser of land to deposit the sixty-five per cent. the portion of the purchase money coming to the United States, with the proper person, to the credit of the United States. I do not desire, notwithstanding my confidence in the integrity of the States, for a dollar of Federal money to be placed, even temporarily, in the treasuries of the States. Let the bill be so modified, if it requires such modification, and then, sir, all the evils the Senator has so eloquently painted, resulting from such a connection, will be avoided—and here is an end to that chapter.

The next objection to this bill is, that it is changing our most admirable land system—and that is monstrous! Will you change a system, they ask, which has operated so happily for forty years? Behold Ohio and Indiana! See what magnificent communities have grown up under our most admirable land system! Yes, sir, Ohio and Indiana have grown up with surprising rapidity, and so has Russia under the edicts of her absolute Emperors, and that, too, without the magical benefits of our admirable land system! Has our land system produced the growth of either Ohio or Indiana? No, sir; far from it. They would be better off, if you had neither lands or land systems in the limits of either. And have we not changed our land system frequently? We have changed it, in reducing the quantity of land authorized to be sold. We have changed it from a credit to a cash system. We have changed it, by reducing the price from two dollars to a dollar and a quarter an acre. The distribution bill, which those gentleman advocate, is a proposition to change the land system. And have any of these changes checked the growth of Ohio or Indiana? No sir. They have gone steadily onward—and would have done so, if they had never heard of any of your land systems. Other States, old States, all things considered, have grown up as rapidly as Ohio and Indiana, where your land system never had a location or an existence. We should act with childish superstition to refuse to make any alterations in our system, which experience, or the wants of the community, or the condition of things, might point out or suggest. And pray, sir, how long since is it that those gentlemen manifested such a horror at change? Change, change, I had thought, was their war cry. I had thought every thing was to be changed from head to foot! I had thought every thing was to be changed, that commerce was to be revived, that money was to be good and plenty, that poverty and hard times were no longer to be found in the land, and, in short, that we were to have a glorious summer of unbroken prosperity! And do these great reformers, that were to change every thing, expect, now that they have expelled the incumbents from office, and are about to seat themselves snugly in their places, to forget their pledges, and sit quietly down at their ease? If they dream of such comfort and composure, they will find themselves sadly mistaken. They must let off their thirty-pounders, if they have any; they must bring forward, and carry it too, some great and striking measure, as they have promised, or they will be laughed into scorn, ridicule, and contempt! If they fail in all this, their days are numbered. If such logic as this could have deterred our bold and iron nerved ancestors, (and it was preached by a celebrated party of that day,) from changing the whole Government, we should now, sir, be the humble subjects of her Majesty, and not the independent representatives of twenty-six States and eighteen millions of free-men. I hope some of us, at least, have inherited a portion of the inquisitive virtues of our fathers, and have courage enough to look things in the face as they are, and not be frightened to death by sounds and empty shadows. I admit that every change is not an improvement, and fear that the late change of our President is of this character.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] tells us that all these land projects are traps to catch votes; and he appeals to the result of the late election as an evidence to show that they had failed in their object. In the North, generally, I doubt if any candidate would obtain their suffrages who was not considered friendly to a protective tariff. In the South, notwithstanding the result of the late election, I doubt if any candidate could obtain their suffrages who was known to be in favor of emancipating their slaves; and I believe, in the new States, that no candidate could obtain their suffrages who was known to be against graduation of the price of the public lands and pre-emption rights, or other land measures or substitutes which would confer equal benefits upon that section of the country. And how was it in the case of the late election in that quarter? Was not every stump worn smooth by Whig orators in trying to convince the people that Gen. Harrison was the real friend of the West? Did they not show, from a history of his public life, that he had always voted for both pre-emption and graduation bills? Did they not also show that his competitor had, so late as 1828, voted against these measures? Did they not tell us that Mr. Van Buren's professions of friendship for those measures, as contained in his messages, were hypocritical, and that they were of too modern origin for evidence, and that they ought not to be relied upon? I can appeal, I think, with safety to every Western Senator as a witness to the truth of this statement. Sir, Gen. Harrison obtained the votes in the West for other reasons doubtless, but mainly because he was friendly to these measures. And popular in that quarter as he has proved himself to be, he never would have gotten their votes if his hostility to those measures had been even suspected.

Mr. President, I have dwelt longer than I had intended upon this great question, and have, before I conclude, but a single remark to make, and that is, that public sentiment in the new States requires a change in the disposition of the public lands, and, sooner or later, public sentiment in that quarter will have it done. On this subject there is a collected moral force which cannot and will not be successfully resisted. And is it not your duty to respect this public opinion? Is it not our duty to promote the peace and happiness, whether it be disturbed by real or imaginary causes, of every member of our Union? And, in accomplishing so high and so noble a purpose, does it become us to stand out upon mere trifles? What are a few dollars, more or less, to the National Treasury, in comparison to such high and absorbing considerations? And after all, is it not our duty, as far as in us lies, to make every citizen of every State a freeholder, an independent and happy man? What spectacle is there so pleasing to a virtuous and feeling heart!

January 14 and 15, 1841.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up, the question being on the proposition of Mr. CRITTENDEN to recommend the bill, with instructions to report a bill to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, which Mr. CALHOUN offered to amend, by substituting a bill to cede the public lands to the States in which they lie, upon certain conditions.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said: While the original bill granting pre-emptions to actual settlers was the only question before the Senate, I felt no desire to say a word upon it; but since the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, and the amendment to that proposition submitted by the Senator from South Carolina, have fairly brought before the Senate for discussion the whole subject of the public lands, I have come to the conclusion that it might be expected of me to take some part in the debate. And, sir, permit me to say that I enter upon this discussion with the more pleasure, because I have not the least idea that the question will be settled at this session, now half expired, and because I feel not only willing but anxious that my sentiments should be fully known by the people of my State before the next session of Congress, during which I hope to see the whole subject amicably and finally arranged: for, sir, if I know myself, I desire to represent, on this occasion, and upon all other subjects, both the interest and wishes of my State, and to those wishes and that interest I will at all times, on all questions of expediency, conform my own action here, as her representative, with great pleasure. I have said that I consider the bill and the proposed amendments as bringing the whole subject before the Senate; for, sir, I cannot agree with the Senator from Missouri that they are incongruous. I consider them entirely germane, and legitimately connected, both for argument and legislation. The whole subject may well be arranged in a single bill; and as the bases of such a bill must include the principles of one or both of the proposed amendments, it is entirely proper that they should be discussed with the original proposition.

Previous to the views which I intend to submit upon this subject, the Senate will pardon me if I notice the closing remarks of the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEVIER,] who has just taken his seat. That Senator, taking, as he generally does, a clear, common sense view of the relation between cause and effect, has just told us that the incoming party must do something to meet the expectations of the people; that it must bring up and support new measures; that it must not sit down in the seats of the outgoing party and fold its arms; that the people have been led to believe that new measures were to be adopted; that the doctrines of the outgoing party were to depart with them in their retirement; that the measures under which the Government has been administered were hostile to the interest of the people; and, says the Senator, if there shall be no change, the days of the incoming or Harrison party are numbered—it will go out at the end of four years by a larger majority than it came in. I entirely concur with the Senator in his position, and thank him for the honesty and candor of the admission he has made; he has honestly and conclusively solved the mystery which surrounded the recent result of the political campaign in the minds of some Senators, and especially in that of the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] who declared, a few days ago, that the result was a mystery he could not understand. The Senator from Arkansas perfectly understands it, and I concur with him that, if the incoming party pursuers the same line of general policy that was the ruling policy of Mr. Van Buren, its days will be numbered; its days ought to be numbered. The people have condemned that policy; they have willed that those who support it shall no longer fill the highest offices within their gift; they have willed that a different policy shall prevail; they have selected their agents for the purpose of carrying out a different policy; those agents stand pledged to do so, and it would be a direct violation of faith to the people to refuse to conform to their will. It would be such a breach of faith as ought to number the days of those who should presume upon such a dangerous experiment. I trust, however, that there is no cause for alarm from any quarter on this subject. I merely notice the remark of the Senator to say that I heartily concur with him, and, so far as I am concerned, the charge shall have no application.

Another remark of the Senator I must briefly notice, in which I am not so fortunate as to concur. I understood the Senator to say that the Senators from the old States had uniformly voted down every proposition from the new States in which they felt any interest.

[Here Mr. SEVIER rose and said he had made several exceptions.]

So I understood the Senator, but I do not feel disposed to let the remark pass, even with the exceptions, as I do not think it does justice to the Senators from the old States, as they are called. How many Senators compose this body, sir? The answer is fifty-two; of that number only eighteen are from the new States, so called. Well, sir, does not the Senator consider both the pre-emption and graduation bills Western measures? And how could the new States, with their eighteen members, have passed any bill on either of those subjects without the votes of Senators from the old States? And still these bills have again and again passed the Senate with the votes of Senators from the old and new States. And, sir, I cannot let the occasion pass without doing to Senators from the old States justice, so far as my State is concerned. I have frequently, since I have been a member of this body, felt the kind aid and support of many of the Senators from the old States on subjects of vital importance and deeply interesting to my State, when a most settled opposition had come from Senators from the Southwestern States, designated as new States. It affords me great pleasure to except from this remark the Senator from Arkansas. So, sir, as one of the representatives of one of the new States, I claim no participation in the application of the remarks of that Senator.

The Senator from Arkansas also intimated that the new States would soon be strong enough to make their own laws on this subject without the aid of the other States of this Union. This he thinks may take place by the year eighteen hundred and fifty. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] also predicated a portion of his remarks upon the same hypothesis. Here again I am compelled to dissent in toto from the positions assumed by those Senators. It seems that the Senators overlook a most important fact in order to arrive at their conclusions; that is, that the States are becoming old faster than new; or, in other words, that the old States are increasing faster than the new ones. I use the words "old" and "new" in their confined acceptation. If the Senators consider all new States that have been, and that may be, admitted into the Union since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, they are right; but that is not the use they desire to make of the term; they refer to States having a border interest in common, growing out of their frontier situation, and the quantity of public lands within their limits. In this sense, does it not strike those Senators that the danger is the other way? that the old States must increase in proportion? and that the power to control legislation on this subject must ultimately, unless settled soon, lie with them? It looks so to me, and I have heard no argument to shake this view of the case. How stands the case with Ohio? How with Indiana? ay, Indiana, that but a few years ago was upon the extreme frontier. The former no longer claims to be a new State; and the latter, so far as the land question is concerned, can scarcely be said to belong to that class of States. Others are following rapidly; and in a few years more all the present great States in the valley of the Mississippi will be in the very centre of the Union of States, and not even the Western of the old States, in the sense I am discussing the subject. Is it, then, wise in the Senators from the extreme frontier of the States called the new States, to raise any question founded upon local considerations exclusively, on this great land question? I submit these remarks in a spirit of kindness; for these Senators, one and all, know that I have ever stood by them when the interest of their States was in question. But, sir, I must be pardoned for saying that I never hear these local and discriminating questions agitated here or elsewhere, when they can possibly be avoided, without a deep sense of the impropriety of the course. Let us remember that we are brethren of the same family, embarked in the same vessel, bound to the same port. Let us never forget our motto, "United we stand, divided we fall." We must have confidence in each other. Deriving our existence from the same race, united together by the same patriotic love of country, acknowledging the same Supreme Being, and cherishing the same free constitutional form of government, should we not have full confidence in each other, and should we not avoid every thing calculated to excite angry feelings or engender sectional hostilities? It may not become me to lecture older Senators on this subject, but I shall rest my defence on the importance of the position, and the impression it has made on my mind. I will digress no further, but take up the subject under consideration, as I had originally intended before I was decoyed from the path by the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas, which I have thought proper to notice.

While we differ upon many points connected with the land question, we all concur in the magnitude of the subject, and its great importance. There is another point in which there is a general concurrence, so far as I have as yet heard an opinion expressed, and that is, the propriety, nay, more, the necessity, of settling the whole matter so soon as it can be done satisfactorily to all. Upon the magnitude of the subject and its consequent connection with the legislation of Congress, and the diversified interests of the States in all their varieties, the Senator from South Carolina commented at large; and, as I do not design travelling over the same ground that other Senators have occupied, where I concur with them, I shall content myself by reading an extract from the report of the Committee on Public Lands, to which the bill of the Senator from South Carolina had been committed. This extract will show the quantity of the public lands over which our legislation extends. And I read it to the Senate that it may be fresh in the recollection of Senators when I allude to it in my subsequent remarks. The report says:

"It appears from the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office (see Doc. 46, 31 Sess. 26th Cong.) that the whole quantity in acres of the public domain on the 30th September, 1833, to which the Indian title was not extinguished, amounted to seven hundred and sixty-six millions of round numbers. There were at the same time, as appears by the same report, in the State and Territories three hundred and nineteen millions of acres to which the Indian title was extinguished; making the whole public domain in the aggregate that time to be ten hundred and eighty-five millions of acres. By table marked A, herewith annexed, it appears that, on the first of January last, there were in the new States one hundred and fifty-four millions of acres to which the Indian title was extinguished, and nine million five hundred thousand acres to which the Indian title was not extinguished; making in the aggregate one hundred and sixty-three million five hundred thousand acres. From this deduct for disputed grants, many of which are large, three millions and a half of acres; which would leave one hundred and sixty millions subject to the operation of this bill, (Mr. CALHOUN'S amendment;) being less than one sixth of the whole public domain."

Who can read the above extract, and not see the immense magnitude of the subject under consideration? I listened to the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] while portraying the importance of this great subject, with the attention due to that Senator as well as to myself—desirous as I was to hear the whole argument; and, sir, I had the pleasure of concurring most fully with that Senator up to the point of his argument where he declared that the pre-emption, graduation, and distribution plans all fell short of the desired object of settling the question upon the terms of compromise upon which I desire to see it placed; and urged as the only panacea, or remedy for the disease, his amendment ceding to the States in which they lie the lands within their limits, upon certain terms and conditions. At this point I was compelled to leave the company of the Senator. I could not concur with him in either of his positions; and, sir, I confess that I was surprised to hear the Senator declare that his amendment, or bill, was calculated to close the whole land question. Why, sir, does not the Senator see that it falls greatly short of meeting the desired object? Can he shut his eyes to the fact that the garment he has made is entirely too small for the body he designs to put it on? His bill applies to the lands lying in the new States alone—one hundred and sixty millions of acres; while the whole quantity of the public lands is over ten hundred millions of acres, as shown by the report which I have read.

The great objects of the Senator, as he has declared, are to get rid of this agitating question in Congress, to withdraw Executive patronage, and, finally, to settle the land question. How will the bill of the Senator effect these desirable results? As I have said, it touches less than one-sixth of the public domain; the land system, with all its paraphernalia, must still be kept up; Congress will have just as much legislation, and the patronage will be about the same as if no such bill had been passed. But, sir, I forbear to push the argument on the Senator's bill further at this moment. I shall have occasion to examine it in its proper order in the course of my remarks. Our land system has been justly eulogized by Senators on all sides of the Chamber. When we compare it with the systems of other countries, how high does it stand in the comparison; or even contrast it with the manner of the disposition of the public lands, by granting large tracts, upon credit, to individuals or companies, as was first adopted by this Government, and how pre-eminent does our present system stand? Still it is becoming too great in magnitude, too extensive in its demands upon the legislation of Congress, intimately too much connected with the various affairs of the nation. There seems to be a universal disposition and desire to make changes, either in the manner of the administration of the lands or in the disposition of the funds proceeding from their sales. The debt of the Revolution has been extinguished; the lands ceded by the States have been liberated from that charge, and a new state of the question has been presented by these considerations.

I propose to notice the different propositions that have been made for the disposition of these lands, in as brief a manner as I can, and show how they stand. At the commencement of the last Congress of the administration of Mr. Adams, I took my seat as a member of the House of Representatives. At that time the questions of graduation and pre-emption were the favorites for discussion. Well, sir, pre-emption laws, in some shape, have been passed from that day to this; and we now have one before us, differing somewhat in character from any former law, of which I will speak hereafter. But, sir, the graduation bills have shared a very different fate. Not a session of Congress has been held without discussing or acting upon a graduation bill in some shape or other. General Jackson came into power on the tide of unbounded popularity: his friends were devoted to his person, and his partisans sustained his measures with great unanimity. He was most decidedly in favor of graduation: he held it up, as did his adherents in the West, as the antagonist measure to the distribution principle, as carried out in Mr. CLAY's land bill; and when the President defeated that bill, he proclaimed graduation as the proper measure. Well, sir, he held the station for eight years; and at the expiration of his term, Mr. Van Buren came into power. Like his predecessor, he, too, recommended graduation; the Secretary of the Treasury favored it as a financial measure; his partisans in the West held it up to the people as an Administration measure. At the last session of Congress the bill passed the Senate about the same time the pre-emption bill did; they went to the House together; the pre-emption bill passed, and the graduation bill slept on the table. There was power enough to pass the Sub-Treasury bill and the pre-emption bill, but the graduation bill was forgotten. Thus, sir, twelve years, including the administrations of General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren, have passed away, and the graduation bill stands precisely where it did when I came to Congress first. From this I am led to believe either that there never was any serious intention of passing it by those who clamored the loudest for it; that it was merely held up to the gaze of the people as the opposition measure to distribution, for the purpose of defeating the latter measure, or the people were opposed to it, and the dominant party knew it, and were afraid to pass it; and let me say to Senators now, that I have not the least idea it ever will pass, unless it shall be connected with the pre-emption and distribution principles, upon terms of compromise of the whole subject.

The objections that are urged against the graduation bill are, first, that it unsettles the land policy; secondly, it reduces the price of the real estate of the country; thirdly, the principle of graduation, by the time the lands have been in market, is arbitrary and unjust; inasmuch as the tables of sales show that lands which have been long in market still find purchasers at the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. These objections are entitled to due consideration; and although I do not expect to live long enough to see a graduation law standing upon its own basis, I will briefly notice them. As to the first objection, it will depend entirely on a prior question; that is, would the change be for the better? If so, there can be no objection on that ground; as frequent changes have been made, and the land system has been much improved by them. Instance the subdivisions of the tracts; the introduction of the cash for the credit system; the reduction of the price from two dollars, which was the minimum, to one dollar and twenty-five cents, the present minimum. The second position is, that it reduces the price of the real estate of the country. This assumption I think rather specious than substantial; it would certainly tend to sell the land, and cause it to be improved at a much earlier day than it otherwise would be; and as the value of the improved land depends upon the state of the improvement of the country, it follows that the cultivation and improvement of these lands at an early day must tend to increase rather than diminish the value of the other improved lands in the same section of country; at least, the effect would not be perceptible against this view. In the next place, it is contended that the principle of graduation by time—that is, the length of time lands have been in market—is arbitrary and unjust, because lands that have been long in market still find purchasers at the minimum price. This matter is perfectly plain and simple of solution. Lands have an intrinsic and a relative value. A graduation bill by time only applies to the intrinsic value of lands; they are sold by their relative value, by which I mean that the locality, quality of soil, water privileges, timber, and many other qualities, compose the intrinsic value of a piece of land, and for which it receives an early purchaser; while lands wanting any of these qualities would be passed by the settler in the first instance; but, after the country around becomes settled and improved, these lands, thus passed by, become relatively valuable in consequence of their locality, and not their original intrinsic value; and that relative value finds for them purchasers. I have no doubt but that at least one half of the lands that are now called refuse may in a series of years be forced upon purchasers at the minimum price. This is my view of the matter. It looks very plain to me; and yet it has excited a long debate to account for the apparent phenomena, how could it be possible that these lands could be inferior lands, and still find purchasers. There are connected with this part of the argument two important questions: First, is it right for the Government to hold up these lands at a price above their intrinsic value, until they are sold by their relative value, and thereby avail itself of the industry of the purchasers of the surrounding lands to give that relative value? The other is, should the settlement of the country be retarded, and the States prohibited from taking the lands, until that relative value shall have been given to them by the surrounding improvements? I have heretofore thought that both of these questions should be decided in the negative, and have voted accordingly; and, as I have heard no complaint of my vote, I shall in this instance take the same course, though I feel quite easy about it, and would willingly conform to the will of my State by voting either way, or make a reasonable compromise of the whole matter to secure greater benefits in the final adjustment of the land question.

I come now, Mr. President, to the more important question of pre-emption as embraced by the bill before us. As I have already said, laws on this subject have been passed from time to time, differing in some particulars from the bill before us, which I will look into as I progress with the argument.

But, before I give my views upon the question, I desire to say a few words in relation to my vote against an amendment to the original bill, which excluded foreigners from the benefits of pre-emption. It has been urged by Senators that the restriction should have been incorporated in the bill; they contend that persons who have no interest in our Government, and who owe allegiance to a foreign power, ought not to have the benefits of a law which they contend grants exclusive privileges. There is much force in the argument, and were there not countervailing considerations, I should be disposed to go with them; but, sir, let it be remembered that, previous to obtaining the benefit of the law, residence, improvements on and cultivation of the land, are requisite on the part of the pre-emptor; this I considered tantamount to a declaration of a bona fide intention on the part of the settler to become a citizen of the United States; indeed, it is one of the most conclusive evidences of that intention that could well be conceived of. Still, I voted to require the declaration to be made in writing before the pre-emption shall operate. I cannot agree with Senators who think there is great danger of this class of foreigners overturning or injuring the Government, by their votes or otherwise. Sir, let me tell Senators that this is not the class of men from whom danger is to be apprehended. These are honest, hard-working, industrious men, who support themselves and families by the sweat of their brows; men who attend to their own business, and not the concerns of the public; they are not the class of political foreigners who hang around your seaports and the suburbs of your large cities, making politics their trade, preaching agrarian and loco loco doctrines in the daytime, and lighting loco loco matches and rioting at night—the levellers down, because they cannot level up. Men who do not betake themselves to honest callings for a livelihood, and who are the enemies of those who do; these are the men you may watch; but when you see a foreigner take his family into the Western country, settle down on a piece of wild land, commence his little improvement, surrounded and aided by his wife and children, you may rest satisfied that you have nothing to fear from him; he is of the useful class of foreigners that ultimately become our best citizens. The spirit that prompts him to acquire property will induce him to protect and defend it. The other class are not affected by pre-emption laws, for they would not cultivate and improve the new lands if you would give them the privilege free of cost. I have seen many of this class in the West as well as in the East, and I have never seen one of them claiming pre-emption privileges. The other class usually apply for the benefit of our naturalization laws, and become citizens at the earliest period possible; they are good members of society, and I desire to give them all encouragement I can consistently with the provisions of the Constitution.

During the discussion of this question, the argument was pushed further than was called for by the provisions of the bill; and new questions were started, or rather sprung upon us, one of which, being an important one, I am not disposed to let pass without a brief notice. It has been contended that the States have the power to confer the rights of citizens, or, in other words, citizenship, on foreigners, notwithstanding the Constitution of the United States on that subject. Others have contended that this can only be done in the absence of the exercise of the power of passing naturalization laws on the part of Congress. I heard these opinions advanced by distinguished Senators, and I confess I thought at the time that both were wrong—that those who contended for the first of these positions were clearly and wholly mistaken; and that those who admit the power in the States, in the absence of the exercise of the power by the Federal Government, had taken ground that could not be maintained. I supposed the whole power to be exclusive in Congress, and that in no case, under no circumstances, could the States, or either of them, exercise it; and I find, on consulting a high authority, (Story on the Constitution,) that I was right. I will read to the Senate what that learned commentator says on the subject. 3d vol. Commentaries, chap. 16, he says:

"The propriety of confiding the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization to the National Government seems not to have occasioned any doubt or controversy in the convention. For aught that appears on the journals, it was conceded without objection. Under the confederation, the States possessed the sole authority to exercise the power, and the dissimilarity of the system in different States was generally admitted as a prominent defect, and laid the foundation of many delicate and intricate questions. As the free inhabitants of each State were entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in all the other States, it followed that a single State possessed the power of forcing into every other State, with the enjoyment of every immunity and privilege, any alien whom it might choose to incorporate into its own society, however repugnant such admission might be to their policy, convenience, and even prejudices. In effect, every State possessed the power of naturalizing aliens in every other State—a power as mischievous in its nature as it was indiscreet in its actual exercise. In one State, residence for a short time might and did confer the rights of citizenship; in others, qualifications of greater importance were required. An alien, therefore, incapacitated for the possession of certain rights by the laws of the latter, might, by a previous residence and naturalization in the former, elude at pleasure all their salutary regulations for self-protection; and it has been remarked, with equal truth and justice, that it was owing to mere casualty that the exercise of this power under the Confederation did not involve the Union in the most serious embarrassments. There is great wisdom, therefore, in confiding to the National Government the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization throughout the United States. It is of the deepest interest to the whole Union to know who are entitled to enjoy the rights of citizens in each State, since they thereby, in effect, become entitled to the rights of citizens in all the States. If aliens might be admitted indiscriminately to enjoy all the rights of citizens at the will of a single State, the Union itself might be endangered by an influx of foreigners hostile to its institutions, ignorant of its powers, and incapable of a due estimate of its privileges.

"It follows from the very nature of the power that, to be useful, it must be exclusive; for a concurrent power in the States would bring back all the evils and embarrassments which the uniform rule of the Constitution was designed to remedy. And, accordingly, though there was a momentary hesitation, when the Constitution first went into operation, whether the power might not still be exercised by the States, subject only to the control of Congress, so far as the legislation of the latter extended, as the supreme law; yet the power is now firmly established to be exclusive. The Federalists, indeed, introduced this very case as entirely clear, to illustrate the doctrine of an exclusive power by implication, arising from the repugnancy of a similar power in the States. 'This power must necessarily be exclusive,' says the author, 'because if each State had power to prescribe a distinct rule, there could be no uniform rule.'"

The doctrines here laid down by the learned commentator are fully sustained by the conclusive authorities to which he refers, and sustain the two positions for which I contend.

First. That the power over the subject of naturalization is vested in Congress, and is denied to the States, and is consequently exclusive. And, secondly, that no State can create an alien a citizen of such State, as, by that means, such person would in effect become a citizen of every other State.

I have thought proper, Mr. President, to place this matter distinctly before the country that it may be understood, especially as it has been raised in this debate, and different views have been presented by distinguished Senators.

It will be my purpose, for a few moments, to call back the attention of the Senate to the pre-emption bill at the point where we left it. The objections to a pre-emption bill, so far as I can understand them, are, first, that such a bill encourages persons to leave the old States and settle in the new. To this I would say, that surely Senators would not deprive their brethren of the privilege of bettering their condition in life if they think proper to do so. We are all in pursuit of happiness, and if any portion of the citizens of the old States are willing to leave the homes of their fathers and migrate to the West in search of a better home, hard would be that heart that would prevent them; and harder still would be the heart of those who would not receive them with open arms. Ours is a common country, and let us never forget that neither our affections for each other nor our love of country should be separated by geographical boundaries or State lines.

Secondly. It is objected that the principle grants exclusive privileges to a class of men who rush in advance of civilization and seize upon the public property, and it has even been suggested that they might be restrained by the action of the Government. To this I would say, that legislation should always adapt itself to the condition of affairs. We must look at things as they are, and not as they might be supposed to be, or we legislate for a supposed and not a real state of things. That spirit of enterprise and discovery which is characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon race—that spirit that animated the Pilgrims, and the first settlers at Jamestown—that spirit that prompted a Boon, a Clark, and a Kenton, to penetrate the Western wilds and encounter and overcome the perils that surrounded them—that spirit which fired the early settlers of the West, induced them to leave the peaceful homes of their fathers, and brave the savage rifle and tomahawk, to settle a new country—I say that same spirit is impelling our people onward; the tide that commenced rising and flowing west from the shores of the Atlantic is still rolling on, and can only be arrested by the waves of the Pacific. Our people are already settling beyond the Rocky Mountains, and in a few years more there will be a nation of our citizens in that region. You need not talk of arresting this spirit; it forms a noble trait in our character, and it should be provided for. The privileges granted are those of selecting, occupying, cultivating, and paying for at the minimum price, a quarter section of Government land, securing to the settler the fruits of his own industry in exclusion of all others. It is said that these lands, if sold at public auction, would bring a higher price than the minimum. This may be so in many cases; but here again we must look at the matter in its true light. I consider the pre-emption laws merely declaratory of the custom or common law of the settlers. If you make your public sales, and put up lands thus improved, the settler will become the purchaser at the minimum price. No one will bid against him; no honest man would take from a poor man the improvements he had made on a piece of land, and no dishonest man would dare to do it. Previous to a sale all the settlers in the district have a perfect understanding that each is to have the piece of land he lives upon, and they will neither bid against each other, nor will any other person risk the consequences of taking from any one his improvements by purchasing his lot of land. Sir, who could do it? Who would dare to do it? Whose conscience would suffer him to do it? And here let me answer a position assumed by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANUM:] he spoke of the bowie knife and the rifle settling the question of pre-emption between the settlers themselves. I know the Senator would not make the statement, unless he believed that the consequences he fears would grow out of such conflicts; but let me assure him he is wholly mistaken. One pre-emptor has just as much regard for the pre-emption right of another as he has for the personal property of his neighbor, or as the citizen land holder of the old States has for the real estate of others to which he has no claim or title; or, in other words, the occupancy and cultivation of land by a settler secures to him the right to purchase that land, in exclusion of every other settler, as effectually, by the custom of the settlers, as if pre-emption laws guarded his claim. I may here be asked why pass a pre-emption law then? My answer is the same that would be given to the passage of a declaratory statute; to leave no doubt on the subject in the mind of any, and to provide for a possible case that might occur. When I am on this point, I must say one word as to the general character of these pioneers. I may be pardoned for supposing that I have had some opportunities of judging that some Senators who have spoken have not. More than twenty years of my life have been spent on the frontier. I have seen my State in her infancy, with the fairest and largest portion of her territory in the possession of the Indians. I have seen her pass through the different gradations of improvement, until she has arrived at her present high grade in the comparison with her sisters. I have seen the first rude hut, the first log cabin, erected by the first occupant of the wilds of what is now the most beautiful and highly improved portions of my State. I have seen, heard, and conversed with the early settler, and let me assure Senators he is the last man that would willingly do injustice to his country, and the very first, in times of peril, to bare his manly bosom and nerve his strong arm in her defence; and although he may be as rough and as rude as his own log tenement, his heart beats with patriotic emotions for his country; he is a warm friend, a kind neighbor, ever hospitable to strangers, and, still better, an honest man; his poverty and his enterprise, with the hope of bettering his condition, and providing for his family, stimulate him to leave his old friends, the homes and the graves of those who are dear to him, plunge into the wilderness, and undergo the perils and deprivations incident to the settlement of a new country. Do you ask me where is the evidence of his industry and usefulness? I answer you by pointing to the West. Go there and see for yourself—let the great West answer for the emigrant.

I have, Mr. President, a single remark to make upon a question arising out of a principle of the particular bill before the Senate. The principle of granting prospective pre-emptions has been strenuously opposed, as being a departure from previous laws on the subject; as holding out a bounty in advance, for settlement. As to the first of these positions, I must say that a prospective pre-emption is much more justifiable than a retrospective one. The case stated, in my opinion, settles the question. In the case of a retrospective pre-emption, you justify a trespass actually committed on the public lands, and grant to the trespasser the benefits of the pre-emption law, for you have a law in full force declaring it to be a trespass to enter upon these lands, destroy the timber, take stone, or commit other acts inconsistent with the rights of the Government. In the other case, you justify no trespass, but by law grant the privilege to the actual settler. The second position assumed I answer by saying that such has been the practice of the Government for a series of years; that the stimulus created by a prospective pre-emption law would not be perceptible. The settler relies with full confidence on the security of his right of pre-emption, either by a retrospective law, such as we have been in the habit of passing for his benefit, or the custom or common law of settlers, of which I have spoken. I dismiss this part of the subject with the single additional remark, that, as pre-emption laws have been passed, as they have not been productive of any visible public injury, and as that portion of our fellow-citizens for whose benefit they are passed confide in their continuance, I see no impropriety in the measure if sufficiently guarded.

Having noticed the graduation and pre-emption principles, I must proceed to the examination of the bill of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] called the cession bill. It is not my purpose to discuss the whole details of the bill, but to merely state some of the prominent objections to it, at least those objections that have satisfied my mind that it ought not to become a law. I have already stated that I fully concurred with that Senator in the importance and magnitude of the subject, and the propriety of its arrangement, so as to rid Congress of the subject, if possible. In these points the Senator and myself agree; but in the remedy he proposes, we totally disagree. I have already showed that his bill only covers the lands in the nine States, amounting, in the aggregate, to only 160,000,000 acres out of ten hundred millions, the whole quantity; hence the apparent inadequacy of the proposed measure to remove the difficulties of the present system. But I desire to pursue this matter further, and show the gross inequality of the measure as applied to the nine new States. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] touched this point in his remarks the other day, in his usual able manner, and has relieved me from the necessity of going so much at large into it as I would otherwise have done. I hold in my hand a table prepared for the Committee on Public Lands, and appended by that committee to the report on the bill I am now discussing, without, it seems, even noticing the glaring inequality presented by it. Sir, I present that table to the Senate: it is an important document, essential to a correct understanding of the position I am examining."

By an examination of this table, the great diversity in the condition of the nine new States will appear in a glaring light. I will take the two States which will appear in a glaring light. I will take the two States of Indiana and Arkansas to illustrate the idea. The aggregate of the whole of the public lands that Indiana contained, as estimated by the table, was 20,629,359 acres; of this quantity there have been sold 15,158,702 acres; granted to the State and individuals, for all purposes, 1,074,163 acres; unsold, including lands unsurveyed, 4,396,494 acres; the purchase money received by the General Government into the National Treasury from the sale of the 15,158,702 acres is $19,326,301. The quantity of land in Arkansas is 31,463,910 acres. Of these there have been sold 2,464,710 acres; granted to the State and individuals for all purposes 976,896 acres; and there remain unsold 28,027,304 acres. The United States have received for the sale of these 2,464,710 acres the sum of $3,110,897. Indiana contains a population of near 700,000 souls, and Arkansas a population of about 100,000 souls. Thus stand the two States. Now let us see the application of the principles of the bill of the Senator from South Carolina to these two States. Here stands Indiana with her 700,000 souls, having paid into the National Treasury the sum of $19,326,301 for the lands already sold, receiving under the bill her thirty-five per cent. of the proceeds of the remaining 4,396,494, while Arkansas, with her 100,000 souls, having paid into the National Treasury only $3,110,897, would receive her thirty-five per cent. of her 28,027,304 acres, subject to like charges. So that Arkansas, containing the smaller population, and having paid the least money into the National Treasury, would receive greatly the most in the dividend. I might run out the idea, and push the argument on this point; but as my object is brevity, and as I have much yet to say, I will pass to the consideration of another view of the subject, believing that I am understood by the Senate.

In presenting another view of the subject, I may be permitted to contrast the benefits to the new States supposed by the friends of the bill to be conferred by it with those arising from the distribution plan, which is its antagonist measure. And in this point of view, I am prepared to show that even Arkansas, one of the most favored States, would be much the gainer by the distribution bill even in a pecuniary point of view, if she had as much Indian title to extinguish as Michigan, and confining it exclusively in the estimate to the lands lying in Arkansas. If I sustain this position, it follows that there is not a single State in the Union, holding land subject to the extinguishment of Indian title, that could take the measure without a great pecuniary sacrifice as a substitute for the distribution bill. Senators may think I am venturing upon bold ground, and I am very sure the Senator from South Carolina, in my eye, believes that the position cannot be maintained; but let him hear me answer the argument growing out of a statement of the case, for, fortunately for me, the case is not to be made out by argument; the proof lies in the statement of the facts of the case. Arkansas, by the bill of the Senator from South Carolina, would receive thirty-five per cent. upon the sales of her unsold lands. She will receive, as the law now stands, five per cent. which is taken from her by the bill and included in the thirty-five per cent; this leaves her thirty per cent. The distribution bill gives her twelve and one-half per cent. and leaves her in possession of her five per cent. making seventeen and one-half per cent; and then gives her her proportion, in the ratio of representation, of the other eighty-two and one-half per cent. which would raise the aggregate amount to be received by the State to over twenty-per cent. without any expense of the land system, or the extinguishment of Indian title, leaving, at this stage of the calculation, less than ten per cent. in favor of Mr. CALHOUN'S bill. For this ten per cent. the State would be compelled to pay the expenses of the land system, the surveys, the sales of the land, and the extinguishment of the Indian title; for the provisions in the bill are:

"This cession, together with the portion of the sales to be retained by the States respectively under the provisions of this act, shall be in full of the five per cent. fund, or any part thereof not already accrued to any State; and the said States shall be exclusively liable for all charges that may hereafter arise from the surveys, sales, and management of the public lands and extinguishment of Indian title within the limits of said States respectively."

Now, sir, can any Senator say that the State could do all that is required of her for the ten per cent? or would any State accept of such a proposition in lieu of the distribution bill, if both were presented? It may not be amiss to look a little further into the cost of this matter, or, as in the case of Bumble, the beadle, to examine the spoons, and see if they are the pure stuff. What is included in the extinguishment of Indian title? My eye has been turned a little to that matter, and there may be some items that even some of the Senators from the new States now favoring this bill have not considered. I will name some of them for the consideration of the Senate. The costs or expense of extinguishing Indian title include the expense of holding the treaty, including the support of the Indians in their encampment and in council; the costs of the commission to hold the treaty; the price given for the lands; the removal of the Indians West; the purchase of lands for them for their new homes; their support in their new position for at least a year; the expense of a commission to investigate claims against them; for all these enter into the consideration of modern treaties. Would ten per cent. pay these expenses? Let one of the States try it, and, my word for it, such State will be largely minus in the account. Then, sir, the bill is clearly delusive to the new States, most certainly not so intended by the distinguished mover, for I give him full credit for good faith to those States; but it seems to me he has not done justice to his strong and vigorous mind, by bringing it to bear fully upon the subject, or he would not have presented this bill as just to all, or specially beneficial to any of the new States.

There is, however, another view of the question which should settle the matter beyond controversy. The argument I have introduced has been confined to an examination of the bill with reference to the lands lying in the States. This is a very circumscribed view of the case. I so intended it, as it covers only one hundred and sixty millions of acres out of the ten hundred millions of acres. But still it must not be forgotten that while the bill of the Senator from South Carolina confines itself to the one hundred and sixty millions of acres, the distribution measure covers the whole, and distributes, not only the proceeds of the one hundred and sixty millions, but also of the residue of the ten hundred millions; and while the cession bill establishes the principle that so soon as a State is admitted into the Union the lands must be ceded, the other continues the distribution. Without, therefore, going into the great variety of important questions which have been discussed by others relative to the power and expediency of the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, I am compelled to arrive at the conclusion that it is my duty to vote against it; and if it should pass and become a law, and the question shall be put to me whether the proposition should be accepted by my State, I should have to answer in the negative.

I have now, Mr. President, arrived at that point of the argument when it becomes necessary to discuss the main subject before us: I mean the proposed amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, (MR. CRITTENDEN.)

Here Mr. MARRICK asked Mr. SMITH to give way to a motion to adjourn. Mr. S. having spoken over an hour and a half, and it being late in the evening, the Senate adjourned.]
